We selected the profile as the picture with which to guide Mr. Griffith in his search for a King, and he forthwith expostulated: "Then, if we must match that face we will have to do without a George III." He averred that the full face was argued upon by historians as the best portrait of this George. But even so, Mr. Griffith knew that it would be very difficult to find a man with such a high forehead and length of jowl, let alone obtaining in the same face the huge eyes. However, this director is not despairing, knowing that paint and coloring can make up for a multitude of facial deficiencies.

Carol Dempster had been sitting in a large chair awaiting her turn. She wore a woolen sweater over her décolleté gown, and soon Mr. Griffith turned his attention to another scene, with Miss Dempster shedding her modern sweater.

A Hard Worker.

From the information Mr. Griffith uttered concerning his new production, it was obvious that he had given it intense study. He is a man with a fine sense of humor, a marvelous memory for phrases and details, and a director who loves to make a good picture, but also a successful one. He is well aware of certain weaknesses in film production, and regrets as much as any other artist in his field having to imitate some cinematic scenes. When Griffith is working on a picture he practically lives with it, and he is very enthusiastic about "America," which, incidentally, has been recently by the daughters of the American Revolution, [illegible] Griffith, [illegible] Washington, [illegible] Griffith [illegible] Washington [illegible] Griffith [illegible] Washington [illegible] Griffith [illegible] Washington

Morning Picture World (my) 1/18/24

"America" Premiere

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York.

Griffith and his company visited the leading shrines of American liberty on special trains to take scenes.

Carol Dempster, leading woman of "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Brooklyn M.P. Mag. March 1924

My Motion Picture News 2 Jan 19 1924

When Horse Falls

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman of "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance.

Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle.

Brooklyn M.P. Mag. March 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH

I dont believe that D. W. Griffith really likes being interviewed, but once caught, he always takes the utmost pains to see that the interviewer gets a thrill. You might not expect it of him but he gives the same attention to the kid reporter from the Farmers Almanac that he would to W. R. Hearst. Having been a newspaper man himself, he is keen enough to know that the newspaper business is a rapidly changing profession and that a green awkward reporter today may tomorrow be a big critic with your professional life in the hollow of his hand. So Griffith will always stop everything to be interviewed at any time—by anybody. He always stages a good show and makes a point of saying something that will work up into a spectacular story.

He is so charming to them personally that every writer always goes away from the studio D. W.'s devoted friend for life. The more so, because they always approach the throne scared down to the bottom of their souls.

Brooklyn M.P. Mag. March 1924

I dont believe that D. W. Griffith really likes being interviewed, but once caught, he always takes the utmost pains to see that the interviewer gets a thrill. He always stages a good show and makes a point of saying something that will work up into a spectacular story

Photograph by Melbourne Spurr

32

Mansfield (Ohio) News 1/14/24

Greenroom Jottings

HISTORICAL epochs on the screen are to the fore at present—note "America," a Griffith production, which really promises to be the long-heralded rival of the "Birth of a Nation." Griffith gave the folk around Somers, N. Y., such a patriotic stirring-up as they hadn't had in a long time, when he arrived in that vicinity with his scarlet uniformed British Army and his handful of Colonists in their home-spun suits. The greatest trouble he had was to keep the lookers-on out of the fighting.

Each of the occupants of the thirty thousand motor cars, that had lined up to watch the fun, as well as the residents, wanted to wade in and trounce the British. But the thing which most nearly defeated both armies were those unmanly wigs they had to wear while fighting. Manton, the distinguished hairdresser of New York, was kept steadily on the jump putting the wigs back into place.

From Somers, Mr. Griffith took his company to Boston where weapons, drums, costumes, vehicles, etc., used during the Revolution, were turned over to him by the Lexington Historical Society, for the filming of the story. All the scenes were taken on the actual site of action, except where modern improvements made this impossible. Lexington Common, Buchman's Tavern and the Adams house, where John Hancock and John Adams were sleeping when the British came, and many other familiar historical landmarks will be seen in the picture.

NY Telegraph 1/18/24

Elements Won't Behave for Gr

D. W. Griffith is having a time of with the elements, which simply refuse to fit in with his production plans. What with the snow refusing to come at his command, he has had his difficulties, for he has also been suffering with the Shenandoah under the stress of the recent storm. The night of the gale all those who were up at the studio got marooned at Mamaroneck, where the studio edges the water and half of the exteriors which have been erected for "America" took a trip into the Sound. Several of the Griffith players had to remain up at Mamaroneck overnight, but D. W. Griffith himself could not complain, as he domiciles on the grounds.

Eureka (Cal) Times 1/6/24

Griffith's "America" May Bind Public More Closely to the Films

BY MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 1.—Unless all signs fail, two more genuine contributions are about to be made to the motion picture screen. A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation." Later Paramount let loose a broadside with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same two—Griffith and Paramohnt—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame. Paramount's "The Ten Commandments" if it lives up to expectations, will repeat the sterling quality of "The Covered Wagon". Chances are it will be better.

And in the early spring Griffith will give up to the public his "America," now being filmed.

* * *

The possibilities for "America" drain the imagination as no other subject possibly can. The film promises to be not only a wonderful lesson in history—one that will be shown to every school-child in the country—but a film that will bind the adult public more closely to the picture world than ever before.

Griffith has everything in his favor to surpass even his own ability. "America" was begun under the inspiration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who urged Griffith to immortalize the war for American independence. Not only the D. A. R., but all big patriotic societies are cooperating with the producer with the enthusiasm of school children in a commencement day play.

Secretary of War Weeks has placed thousands of soldiers at Griffith's command and these troops, in costume, are re-enacting the principal battles of the Revolution.

* * *

But what isn't all. In a special train, Griffith and his company are touring the shrines of American liberty, staging scenes on actual sites of the picturesque scenes of the war.

GRIFFITH DIRECTING A "PAUL REVERE" SCENE

Old homes, those that have been standing sicne the Revolution, have been turned over for Griffith's use by enthusiastic citizens, and relics, priceless relics, that have been handed down from one generation to another, are being surrendered to the director for use in the picture.

* * *

Just as "The Covered Wagon" drew a striking contrast between our west of the early eighteens and that of today, just so will "America" bring home to the public the vast growth since 1776.

Just at the present time Griffith and his company are in the vicinity of Alexandria, Va., where George Washington lived as a young man and wen to lodge meetings. The very Masonic Hall which Washington frequented is standing. It's a picturesque old place. That section of the country teems with memories and offers the camera a world of opportunities.

Scenes already have been "shot" in the vicinity of Bunker Hill, Concord and Lexington. And as soon as the snow comes, the camera will be leveled on historic Valley Forge and the Delaware River.

Lionel Barrymore has been engaged to play the part of Walter Butler in "America" D. W. Griffith's next film effort. The role is said to demand versatility and force. He is now playing in New York in "Laugh, Clown, Laugh".

As a Christmas present D. W. Griffith permitted Robert W. Chambers to direct a scene in "America" and to reciprocate Chambers suggested that Mr. Griffith write 500 words of his forthcoming novel which is to tell the story of "America".

Springfield (Mo) Leader Press 1/6/24

D. W. Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution, is waiting in vain for either ice or snow to be duplicated this winter, to take some of the important scenes.

Sandusky (O) Register 1/6/24

Lionel Barrymore, in addition to his successful stirring venture with David Belasco, has been engaged to play the part of Walter Butler in the D. W. Griffith production, "America."

Elkhart (Ind) Truth Jan 9 1924

Producer Makes Exhaustive Study of Conditions As They Were in Revolutionary Days; New Programs Now On View

The oldest inhabitant may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the differences between a winter in Revolutionary Days and a winter today than D. W. Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the [illegible], are painfully experienced with accurate records of the weather day by day in '74, '75 and '76. Also of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are trying in vain for either the ice or snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal records of [illegible] show that the Hudson River, New York and even more northern waterways was covered by ice and in fairly good condition for skating at the time of the year, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck Reserve Park, New York, [illegible] that during the taking of his street scenes for "America" in the large [illegible] the weather prophet [illegible] that the mercury [illegible] and to stay.

Middletown (Conn) Journal 1/6/24

Lionel Barrymore Plays in "America" Griffith's New Film

Paragraph Jan 10 1924

Lionel Barrymore [illegible]

Soldiering is Different For Movies, Hard-Boiled Buck Learns

BY MAURICE HENLE

[illegible]

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/9/24

Detroit Watch News 1/9/24

San Francisco Chronicle 1/9/24

Eureka (Cal) Times 1/6/24

GRIFFITH PRAYS FOR SNOW AND ICE

The backward winter has hit the movies hard. Companies planning to take snow and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow. D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the War of Independence, "America", perhaps the biggest of all the many pictures waiting on the weatherman, is reported to be one of the hardest hit of all. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware River, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that ice bound stream. He sent scouts to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found a plentitude of frozen lakes, but the rivers had but a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Which caused Griffith to redouble his prayers for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

Distinguished Visitors See Scenes Filmed at Mamaroneck

Two former ambassadors and a former Secretary of the Treasury were among a party of distinguished guests who recently watched the filming of several scenes for "America", the screen epic of the Revolution which D. W. Griffith is making for the D. A. R. at his Mamaroneck studios.

Dr. Charles R. Crane, former Minister to China, Richard Crane, former Minister to Jugo-Slavia, Mr. and Mrs. D. F. Houston, the former one-time Secretary of the Treasury, Sir Percy Sykes of London, Eng., Mrs. Leatherbee of Westover, Va., and D. M. Brodie were among a notable group which watched Lionel Barrymore and Carol Dempster, Griffith's leading woman, enact some of the more stirring scenes for the new film.

The Crane family owns the famous Westover estate on the James River, in Virginia, where Griffith "shot" a number of Revolutionary scenes for "America", using prominent Southern society women and Revolutionary descendants as extra people.

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman of "America", the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance. A cry of horror went up as her fellow players saw the horse slip, fall and roll over. Miss Dempster was riding side saddle, and had the horse fallen on the other side would have crushed her beneath its weight.

Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle, not serious, although painful, injuries. Her costume was

Elmira Star-Gazette

[illegible] Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman of "America", the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located. Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance. A cry of horror went up as her fellow players saw the horse slip, fall and roll over. Miss Dempster was riding side saddle, and had the horse fallen on the other side would have crushed her beneath its weight. Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle, not serious, although painful, injuries. Her costume was [illegible]

Canton (O) News 1/6/24

Topeka (Kan) Capital 1/10/24

FILMLETS

D. W. Griffith has returned from Virginia, after photographing scenes on eleven historical spots for his Revolutionary film, "America." The [illegible] taken in Fredericksburg, where it actually occurred. More than 50 persons whose ancestors were present at the surrender took part in the scene.

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/10/24

Kinematograph Weekly

LOOKING FORWARD

TO A WORLD AMERICANISED

by D. W. GRIFFITH

Poughkeepsie (NY) Star Jan 10 1924

WHAT'S DOING IN THE MOVIES

Paragraph 1/10/24

D. W. Griffith has advanced the date of the opening of his newest feature photoplay, "America." If present plans are followed, the New York premiere will be had on the eve of Washington's Birthday. We had a report that a late April, or early May opening might be expected.

The Jewish Day (NY) Jan 8 1924

נריפיתס נייסטע פראָדוקציאָן וועט געדריט ווערן וואַשינגטאָנס טאָג'ס געבורטסטאָג

וועשינגטאָן בויסדען, דעם 8טן פעברואַר. דעם „אַמעריקאַ" גריפיתס נייסטע פּראָדוקציאָן פון דער אויסשטעלונגס־קאָמיטעט פריער געווען זען ווערען צום ערשטען מאָל אין 44סטן סטרים טעאַטער.

דאָס איז דאָס ערשטע מאָל וואָס די גרויסע אַמעריקאַנער רעוואָלוציע וואָס האָט געשיכטס־ווערטן, אין אַמעריק זאָל זיך באַפרייען פון ענגלאַנד, ווערט געוויזען אויפן לייוונענס.

גריפיתס האָט אָפּגעגעבען אַזאַ אַ שיער פון זיין און נעלם פאַר אַט דעם בילד. ער האָט אַלעמאָל די הילף פון דער אַמעריקאַנער אַלגעמיינער און אויסוועריקייטס־אַפּאַרטמענט. זיי האָבען אויך געהאָלפען. אַז עס זאָל זיין איבערגעגעבען אַ ריכטיג בילד פון דער גרויסער רעוואָלוציאָנערע עפּאָכע.

די נאַציאָנאַלע האָבען געלעזען. אַז דאָס בילד זאָל זיין אַריכטיג אַפּשיינלעכ און גריפיתס האָט געזען. אַז עס זאָל זיין אינטערעסאַנט. אַמעריקאַ איז היסטאָרישע ריכטיג און שפּאַר נעבער.

Kansas City (Mo) Star 1/11/24

"America" To Have Premier Feb. 21

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21st, "America", the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggles for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians, and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities conected with the production recently voiced that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be celebrated by the public presentation of "America", and to accomplish this Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in the drama, the filming of which necessitated Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on special trains to take scenes.

McKeesport (Pa) Times Jan 15 1924

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/10/24

"AMERICA"

D. W. Griffith's long-awaited production, "America," will be given its premier on Washington's Birthday Eve. Hence, we shall very soon know precisely what the creator of "The Birth of a Nation" and "Hearts of the World" has done with the battles of the American Revolution. This picture was made for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Here we see (left, top) Mr. Griffith shaking hands with Mrs. Bransford, direct descendant of King Carter, and owner of the Shirley Estate in Virginia. Also we see (above), Morgan's Raid, enacted by the famous Third U. S. Cavalry at Fort Myers, Va., led by the personal aide of Secretary of War Weeks. Below, the U. S. regulars in the trenches at Bunker Hill, refighting the major battle of the Revolution.

Saginaw (Mich) News-Courier 1/10/24

Latest News and Gossip from Filmland

Soldiering is Different for Movies Hard-Bolied Buck Learns

THURSDAY Tiltster
BY MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 10.—On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, 'America,' the photodrama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater, New York.

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

• • •

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

"He asts me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Gill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

• • •

That's that.

• • •

Carol Dempster, leading woman in D. W. Griffith's "America," now being filmed, had a narrow escape from death when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of one of the scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The scene had to be refilmed.

Erie Times Dec 11 1924

Jewish Daily News Bureau 1/11/24

דער פאטער פון אונזער לאנד אויפן לייוועגס.

אין גיכען וועט אויף בראדוויי געווייזען ווערען גריפיטס לעצטע בילד — „אמעריקא", וואס עס דארף זיין דאס הערליכסטע, וואס עס איז ווען עס איז געווייזען געווארען אויפן לייוועגס.

דאס בילד איז פון דער צייט פון דער גרויסער רעוואלוציע, וואס אונזער לאנד האט דורכגעמאכט פאר זיין אונז אבהענגיגקייט.

איהר וועט אין דעם בילד זיך באקענען מיט דעם פאטער פון אונזער לאנד מיט דזשארדזש וואשינגטאן, איהר וועט זיך באקענען מיט די אנ־רערע וויכטיגע פערזענליכקייטען, וואס זיינען פאראייביגט געווארען אין אונ־זער געשיכטע.

אין די גרויסע שלאכטען, וואו דער שיקזאל פון אונזער לאנד איז באשלאסען געווארען, ווערען געווייזען אויפן בילד, — איהר וועט האבען פאר זיך די אינטערעסאנטסטע עפּאכע פון דער אמעריקאנער געשיכטע.

אבער דאס וועט נים זיין קיין לעכ־טאן אין היסטאריש, אפילו, איהר וועט טאקע געווארען ווערען וויכטיגע חיי־טאריש געשיכטעניש, אבער עס וועט געגעבען ווערען אויף אזא אייגענע־ר־דיגען אופן, אז עס וועט פארבאנדען ווערען מיט גרויסע פאקטען.

The Forward 1/12/24

Binghamton (NY) Press 1/12/24

Asheville (NC) Citizen 1/12/24

Rochester (Mass) Enterprise 1/12/24

Sonoma (Cal) Sentinel 1/12/24

Chicago (Ill) Journal 1/12/24

Jewish Daily News Bureau 1/12/24

Jewish Daily News Bureau 1/11/24

Pittsburg (Pa) Post 1/13/24

Portland (Ore) Journal 1/13/24

Dayton (Ohio) News 1/13/24

Lexington (Ky) Herald 1/13/24

Oakland (Cal) Tribune 1/13/24

Pictures Plays and People

Jan. 9, 1924 THE COLUMBUS CITIZEN PAGE 6

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" IS NEXT BIG FILM IN MAKING

Historic Picture Expected to Bind Public More Closely to the Films

By MAURICE HENLE.

New York, Jan. 12.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, 'America,' the photodrama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

• • •

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

"He asts me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Gill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

• • •

That's that.

• • •

Carol Dempster, leading woman in D. W. Griffith's "America," now being filmed, had a narrow escape from death when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of one of the scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The scene had to be refilmed.

Portland (Ore) Oregonian 1/13/24

On February 21, the eve of Washington's birthday, "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York.

The Daughters of the American Revolution, anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the revolutionary war with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading activities of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians, and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be celebrated by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary days has a part in the drama, the filming of which necessitated Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty, [illegible] trains to take scenes.

Lionel Barrymore has been engaged by D. W. Griffith for the "America" film. In addition to Barrymore the cast of "America" now includes Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Erville Alderson and Marie Burke.

Portland (Ore) Journal 1/13/24

"America" the D. W. Griffith special picture production will first open in New York on Washington's birthday. Another historical film, "Life of Abraham Lincoln," is to be first seen on Lincoln's birthday.

MRS. DUNLOP HONORED BY D. A. R. LADIES YESTERDAY

Mrs. Ivan T. Dunlop was again honored yesterday afternoon when the ladies of the Edward Buncombe Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, paid her a parting compliment at the home of the regent, Mrs. Frank M. Weaver, who was the hostess of the occasion. The regular January business meeting was held from 3:30 to 4:30 o'clock and a number of intimate friends of the honoree came in at the latter hour for tea.

Mrs. Charles A. Moore and Mrs. Whitefoord Smith presided at the handsomely appointed tea table and poured coffee and tea. Assisting the hostess in serving and entertaining the guests were the officers of the chapter and Mrs. F. M. Massler and Mrs. James W. Ussell.

The Weaver home was unusually attractive with cut flowers arranged artistically in the various rooms. During the tea Mrs. James G. Stikeleather sang a charming group of songs, accompanied by Miss Lily Jackson at the piano. Mrs. Kendall Northup also favored with three lovely selections, with Mrs. Katheryn Dailey at the piano. Both Mrs. Stikeleather and Mrs. Northup were received with great applause.

Quite an interesting business session preceded the tea and the reports of the various officers and chairmen carried business of a constructive nature. Mrs. Charles M. Platt, historian, reported that a splendid story of the unveiling of the Edward Buncombe marker on the Charlotte green with pictures would soon appear in the picture world, and in the D. A. R. Magazine, official organ, the D. A. R. Magazine. She also told of the recent unveiling of a memorial of Lady Astor in the British House of Parliament, which is a compliment that will please every patriotic American.

Plans were discussed for the observance of Washington's birthday anniversary on February 21 and the birth of the Washington and its Ba[illegible] Chapter will be in the hands of a committee of which Mrs. D. Wilson is the chairman, and Mrs. J. Rush Dunn is a member.

Mrs. Weaver, Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Platt, Mrs. Dunlop, Mrs. Ussell, Mrs. Massler, Mrs. Stikeleather, Mrs. Northup, Mrs. Dailey, Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Jackson, Mrs. Dunn, Mrs. Ashley, Mrs. Ashley, Mrs. Ashley

Atlantic City (N.J.) Jan 13 1924 | Gazette Indianapolis (Ind) 61 Star Jan 13 1924 | Norwalk (Conn) Hour 1/14/24 | Worcester (Mass) Post 1/14/24 | St Antonio Tex News 2 Jan 15 1924

SOLDIERING IS DIFFERENT FOR MOVIES, HARD-BOILED BUCK LEARNS

By MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 13.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, 'America,' the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chockin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minuteman. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's all.

Salt Lake (Utah) Tribune Jan 13 1924

"America" to Have Premiere Feb. 21

On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary war with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be celebrated by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in the drama, the filming of which necessitated Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of America's liberty on special trains to take scenes.

It's Col. Griffith Now.

It's only "Col." D. W. Griffith.

For the motion picture producer who revolutionized the film world by making the first long motion picture, "The Birth of a Nation," and who is now filming the war of independence in "America" at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, has been made an honest-to-goodness colonel by the Governor of his native state, Kentucky.

Governor Edwin P. Morrow of Kentucky has just forwarded Griffith's commission to Mayor Huston Quinn of Louisville, with a letter stating that he has made Griffith a colonel in recognition of the honor which the movie producer has brought to the state of Kentucky.

Griffith is the first motion picture producer ever honored in this manner. Others who have received similar commissions in the past include Col. George Horace Lorimer, Col. Norman P. Hapgood and Col. John T. McCutcheon.

Griffith was born in LaGrange, Ky., Jan. 22, 1880, one of eight children born to Gen. Jacob Wark Griffith—the "Roaring Jake" Griffith of the Confederacy.

Word of the signal honor bestowed upon him by the Blue Grass state reached Griffith at his studios at Mamaroneck, where he is filming scenes for "America." He declined to be interviewed.

Miss Dempster injured.

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman in "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance. A cry of horror went up as her fellow players saw the horse slip, fall and roll over. Miss Dempster was riding side saddle, and had the horse fallen on the other side would have crushed her beneath its weight.

Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle, not serious, although painful, injuries. Her costume was ruined, and she was much shaken up. It was necessary for her to withdraw from the filming for several days. She has now completely recovered.

same

As [illegible] leading man can be selected for "The Throwback," Universal will begin the production of that story, for which William Elwell Oliver recently won a scholarship offer from Carl Laemmle.

Griffith's big spectacle, "America," will be ready for its New York premiere on the eve of Washington's birthday, with the Daughters of the American Revolution composing most of the audience. A future Fox film, "The Transcontinental Railroad," will depict the [illegible] and tribulations of the Union Pacific.

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 1/14/24

Carol Dempster Hurt

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman in "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance.

She suffered from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle.

Lexington (Ky) Herald 1/13/24

D. W. Griffith's determination to make "America" an all-round patriotic [illegible] so not only is his latest production all about the War of Independence and made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, but it is to have its opening on Feb. 21, the eve of Washington's birthday. The Forty-fourth Street theatre has been chosen for the first public presentation.

Jamaica L.I. (N.Y.) Press Jan. 14, 1924

"America" is hard hit. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware River, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that icebound stream. He sent scouts to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found many frozen lakes, but the rivers had only a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Griffith redoubled his prayers for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

Atlantic City (N.J.) Gazette 1/13/24

D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution the romance of America's struggle for liberty, which will be called "America." Miss Carol [illegible] woman.

Hamilton (O) Journal 1/14/24

San Francisco (Cal) Examiner 1/14/24

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21, "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York.

Chicago (Ill) Journal Jan 14 1924

Releasing Date Set

Washington's birthday is the date set for the release of Griffith's new film, "America."

Fall River (Mass) Herald 1/15/24

BY MAURICE HENLE

New York, January 15—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chockin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minuteman. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Denver (Colo) Rocky Mt News 1/15/24

GRIFFITH STUDIES RECORDS OF SNOW TO STAGE PICTURE

The oldest inhabitant may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in revolutionary days and a winter today than D. W. Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging revolutionary times for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76 and of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of colonial times show that New England, New York and even more Southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year in 1776, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck now registers spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next summer, in the hope that the village weather prophet, who insists that the seasons have changed round, may be right.

Soldiering In Revolution Film Fun For U. S. Troops

By MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 14.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, 'America,' the photodrama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minuteman. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as through the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

TEXAS BEAUTY REPRESENTS LONE STAR STATE IN MAMMOTH FILM DEPICTING DAYS OF 1776

MRS. NORMAN R. GREATHOUSE.

—Photo by Diem.

Texas beauty who is representing the Lone Star State in the mammoth "America" film, which is being screened for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16.—Mrs. Norman R. Greathouse, formerly Tottye Price, has been chosen to represent Texas in "America," the colossal photodrama of the War of American Independence, being filmed by David Wark Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mrs. Greathouse was selected by Mr. Griffith and Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the leading role in the film, to portray the role of Mrs. Gage, wife of Gen. Gage, the British commander-in-chief at Boston during the Revolution. Her remarkable facial resemblance to the spouse of the noted commander had been noted by Miss Dempster, her close personal friend, long before the filming of "America" was projected.

In making "America" Griffith has chosen his actors and actresses primarily for their physical resemblance to the famous historical personages who appear in the action. He had rejected hundreds of applicants for the role of Mrs. Gage before Miss Dempster called his attention to Mrs. Greathouse, who was at once engaged for the role.

Among the hundreds taking part in the new picture is a representative of almost every State in the Union, and the selection of Mrs. Greathouse assured Texas being represented. Mrs. Greathouse was born in Stephensville, Tex., the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Price, who now reside in El Paso. Her early girlhood was spent in Weatherford and Seymour, and following her marriage she lived in numerous other Texas cities and towns.

Like practically all of those taking part in "America," Mrs. Greathouse is a direct descendant of prominent Revolutionary families.

"America," which, appropriately enough, is to have its first public presentation in New York on the eve of Washington's Birthday, is the first attempt to present the struggle for American liberty in dramatic form on the screen.

In making it, Griffith has enlisted the assistance of the leading historians, historical societies and of the United States Regular Army. Large details of infantry and cavalry were turned over to the noted director by the War Department, through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks and wearing the garb of British grenadiers, the buff and blue of the Continental Army, the homespun of Colonial Minutemen, and the savage accoutrement of American Indians refought the major battles of the Revolution.

Individuals and organizations brought forth from their family vaults and from their museum cases priceless relics of the War of Independence for Griffith's use as properties. His big research department scoured the world in search of data. He and his immense company traveled in special trains to the leading shrines of American liberty to take scenes on the actual sites.

Robert W. Chambers, the famous novelist, has written the story for "America," and among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, [illegible]

Dayton (Ohio) News 1/13/24

Griffith's New Film Is Story Of Early Days

NEW YORK, Jan. 12—On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, asked D. W. Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggles for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his company redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary days has a part in the drama. Hundreds of descendants of Revolutionary families were used as extra people and treasured relics of the war were dragged forth from family vaults and museum cases for use as properties.

Among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton.

Grand Rapids Mich Herald Jan 13 1924

Premiere of New Griffith Film Feb. 21

On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its premiere in New York.

The D. A. R. asked D. W. Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggles for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his company redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary days has a part in the drama. Hundreds of descendants of Revolutionary families were used as extra people and treasured relics of the war were dragged forth from family vaults and museum cases for use as properties.

Among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton.

Griffith Waits for Snow

Count among the industries which have been hit hard by the backward winter the movies. Those producers who have been rushing to their snow scenes have been out of luck for the most part. An example is D. W. Griffith. The famous producer has been making his photodrama of the War of Independence, "America," for some months, yielded to the demands of his producers and the historical optimists of Washington crossing the ice-clogged Delaware early in December to find conditions adverse for the scene. He has filled the ranks of those who hope that the winter will prove to be a season of good drama, instead of a season of no drama. But he has yielded to the pleas of his producers and has gone south to Canada with a company of players, technicians and historical experts to film the scene. He has found the ice on the Delaware and other streams in the vicinity of Valley Forge, Pa., where there is a chance of good drama, not covered, fortunately, but he has yielded to the pleas of those who hope that the winter will prove to be a season of good drama, instead of a season of no drama. But he has yielded to the pleas of his producers and has gone south to Canada with a company of players, technicians and historical experts to film the scene. He has found the ice on the Delaware and other streams in the vicinity of Valley Forge, Pa., where there is a chance of good drama, not covered, fortunately, but

Hamilton (O) Journal 1/14/24

GRIFFITH WAITS FOR REAL WINTER

The oldest inhabitants may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in Revolutionary Days and a winter today than [illegible] Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76. Also of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of Colonial times show that New England, New York and even more southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck registers Spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next Summer, in the hope that the village weather phophet, who insists that the seasons have changed round, may be right.

Jamaica (N.Y.) Press Jan 14 1924

Washington Won't C[illegible] Valentino's Re[illegible]

Denver (Colo) Rocky Mt News 1/15/24

Griffith's Gigantic Revolutionary Spectacle Released on February 21

Photodrama, 'America,' Sponsored by D. A. R. to Make Public Premiere on Eve of Washington's Birthday.

Muskegon (Mich) The Chronicle Jan 14 1924

Waterburg (Conn) Democrat 1/15/24

Sherwood (Ky) Times-Dispatch Jan 13 1924

BARRYMORE TO PLAY UNDER D. W. GRIFFITH

Cincinnati (O) Post Jan 13 1924

Rochester (N.Y.) Democ Chron 1/13/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald Jan 13 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 1/13/24

WEATHER HITS AT FILMS

Warm Winter Makes It Difficult for Producers to Find Ice and Snow Locations

Portland (Ore) News 1/15/24

ARROW ESCAPE

Ag Even Trade

Lincoln (Neb) News

Pittsburgh Sun Jan 14 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 1/13/24

Cincinnati (O) Post Jan 13 1924

Cincinnati (O) Post 1/13/24

Cincinnati (O) Post 1/13/24

Griffith's "America" May Bind Public More Closely to the Films

By Maurice Henle

NEW YORK—Unless all signs fail, two more genuine contributions are about to be made to the motion picture screen. A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation." Later Paramount let loose a broad side with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same two—Griffith and Paramount—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame. Paramount's "The Ten Commandments," if it lives up to expectations, will repeat the sterling quality of "The Covered Wagon." Chances are it will be better.

And in the early spring Griffith will give up to the public his "America," now being filmed.

The possibilities for "America" drain the imagination as no other subject possibly can. The film promises to be not only a wonderful lesson in history—one that will be shown to every school-child in the country—but a film that will bind the adult public more closely to the picture world than ever before.

Griffith has everything in his favor to surpass even his own ability. "America" was begun under the inspiration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who urged Griffith to immortalize the war for American independence. Not only the D. A. R., but all big patriotic societies are co-operating with the producer with the enthusiasm of school children in a commencement day play.

Secretary of War Weeks has placed thousands of soldiers at Griffith's command and these troops, in costume, are re-enacting the principal battles of the Revolution.

But that isn't all. In a special train, Griffith and his company are touring the shrines of American liberty, staging scenes on actual sites of the picturesque scenes of the war.

Old homes, those that have been standing since the Revolution, have been turned over for Griffith's use by enthusiastic citizens, and relics, priceless relics that have been handed down from one generation to another, are being surrendered to the director for use in the picture.

Just as "The Covered Wagon" drew a striking contrast between our west of the early eighteens and that of today just so will "America" bring home to the public the vast growth since 1776.

Just at the present time Griffith and his company are in the vicinity of Alexandria, Va., where George Washington lived as a young man and went to lodge meetings. The very Masonic Hall which Washington frequented is standing. It's a picturesque old place. That section of the country teems with memories and offers the camera a world of opportunities.

Scenes already have been "shot" in the vicinity of Bunker Hill, Concord and Lexington. And as soon as the snow comes, the camera will be leveled on historis Valley Forge and the Delaware River.

GRIFFITH DIRECTING A "PAUL REVERE" SCENE

SOLDIERING DIFFERENT IN MOVIES, HARD-BOILED BUCK PRIVATE LEARNS

By Maurice Henle.

NEW YORK.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, America, the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years service being told by that movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

"He asts me if I knowed what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Last week ...

Griffith's "America" to Have Premiere February 21

The world premiere of "America," D. W. Griffith's feature play built around Revolutionary days, will have its premiere at the Thirty-fourth Street Theatre on Washington's Birthday eve, February 21.

GRIFFITH TO PRESENT 'AMERICA' FILM ON FEBRUARY 21

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America." To accomplish this Mr. Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working night and day, holidays and Sundays, to complete the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in this great photodrama, the filming of which necessitated Mr. Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on trains to photograph the scenes.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long experience, was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, manner, habits and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Washington, but living the role.

By MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 17.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, 'America,' the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth street theatre, New York.

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asts me if I knowed what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

TO PLAY WASHINGTON

D. W. Griffith had difficulty in finding an actor to impersonate George Washington in his film, "America." Frank McGlynn was first chosen, but his stage engagements interfered. So Griffith cast about for other six-footers of the necessary qualifications and finally selected Arthur Dewey. Mr. Dewey qualifies in physique and in acting experience. What is more, he is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family which migrated from Lexington to the middle West.

Carol Dempster, leading woman in D. W. Griffith's "America," now being filmed, had a narrow escape from death when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of one of the scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell, throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The scene had to be refilmed.

WASHINGTON'S DOUBLE FOUND FOR "AMERICA"

Located after a country-wide search during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including several Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been chosen by D. W. Griffith to portray George Washington in "America," photodrama of the War of Independence.

Dewey is said to bear an almost perfect resemblance to Washington. Before final selection, Dewey and other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., and compared with pictures and statues of the first President.

Arthur Dewey has been engaged by D. W. Griffith to portray George Washington in "America," which Mr. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

THE silly lengths to which the emphasizing of personalities has gone in the motion picture world is well illustrated by the advertisements requesting the public to "consider" the "past triumphs" of one of them and mentioning five of the most important productions in this field of

GENERAL PHILIPPE DE TRANTE (GRAIN

(Mr. Griffith at Work.)

The sun sent a bar of gold across the glistening waters of the Sound as we approached the old Flagler home at Mamaroneck in which David Wark Griffith makes his studio, and where he is now directing stray scenes of "America," the picture of the American Revolution, on which he has been working for the last eight months. Our car was driven by a capable Japanese chauffeur, who took the turns in the road at splendid speed.

In a few moments we were inside the old mansion watching Mr. Griffith at work. He was standing in a prison dungeon with a cobble-stoned flooring, discussing in low tones with Lionel Barrymore, who was sitting on the jail cot. Mr. Barrymore plays the role of Walter Butler, a character without a single redeeming attribute. Griffith was in modern clothes, and Barrymore in boots and breeches and shirt of gloomy hue.

Holding his cigarette between his fingers, Griffith stepped back to the firing line of the three cameras, and then called out "Lafayette," just loud enough to be heard in this unusually quiet studio. The Marquis de Lafayette, with his aid, stepped through the oaken door into the dingy-looking cell, his sword clanging, his tri-cornered hat set off by a red ribbon, and cream-colored lace protruding through the gap left by his graceful cape that hung in folds down to the calves of his high boots.

"So—sen-timen-tal," prompted Mr. Griffith, after the brilliantly attired aid had introduced the great Frenchman. "You—look—charming—just—now," continued Griffith, weighing the cigarette between his long fingers. "You—think—it might be possible to get him out of there. Barrymore—Ah, that would be—wonderful!"

As he uttered the different sentences with pauses, Mr. Griffith appeared to act the different parts himself. He put himself with swift transition into the moods he wanted the players to feel. The overhead Cooper-Hewitts vied with the fading daylight visible through the upper window.

Mr. Griffith lucidly discussed the question of longer scenes in pictures, asserting that brevity was splendid so long as the thought was maintained.

"It's a disputed question," he explained, "but we kept up the thought in the 'Birth of a Nation' and in 'Way Down East.' We learn from the oldest novelists that the thought must not be broken. They say, 'And now, dear reader,' and they go on to something else, or Dickens writes, 'So while this was happening,' and then proceeds. It is possible to have the continuance of scenes following swiftly on the heels of others so long as the thought is not broken. If, when the mother is dying and the father bending over her, nicely acted, there should be introduced in a following scene the father's pet cow, it would not keep up the thought. I discussed this idea with Barrie when he was living in Adelphi Terrace, London—yes, the ideas must flow in sequence."

Reverting to motion picture license, Mr. Griffith explained that when he makes a picture it must be a paying one, and that it should be remembered that a stage play may cost $15,000, and if it is unsuccessful the loss is not so great.

"But" continued Mr. Griffith, "when making a picture we spend $400,000, $500,000 and $1,000,000, and we would stop have to shut up shop if we only made pictures to suit ourselves. I have been working on this production since June, and we have sought out actual locations for some of the scenes. We had 300 men in the reproduction in Lexington of the great battle. We were careful to select men of certain attitudes and types—and we killed just the same number as those that died on the actual green. We even clad them in the same homespun. We have taken no end of pains to insure accuracy in detail and the appearances of the characters. I found that Thackeray has by far the best description of George Washington in his 'The Virginians.'

"Now," said Mr. Griffith, bringing out three engravings of George III, "put yourself in the place of a director and select the one which in your idea is the best picture of the king."

One of the pictures showed a gallant young gentleman, brilliantly arrayed, in the saddle of a glistening steed. That, of course, showed George when he was the young. The second picture was of full face, with large, wide eyes, with which the artists were supposed to daze their clients in the olden days, and the third picture was a profile, which had the bulgeon of passion and the rather receding chin of the monarch. The man who had come for the day was twenty feet away in the place of the King frown and sneer in an effort to resemble one of the portraits of George. His chin was prominent. His face was modern and it impaired the chance of the aspiring actor, which, by the way, is no reflection upon his looks.

[illegible]

Elephants Won't Behave for Griffith

D. W. Griffith is having a time of it with the elephants, which simply refuse to fit in with his production plans. What with the snow refusing to come at his command, he has had his difficulties, for he has also been suffering with the Shenandoah under the stress of the recent storm. The night of the gale all those who were up at the studio got marooned at Mamaroneck, where the studio edges the water and half of the exteriors which have been erected for "America" took a trip into the Sound. Several of the Griffith players had to remain up at Mamaroneck overnight, but D. W. Griffith himself could not complain, as he domiciles on the grounds.

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first President.

Although some historical authorities claim that the father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons and fought valiantly on Lexington green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long experience, was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, manner, habits and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Washington, but living the role.

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including several Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America" the photodrama of the War of Independence which is being filmed by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey, who was selected because of having the most perfect facial resemblance to Washington, is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family which during the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass.

ARTHUR DEWEY IS CHOSEN TO PLAY GEO. WASHINGTON

Gets Much Coveted Role in Mr. Griffith's "America" Picture

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first President.

Although some historical authorities claim that the father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long experience, was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, manner, habits and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Washington, but living the role.

[illegible] has been chosen by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in the production of "America," which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Although some historical authorities assert that the Father of His Country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

[illegible] all the [illegible] Companies planning to take [illegible] and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow. D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the War of Independence, "America," is reported to be hardest hit of all. There is no sign of ice in the historic Delaware River and consequently Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing the ice-bound stream. Scouts were sent to Canada to see if there was a river sufficiently like the Delaware that was frozen up, but nothing could be found that would answer.

'AMERICA' IS TO OPEN HERE ON FEBRUARY 21

Griffith Film Premiere Set for Washington's Birthday Eve

On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, requested Mr. Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this nation's struggle for independence. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Mr. Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the forthcoming production for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America." To accomplish this Mr. Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working night and day, holidays and Sundays, to complete the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in this great photodrama, the filming of which necessitated Mr. Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on trains to photograph the scenes.

Arthur Dewey has been engaged by D. W. Griffith to portray George Washington in "America," which Mr. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

LOCATED, after a country-wide search during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than 100 actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington, in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made, Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first president.

Although some historical authorities claim the father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons and fought valiantly on Lexington

DEWEY WILL PORTRAY GEORGE WASHINGTON

Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the middle west, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on [illegible]

SCREEN SPARKS

ARTHUR DEWEY, well-known actor of the speaking stage, has been selected by D. W. Griffith to play the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington of the many actors considered for the part. Besides looking the character, Dewey is intensely interested in the theme, being a direct descendant of a New England family which was prominent in the revolution.

D. W. Griffith has advanced the date for the opening of his newest feature photoplay, "America." If present plans are followed, the New York premiere will be had on the eve of Washington's Birthday. We had a report that a late April, or early May opening might be expected.

Lack of Snow and Ice Hinders Filming of Historic Picture

Atlantic City (N.J.) Gazette Jan 13 1924 — Indianapolis (Ind) Star Jan 13 1924 — Norwalk (Conn) Hour 1/14/24 — Worcester (Mass) Post 1/14/24 — St Antonio Tex News 2 Jan 15 1924

SOLDIERING IS DIFFERENT FOR MOVIES, HARD-BOILED BUCK LEARNS

By MAURICE HENLE

New York, Jan. 14.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's all.

Salt Lake (Utah) Tribune Jan 13 1924

"America" to Have Premiere Feb. 21

On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary war with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be celebrated by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in the drama, the filming of which necessitated Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on special trains to take scenes.

St Paul (Minn) News 1/13/24

Premiere of New Griffith Film Feb. 21

On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its premiere in New York.

The D. A. R. asked D. W. Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggles for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "Amreica," and to accomplish this Griffith and his company redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary days has a part in the drama. Hundreds of descendants of Revolutionary families were used as extra people and treasured relics of the war were dragged forth from family vaults and museum cases for use as properties.

Among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton.

Dayton (Ohio) News 1/13/24

Griffith's New Film Is Story Of Early Days

NEW YORK, Jan. 12—On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, asked D. W. Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggles for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his company redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays, to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in the drama. Hundreds of descendants of Revolutionary families were used as extra people and treasured relics of the war were dragged forth from family vaults and museum cases for use as properties.

Among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton.

Grand Rapids Mich Herald Jan 13 1924

Griffith Waits for Snow

Chief among the industries which have been hit hard by the backward winter season in America. Those producers who [illegible] reason to obey snow [illegible] out of back for the most part. An example is D. W. Griffith. The famous producer has been making his photodrama of the War of Independence, "America," for many months. Inspired by the romantic episode of Washington crossing the icebound Delaware River, the producer was anxious to make the scenes in Revolutionary days, and he sent his cameras to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found many frozen lakes, but the rivers had only a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Griffith redoubled his prayers for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

Cincinnati (O) Post Tribune Jan 13 1924

It's Col. Griffith Now.

It's "Col." D. W. Griffith.

For the motion picture producer who revolutionized the film world by making the first long motion picture, "The Birth of a Nation," and who is now filming the war of independence in "America," at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, has been made an honest-to-goodness colonel by the Governor of his native state, Kentucky.

Governor Edwin P. Morrow of Kentucky has just forwarded Griffith's commission to Mayor Huston Quinn of Louisville, with a letter stating that he has made Griffith a colonel in recognition of the honor which the movie producer has brought to the state of Kentucky.

Griffith is the first motion picture producer ever honored in this manner. Others who have received similar commissions in the past include Col. George Horace Lorimer, Col. Norman P. Hapgood and Col. John T. McCutcheon.

Griffith was born in LaGrange, Ky., Jan. 22, 1880, one of eight children born to Gen. Jacob Wark Griffith—the "Roaring Jake" Griffith of the Confederacy.

Word of the signal honor bestowed upon him by the Blue Grass state reached Griffith at his studios at Mamaroneck, where he is filming scenes for "America." He declined to be interviewed.

same

As [illegible] be selected for [illegible] leading man [illegible] Universal will be [illegible] the production of that story for which William Elwell Oliver [illegible] a scholarship of $1,500 from Carl Laemmle. [illegible] Griffith's big spectacle, "America," [illegible] for its New York premiere on the eve of Washington's birthday, with the Daughters of the American Revolution composing most of the audience. A future Fox film, "The Transcontinental Railroad," will depict the [illegible] Union Pacific.

Lexington (Ky) Herald 1/13/24

D. W. Griffith's determination to make "America" an all-round patriotic [illegible] so not only is his latest production all about the War of Independence and made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, but it is to have its opening on Feb. 21, the eve of Washington's birthday. The Forty-fourth Street theatre has been chosen for the first public presentation.

Atlantic City (N.J.) Gazette 1/13/24

D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution the romance of America's struggle for liberty, which will be called "America." Miss Carol [illegible] woman.

Hamilton (O) Journal 1/14/24

GRIFFITH WAITS FOR REAL WINTER

The oldest inhabitants may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in Revolutionary Days and a winter today than [illegible] Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76. Also of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of Colonial times show that New England, New York and even more southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck registers Spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next Summer, in the hope that the village weather prophet, who insists that the seasons have changed round, may be right.

Miss Dempster injured.

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman in "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture, at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance. A cry of horror went up as her fellow players saw the horse slip, fall and roll over. Miss Dempster was riding side saddle, and had the horse fallen on the other side would have crushed her beneath its weight.

Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle, not serious, although painful, injuries. Her costume was ruined, and she was much shaken up. It was necessary for her to withdraw from the filming for several days. She has now completely recovered.

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 1/14/24

Carol Dempster Hurt

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman in "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located.

Her mount slipped in the mud, throwing Miss Dempster a considerable distance.

She suffered from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained ankle.

Jamaica L.I. (N.Y.) Press Jan. 14, 1924

"America" is hard hit. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware River, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that icebound stream. He sent scouts to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found many frozen lakes, but the rivers had only a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Griffith redoubled his prayers for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

San Francisco (Cal) Examiner 1/14/24

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21, "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York.

Chicago Ill Journal Jan 14 1924

Releasing Date Set

Washington's birthday is the date set for the release of Griffith's new epic, "America."

Fall River (Mass) Herald 1/15/24

BY MAURICE HENLE

New York, January 15—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry and he had just returned to the army base after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'close-up' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minuteman. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Denver (Colo) Rocky Mt News 1/15/24

GRIFFITH STUDIES RECORDS OF SNOW TO STAGE PICTURE

The oldest inhabitant may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in revolutionary days and a winter today than D. W. Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging revolutionary times for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76 and of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of colonial times show that New England, New York and even more Southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year in 1776, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck now registers spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next summer, in the hope that the village weather prophet, who insists that the seasons have changed round, may be right.

Denver (Colo) Rocky Mt News 1/15/24

Griffith's Gigantic Revolutionary Spectacle Released on February 21

Photodrama, 'America,' Sponsored by D. A. R. to Make Public Premiere on Eve of Washington's Birthday.

[illegible]

Muskegon (Mich) The Chronicle Jan 14 1924

[illegible]

Waterbury (Conn) Democrat 1/15/24

[illegible]

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 1/14/24

WEATHER HITS AT FILMS

Warm Winter Makes It Difficult for Producers to Find Snow Locations

[illegible]

TEXAS BEAUTY REPRESENTS LONE STAR STATE IN MAMMOTH FILM DEPICTING DAYS OF 1776

—Photo by Diem.

MRS. NORMAN R. GREATHOUSE.

Texas beauty who is representing the Lone Star State in the mammoth "America" film, which is being screened for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16.—Mrs. Norman R. Greathouse, formerly Tottye Price, has been chosen to represent Texas in "America," the colossal photodrama of the War of American Independence, being filmed by David Wark Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mrs. Greathouse was selected by Mr. Griffith and Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the leading role in the film, to portray the role of Mrs. Gage, wife of Gen. Gage, the British commander-in-chief at Boston during the Revolution. Her remarkable facial resemblance to the spouse of the noted commander had been noted by Miss Dempster, her close personal friend, long before the filming of "America" was projected.

In making "America" Griffith has chosen his actors and actresses primarily for their physical resemblance to the famous historical personages who appear in the action. He had rejected hundreds of applicants for the role of Mrs. Gage before Miss Dempster called his attention to Mrs. Greathouse, who was at once engaged for the role.

Among the hundreds taking part in the new picture is a representative of almost every State in the Union, and the selection of Mrs. Greathouse assured Texas being represented. Mrs. Greathouse was born in Stephenville, Tex., the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Price, who now reside in El Paso. Her early girlhood was spent in Weatherford and Seymour, and following her marriage she lived in numerous other Texas cities and towns.

Like practically all of those taking part in "America," Mrs. Greathouse is a direct descendant of prominent Revolutionary families.

"America," which, appropriately enough, is to have its first public presentation in New York on the eve of Washington's Birthday, is the first attempt to present the struggle for American liberty in dramatic form on the screen.

In making it, Griffith has enjoyed the assistance of the leading historians, historical societies and of the United States Regular Army. Large details of infantry and cavalry were turned over to the noted director by the War Department, through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks and wearing the garb of British grenadiers, the buff and blue of the Continental Army, the homespun of Colonial Minutemen, and the meager accoutrement of American Indians refought the major battles of the Revolution.

Individuals and organizations brought forth from their family vaults and from their museum cases priceless relics of the War of Independence for Griffith's use as properties. His big research department scoured the world in search of data. He and his immense company traveled in special trains to the leading shrines of American liberty to take scenes on the actual sites.

Robert W. Chambers, the famous novelist, has written the story for "America," and among those in the cast are Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton and other film stars.

Richmond (Va) Times-Dispatch Jan 13 1924

HARRYMORE TO PLAY UNDER D. W. GRIFFITH

[illegible]

Wilkes Barre (Pa) Times-Leader Jan 16 1924

SOLDIERING DIFFERENT IN MOVIES, HARD-BOILED BUCK PRIVATE LEARNS

By Maurice Henle.

NEW YORK.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, 'America,' the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

"Here I was after 30 years service being told by that movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

He asks me if I knowed what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Last week ...

Philadelphia (Pa) Enquirer 1/15/24

Griffith's "America" to Have Premiere February 21

The world premiere of "America," D. W. Griffith's feature play built around Revolutionary days, will have its premiere at the Thirty-fourth Street Theatre on Washington's Birthday eve, February 21.

Binghamton (NY) Sun Jan 16 1924

GRIFFITH TO PRESENT 'AMERICA' FILM ON FEBRUARY 21

On the eve of Washington's Birthday, February 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary War with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birthday of George Washington be marked by the public presentation of "America." To accomplish this Mr. Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working night and day, holidays and Sundays, to complete the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in this great photodrama, the filming of which necessitated Mr. Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on trains to photograph the scenes.

Fleshing My Journal 1/16/24

Griffith's "America" May Bind Public More Closely to the Films

By Maurice Henle

NEW YORK—Unless all signs fail, two more genuine contributions are about to be made to the motion picture screen. A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation." Later Paramount let loose a broad side with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same two—Griffith and Paramount—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame. Paramount's "The Ten Commandments," if it lives up to expectations, will repeat the sterling quality of "The Covered Wagon." Chances are it will be better.

And in the early spring Griffith will give up to the public his "America," now being filmed.

The possibilities for "America" drain the imagination as no other subject possibly can. The film promises to be not only a wonderful lesson in history—one that will be shown to every school-child in the country—but a film that will bind the adult public more closely to the picture world than ever before.

Griffith has everything in his favor to surpass even his own ability. "America" was begun under the inspiration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who urged Griffith to immortalize the war for American independence. Not only the D. A. R., but all big patriotic societies are co-operating with the producer with the enthusiasm of school children in a commencement day play.

Secretary of War Weeks has placed thousands of soldiers at Griffith's command and these troops, in costume, are re-enacting the principal battles of the Revolution.

But that isn't all. In a special train, Griffith and his company are touring the shrines of American liberty, staging scenes on actual sites of the picturesque scenes of the war.

Old homes, those that have been standing since the Revolution, have been turned over for Griffith's use by enthusiastic citizens, and relics, priceless relics that have been handed down from one generation to another, are being surrendered to the director for use in the picture.

Just as "The Covered Wagon" drew a striking contrast between our west of the early eighteens and that of today just so will "America" bring home to the public the vast growth since 1776.

Just at the present time Griffith and his company are in the vicinity of Alexandria, Va., where George Washington lived as a young man and went to lodge meetings. The very Masonic Hall which Washington frequented is standing. It's a picturesque old place. That section of the country teems with memories and offers the camera a world of opportunities.

Scenes already have been "shot" in the vicinity of Bunker Hill, Concord and Lexington. And as soon as the snow comes, the camera will be leveled on historic Valley Forge and the Delaware River.

GRIFFITH DIRECTING A "PAUL REVERE" SCENE

New Bedford (Mass) Mercury 1/17/24

(Mr. Griffith at Work.)

The sun sent a bar of gold across the glistening waters of the Sound as we approached the old Flagler home at Mamaroneck in which David Wark Griffith makes his studio, and where he is now directing stray scenes of "America," the picture of the American Revolution, on which he has been working for the last eight months. Our car was driven by a capable Japanese chauffeur, who took the turns in the road at splendid speed.

In a few moments we were inside the old mansion watching Mr. Griffith at work. He was standing in a prison dungeon with a cobble-stoned flooring, discussing in low tones with Lionel Barrymore, who was sitting on the jail cot. Mr. Barrymore plays the role of Walter Butler, a character without a single redeeming attribute. Griffith was in modern clothes, and Barrymore in boots and breeches and shirt of gloomy hue.

Holding his cigarette between his fingers, Griffith stepped back to the firing line of the three cameras, and then called out "Lafayette," just loud enough to be heard in this unusually quiet studio. The Marquis de Lafayette, with his aid, stepped through the oaken door into the dingy-looking cell, his sword clanging, his tri-cornered hat set off by a red ribbon, and cream-colored lace protruding through the gap left by his graceful cape that hung in folds down to the calves of his high boots.

"So—sen-timen-tal," prompted Mr. Griffith, after the brilliantly attired aid had introduced the great Frenchman. "You—look—charming—just—now," continued Griffith, weighing the cigarette between his long fingers. "You—think—it might be possible to get him out of there. Barrymore—Ah, that would be—wonderful!"

As he uttered the different sentences with pauses, Mr. Griffith appeared to act the different parts himself. He put himself with swift transition into the moods he wanted the players to feel. The overhead Cooper-Hewitts vied with the fading daylight visible through the upper window.

Mr. Griffith lucidly discussed the question of longer scenes in pictures, asserting that brevity was splendid so long as the thought was maintained.

"It's a disputed question," he explained, "but we kept up the thought in the 'Birth of a Nation' and in 'Way Down East.' We learn from the oldest novelists that the thought must not be broken. They say, 'And now, dear reader,' and they go on to something else, or Dickens writes, 'So while this was happening,' and then proceeds. It is possible to have the continuance of scenes following swiftly on the heels of others so long as the thought is not broken. If, when the mother is dying and the father bending over her, nicely acted, there should be introduced in a following scene the father's pet cow, it would not keep up the thought. I discussed this idea with Barrie when he was living in Adelphi Terrace, London—yes, the ideas must flow in sequence."

Reverting to motion picture license, Mr. Griffith explained that when he makes a picture it must be a paying one, and that it should be remembered that a stage play may cost $15,000, and if it is unsuccessful the loss is not so great.

"But," continued Mr. Griffith, "when making a picture we spend $400,000, $500,000 and $1,000,000, and we would soon have to shut up shop if we only made pictures to suit ourselves. I have been working on this production since June, and we have sought out actual locations for some of the scenes. We had 500 men in the reproduction in Lexington of the great battle. We were careful to select men of certain attitudes and types—and we killed just the same number as those that died on the actual green. We even clad them in the same homespun. We have taken no end of pains to insure accuracy in detail and the appearances of the characters. I found that Thackeray has by far the best description of George Washington in his 'The Virginians.'

"Now," said Mr. Griffith, bringing on three engravings of George III., "put yourself in the place of a director and select the one which in your idea is the best picture of the king."

One of the pictures showed a gallant young gentleman, brilliantly arrayed, in the saddle of a glistening steed. That, of course, showed George when he was too young. The second picture was of full face, with large, wide eyes, with which the artists were supposed to depict their objects in the olden days, and the third picture was a profile, which had the features of a person who had the rather receding chin of the monarch. The man who had come for the part was clearly just over in the grace of the King types, and seemed to be the one resembling one of the portraits of George. His chin was prominent, his face was modern and it displeased the clothes of the eighteenth century, which, by the way, is an item bearing upon his looks.

Mr. Griffith [illegible] the problem in the [illegible] way, explaining [illegible] to his search for a king and to [illegible] with experience. "Yes, it was about which they have so [illegible] in the [illegible] the full face, the second one the profile, the third one the [illegible] design. But, [illegible] Mr. Griffith [illegible] that it would be very difficult to find a man with such a face. Dignified and beauty of face, of course, [illegible] the face is the same face for long years [illegible] the same [illegible] of a [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Washington (DC) News 1/14/24 — Springfield (Mass) Rep Jan 20 1924 — Telegraph 1/20/24 Lexington (Ky) Herald 1/20/24 — Antonio Tex Jan 20 1924 — Topeka (Kansas) Capital Jan 20 1924

63

By FADEOUT

This business of propagandizing the poor, bedeviled movie fan is getting out of hand and growing past all endurance. It is getting so that we can't slough comfortably into a seat without being hectored from the screen about some pet scheme of a charlatan. Every bounder with a gold brick to sell the public manages to find a salesman in the movies and gets his particular brand of nonsense jammed in among bathing girls and high-priced scenery. The time is coming when wise house managers will furnish smoked glasses to put on when the preaching starts.

* * *

It isn't so long ago that I talked with David Wark Griffith about the power of the movies. He emphasized what we all know, that the movies are the greatest propaganda power now extant. We may not have a radio set, but we have a quarter to squander on the flickers now and then. Once planted in the plush seat, we, poor simple duds, are fair game for every thug with something to sell—from murder on the grand, or war, scale to the placing of a half-cent tax on shoelaces. Movies have already helped egg us into a war, and if they are not careful with their preaching news reels and their presumptuous thumbnail sermons, will send us shrieking into the streets, movieless, but lesson-free.

The last six months have seen a sudden outburst of propaganda via film. We have been advised—nay, almost ordered—to espouse this kind of tax reform and that kind of buffoonery—have been sold real beer and have had it snatched from our gaping mouths the next night by the chap on the other side of the barbed wire entanglement. We have been advised, in celluloid, that war is a crime and the very next night have seen the navy department slip one of its well-turned armament messages into a news reel, with the final fadeout of Old Glory flapping at the stern of a super-super-post-dreadnaught. It is nearly all confusing, and it is entirely silly.

It is the opinion of this particular jackass that the average citizen—which is the average movie fan—which is average you and average me—wants anything but such hollow and idiotic flubdub when he succumbs to the lure of the cinema. He wants to go into the silence—get his half-dollar's worth of laugh and thrill—and go out into the street, if not a nobler and better man, at least a rested and refreshed one. If there is one thing he hates, it is preaching. Any one addicted to moral lessons and ethical instruction obtains them from his favorite man of God on the seventh day. Producers and distributors of motion pictures will be making a grave mistake if they continue to open their doors to the balderdash of the hour.

Robert W. Chambers and D. W. Griffith are going over "America," Mr. Chambers' drama of the American Revolution.

George Washington Found.

A country-wide search was necessary, it seems, before D. W. Griffith found a suitable actor to play the role of George Washington in "America." It seems that Mr. Griffith was very particular to get a man who had never told a lie, so that he could play the part really to perfection.

Now, Arthur Dewey has been selected; we do not know if he was chosen because of his habit of adhering strictly to the truth, but at any rate, he is an actor of long standing and has never been a press agent.

Boston (Mass) Globe Jan 20 1924

Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the "War of Independence." Dewey was selected after a country-wide search. He was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington of all the applicants, many of whom were taken to Washington to be compared by Griffith with the pictures and statues of the first President.

In the research department it was learned that Washington described himself to his London tailors as being "just six feet and of medium build." Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family which migrated from Lexington to Illinois. An ancestor, Ashabel Smith, was one of the men who fought on Lexington Green.

HARD ON WASHINGTON

Can't Cross Delaware Unless Weather Turns Cold

The backward winter has hit the movies hard. Companies planning to take snow and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow. D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the War of Independence, "America," perhaps the biggest of all the many pictures waiting on the weatherman, is reported to be one of the hardest hit of all.

There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware river, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that ice bound stream. He sent scouts to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream all frozen up ready for the camera. They found a plentitude of frozen lakes, but the rivers had but a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there, which caused Griffith to redouble his prayers for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

Telegraph Jan 20 1924

GRIFFITH MIGHT MAKE KAW RIVER PLAY ROLE OF HISTORIC DELAWARE

Producer Foiled in Efforts to Film Scenes of Revolutionary History by Open Winter East.

The backward winter has hit the movies hard. Companies planning to take snow and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow.

D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the war of independence, "America," is reported to be one of the hardest hit of all. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware river, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that ice bound stream.

He sent scouts to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found a plentitude of frozen lakes, but the rivers had but a thin coating of ice, and in many cases flocks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Which caused Griffith to redouble his prayer for immediate snow at Valley Forge.

Washington (DC) Herald Jan 20 1924

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/20/24 — Huntington (W Va) Advertiser 1/20/24

Carol Dempster, leading woman of "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse she was riding in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture at Mamaroneck, where Griffith's studios are located.

Schenectady (NY) Union-Star 1/14/24

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey, a well-known actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington.

Telegraph Jan 20 1924

"America" and D. W. Griffith.

D. W. GRIFFITH probably accomplishes more by his simple and quiet method of producing than the director who shouts and rants and makes life in the studio a succession of turmoils.

A big scene for his latest photo-play, "America," took place at Mamaroneck last week unostentatiously and without heavy demonstration or bombast. Mr. Griffith is forceful and explicit, yet entirely free from the dictatorial pomp which so often accompanies authority. He knows what he wants. He gets after it and he gets it without fuss or confusion.

His studio is well organized and his long list of employees follow his directions like so many well-trained soldiers.

There is no loud, inefficient running about. Time is not wasted. There are no long waits between shots, and the actors participating in movie pictures are not unnecessarily absent. Orders are given in restrained, well-modulated tones and are promptly received.

Visitors to the studio are made welcome and in between the printing of the scenes Mr. Griffith and his staff find time to explain the various points in the development of the story.

Miss Carol Dempster, who has grown much about since her hard and persistent work in Intolerance, was presented at the Court of George III last week, in which ceremony Mr. Dewey, actor, recently returned from Persia, impressed the guests to see that most exquisite of presents.

It looks like "America" should be a remarkably authentic story when it is ready for screening, and Mr. Griffith, and his Prop. men, had every contribution you could possibly want, and never considering and good.

As the historical scenes of the Revolutionary period, it is enough that Mr. D. W. Griffith has provided the story which is being a personal labor of the construction of the historical background. Mr. Griffith is an authority on the subject and wanted no mistakes or confusion.

Mr. Griffith, Miss Dempster, Mr. Dewey, Mr. Barrymore, Mr. Bell, Mr. Hughes, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hall, Mr. Hall

THE MORNING TELEGRAPH, SUNDAY, JANUARY 20, 1924.

IN AND OUT OF F

By GORDON TRENT

"America" and D. W. Griffith.

D. W. GRIFFITH probably accomplishes more by his simple and quiet method of producing than the director who shouts and rants and makes life in the studio a succession of turmoils.

A big scene for his latest photo-play, "America," took place at Mamaroneck last week unostentatiously and without hectic demonstration or bombast. Mr. Griffith is forceful and explicit, yet entirely free from the dictatorial pomp which so often accompanies authority. He knows what he wants. He goes after it, and he gets it without fuss or confusion.

His studio is well organized and his long list of employees follow his directions like so many well-trained soldiers.

There is no mad, ineffectual running about. Time is not wasted. There are no long waits between scenes, and the delays prevalent in motion picture studios are conspicuously absent. Orders are given in restrained, well-modulated tones and are promptly executed.

Visitors to the studio are made welcome, and in between the grinding of the cameras Mr. Griffith and his staff find time to explain the various points in the development of the story.

Little Carol Dempster, with her pretty curls wound about her head and powdered in Colonial style, was presented at the Court of George III last week, for which ceremony Sir Percy Sykes, recently returned from Persia, journeyed to the studio to see that court etiquette be preserved.

In order that "America" should be historically authentic every effort is being made for accuracy as to detail in every respect, and Sir Percy has had complete jurisdiction over court costuming and royal hand-kissing and genuflecting.

As for historical fidelity of the Revolutionary period, it is enough that Robert W. Chambers has provided the story and is taking a personal interest in the construction of the Colonial background. Mr. Chambers is an authority on the history and manners and costumes of early America, and he had practical experience in the studio when Mesamore Kendall made the screen version of "Cardigan," a romantic story of a boy and girl of the same period.

"America," which is based upon Mr. Chambers's scenario of Colonial times, portrays minutely the Spirit of '76, and contains many of the characters made familiar in the earlier picture such as Sir William Butler, portrayed now by Lionel Barrymore, and various historical personages. The characters involved are so familiar that it has taken more than usual diligence to find appropriate types.

In fact, the filming of these famous episodes, both in war and romance, has not been done without handicaps, not the least of which has been the weather.

"To freeze or not to freeze"—that has been the question at the studio. The Delaware has been uncrossed in consequence, and who could suffer at Valley Forge during so mild and clement a Winter? Unless the thermometer registers freezing and the ground is covered with snow in three weeks' time these incidents will have to be lifted in toto from the chronicle, and they cannot blame it on the center.

Furthermore, the huts and cabins built on the lot have been hurtled into the bay through the fury of the recent wind storm and it is taking the combined efforts of all the studio carpenters to erect enough Colonial architecture for immediate use should the elements continue to Mr. Griffith's needs.

Notwithstanding these obstacles, there is no doubt that Mr. Griffith will, in his own fashion, be all pinch in with his release and most exciting as that when the audience gathers on February 21 at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. The usual cheers and enthusiasm attendant on a Griffith opening will be in order.

Date to close at the studio.

CAROL DEMPSTER.

Who Has Wound Her Curls About Her Head and Powdered Them in Colonial Fashion in Order to Become the Heroine of "America," Which Robert W. Chambers Wrote for D. W. Griffith.

Photoplay Magazine Chicago, Feb. 1924

Marie Kelley
Reporter
Jan 26 1924

Journey Whig Journal Jan 25 1924 Chicago (Ill)

Arthur Newland, a Son of Colchester Postmaster, to Play George Washington

ARTHUR NEWLAND AS GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Added interest to the great motion picture production "America," is given in this locality in the fact that Arthur Newland, a native of Colchester, McDonough county, has been chosen by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray "George Washington." His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland, have been residents of Colchester many years, and his father has held the office of post master there for 28 years. He was born in Colchester 45 years ago and received his education in the schools there. He left Colchester in 1907, to go on the stage, and his last visit there was three years ago in June.

His stage name is Arthur Dewey, and he was chosen from among more than 100 applicants, including many noted stars, for the role of the Father of his Country because of his striking physical resemblance to the first President. He is exactly six feet tall, and Washington in his letters to his London tailor described himself as that height.

Griffith is filming the photodrama of the War of Independence under the title of "America," for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Most of those appearing in the cast are descendants of Revolutionary families, and one of the ancestors of Arthur Newland was Ashabel Smith, who answered the summons of Paul Revere. Newland, besides being a successful actor, has made a deep study of American history, and brings to the role a sympathetic understanding of Washington's character and a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits and costumes. It is said he is not merely acting Washington — he is living the role.

He became a familiar figure to the theatergoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with Kibble & Martin, and has since been in a number of motion pictures.

Mr. Newland is married and his wife also is on the stage.

Mr. Newland's younger brother is a rural mail carrier out of Colchester.

Local Busybodies

Scranton, Pa.

EDITOR PHOTOPLAY MAGAZINE,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Not many weeks ago I picked up the Sunday paper and, in looking over the theatrical news, I saw that D. W. Griffith's picture, "The White Rose," was to be shown at the Blank Theater for the entire following week. Right then I made up my mind to see it. The next day I happened to be in the vicinity of the theater so I went in and had a pleasant afternoon.

On the following Thursday I again looked through the theatrical notices; the theaters usually change their programs on Thursday and, to my utter amazement, I saw that the bill had been changed at the Blank Theater. The new picture announced for the balance of the week was "Strangers of the Night." Upon making inquiries among my friends, managers of other theaters, I was told that a few of the local ministers had protested because the picture was about a young theological student who went wrong.

My idea in writing this letter is to know if we are going to continue allowing local busybodies to run our picture houses to suit themselves. It seems to me that when a picture passes both the national and state board of censors it should be enough of a recommendation. I would like to hear from other readers of PHOTOPLAY in regard to this indiscriminate censoring of pictures.

"ANTHROCITE."

Chicago (Ill) Photoplay Magazine Feb 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH has captured Barrymore Lionel, no less—to play an important part in his production of "America." This is Lionel's first appearance with D. W. for ten whole years—for he began his screen career in Griffith's stock company.

The rôle for which he has been cast is an unpleasant one—to say the least. For he will play the part of Walter Butler, who, in the pre-revolutionary days (and, for that matter, during the revolution) led a band of Indians in a guerilla warfare against his own people. He, himself, was known as the "blue eyed Indian" and he was responsible for many brutal massacres—especially is he remembered for the bloody affair of Cherry Valley. Cultured, ruthless, a renegade from society, a traitor and an arch-villain—this is the part for which Lionel Barrymore has been selected. And, if we're any judge of good casting, he'll do a splendid bit of work.

same

AND now Griffith is a Colonel. Not just "D. W." any more—Colonel D. W., if you please. He has given this rank at the request of the "Daughters of the American Revolution," in recognition of his splendid work in bettering the average of the silver sheet. The Daughters, we believe, especially mentioned "The Birth of a Nation" and Griffith's forthcoming "America" in their petition. Said petition was granted by the governor of a state. Try and guess which state! Kentucky, of course!

Cleveland (O) Press 1/16/24

"America"

"America," D. W. Griffith's new movie, a historical piece, will have its first presentation in New York on Washington's Birthday, Feb. 22.

Maurice Henle writes, "That reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the actors in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"'They gave me a three cornered hat,' he mused, chuckling, 'and a gun of the vintage of '76.

"'It sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends of the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it, a wig with a tail that stuck out.

"'They told me I was supposed to be a general. 'Of what?' I asked. 'A general of parts,' they said, 'and you look as if most of the parts were lost.'"

Brockton (Mass) Enterprise Jan 19 1924

To Play Washington

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than 100 actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first president.

South Bend (Ind) News-Times 1/13/24

THINK "AMERICA" MAY BIND PUBLIC CLOSELY TO FILM

D. W. Griffith to Immortalize the War For American Independence.

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, Jan. 12.—Unless all signs fail, two more genuine contributions are about to be made to the motion picture screen. A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation." Latter Paramount let loose a broadside with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same men—Griffith and Paramount—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame. Paramount's "The Ten Commandments" is to come on its pedestal, and repeat the startling success of "The Covered Wagon" when it will be seen. And in the early spring Griffith will give us the photo play "America," now being filmed.

[illegible]

Springfield (Mass) Leader 1/15/24

NEW YORK, Jan. 15.—On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for D. W. Griffith, will have its premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York.

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battle around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76. As a long barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends of the rainbow in a wrestling match, and would you believe it—a wig with a tail that gave chasing in the tail of it to make it stand out.

[illegible]

Bethlehem (Pa) Times 1/16/24

DEWEY TO PORTRAY ROLE OF WASHINGTON

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in persons, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their images with pictures and statues of the first President.

Although some historical authorities claim that the Father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order signed by Washington in his letters in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey can exactly fit that.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the 18th century migrated from England. Here, in the Middle West, living in Illinois, one of his ancestors, Admiral Dewey, appeared. Paul Revere's ancestors, and Joseph Warren's in Massachusetts.

Dewey is starring in some of the Hartford Courant

DEWEY CHOSEN FOR WASHINGTON ROLE

Will Portray Character in Griffith's New Photodrama "America"

Manchester (N.H.) Mirror 1/19/24

On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21st, "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-Fourth street theatre, New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the Revolutionary war with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

Portland (Ore) Oregonian 1/20/24

Providence (R.I.) News 1/21/24

MRS. F. H. HAMMILL TO BE SEEN IN FILM "AMERICA"

Mrs. Frank H. Hammill, wife of Judge Hammill of Bristol, is among the prominent women who will be seen in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Grifith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mrs. Hammill visited the Griffith studios at Mamaroneck, N. Y., as the guest of Miss Gladys Lloyd, and was invited to take part in the big scene then being filmed.

The scene was laid in the palace of King George Third, and showed a formal court reception. Mrs. Hammill, accordingly, donned the costume of a court dame of the period and with several hundred others went through the ceremony of being presented at court.

The ceremony was personally directed by Sir Percy Sykes of London, Eng., a veteran in court presentations, who aided Griffith in drilling the actors for this particular scene.

"America" will have its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth street Theatre, New York, on the eve of Washington's Birthday, Feb. 21.

South Bend (Ind) Times 1/23/24

THINK "AMERICA" MAY BIND PUBLIC CLOSELY TO FILM

D. W. Griffith to Immortalize the War For American Independence.

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, Jan. 12.—Unless all signs fail, two more genuine contributions are about to be made to the motion picture screen. A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation." Latter Paramount let loose a broadside with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same two—Griffith and Paramount—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame. Paramount's "The Ten Commandments," it is lives up to expectations, will repeat the sterling quality of "The Covered Wagon." Chances are it will be better.

And in the early spring Griffith will give up to the public his "America," now being filmed.

* * *

The possibilities for "America" drain the imagination as no other subject possibly can. The film promises to be not only a wonderful lesson in history—and that will be shown to every school-child in the country—but a film that will bind the adult public more closely to the picture world than ever before.

Griffith has everything in his favor to surpass even his own ability. "America" was begun under the inspiration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who urged Griffith to immortalize the war for American independence. Not only the D. A. R., but all big patriotic societies are cooperating with the producer with the enthusiasm of school children in a commencement day play.

Secretary of War Weeks has placed thousands of soldiers at Griffith's command and these troops, in costume, are reenacting the principal battles of the Revolution.

* * *

But this isn't all. In a country-wide search, Griffith and his company are hearing the stories of American heroes, staging scenes on almost every of the glorious years of the war. [illegible] Dewey, [illegible] Washington, [illegible] Revolutionary [illegible] Washington [illegible] Dewey [illegible] Washington [illegible] Dewey [illegible] Washington [illegible] Dewey

66

BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL

Soldiers of the 16th and 18th Infantry Regiments of the famous 1st Division, U. S. Army, reenact historic battle in filming of screen classic.

Eng. Mich. Ardmore 1/17/24

SOLDIERING IS DIFFERENT FOR THE MOVIES NOW

"West of the Water Tower" Is Now on the Bill of Fare

By Maurice Henis.

New York, Jan. 17—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21, 'America,' the photo-drama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battles around Bunker Hill.

"They gave us a three-cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, "and a gun of the vintage of '76, an' a long-barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and, would you believe it—a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out.

* * *

"Here I was after 30 years' service being told by this movie generalissimo that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he comes back, 'an' you look like you lost most of the parts now.'

"He asts me if I knowed what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his features, extended his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill. We were the Britishers and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the Minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rustly flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I confess it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time, and put up some tought fightin'."

* * *

That's that.

Camden (N.J.) Post-Telegram 1/19/24

DEWEY WILL PLAY GEO. WASHINGTON

Well Known Actor Selected for Big Role in Griffith's "America"

IS DESCENDANT OF HISTORICAL FAMILY

Before the final selection was made, Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first President.

Although some historical authorities claim that the Father of his Country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Griffin, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington Green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long stage experience, was found to be deeply versed in American history, since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine appearance and a knowledge of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate detail of his life, habits, and customs. Dewey was also fortunate in that he is the only living Washington so in being the one.

Seattle (Wash) Times 1/18/24

Sacramento (Cal) Bee 1/19/24

Lexington (Ky) Leader Jan 20/24

New Britain (Conn) Herald 1/26/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald Jan 22 1924

NEW YORK STARTS NEW YEAR WITH A BIG PICTURE BUSINESS

Hartford (Conn) Times 1/19/24

Hartford (Conn) Times 1/18/24

Springfield (Mass) Union 1/21/24

Chicago (Ill) Post Jan 26 1924

Manchester (N.H.) Union American Jan 21 1924

Brooklyn (Mass) Eagle Jan 26 1924

Washington (D.C.) Star Jan 27 1924

Baltimore Sun Jan 27 1924

Baltimore (Md) American Jan 27 1924

Chicago (Ill) Herald 1/16/24

Green Mirror (Mpls) 1/26/24 Des Moines (Iowa) Capital 1/27/24 Nashville (Tenn) Banner Jan 27 1924

67 18 YD

D. W. Griffith, famous director, was in Florida recently, and simply couldn't resist the temptation to play about with a large alligator. Most visitors try it, so "D. W." said: "Trot out a big fellow for me!" It seems a simple thing to hold these big jaws shut.

"AMERICA" PREMIER NEW YORK FEB. 21

Celebrate Sesqui-Centennial of Revolution

ON the eve of Washington's birthday, February 21st, "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, being made for the Daughters of the American revolution by D. W. Griffith, will have its public premiere at the Forty-fourth street theater New York.

The D. A. R., anxious to celebrate the sesqui-centennial of the beginning of the revolutionary war with an appropriate screen production, requested Griffith to film a drama which would include the leading battles of this country's struggle for freedom. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers, and Griffith and a large force of players, technicians, and historical experts have been at work on the film for months.

The eminent historical and patriotic authorities connected with the production recently voiced the wish that the 1924 celebration of the birhtday of George Washington be celebrated by the public presentation of "America," and to accomplish this Griffith and his players redoubled their efforts, working day and night, Sundays and holidays to finish the picture.

Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary days has a part in the drama, the filming of which necessitated Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on special trains to take scenes

The famous Third U. S. Cavalry, led by the personal aide of Sec. of War Weeks, reproducing Morgan's raid for scenes in D. W. Griffith's "America."

67

Toledo (Ohio) News Bee 1/27/24 Detroit Mich News 1/27/24 Kalamazoo Mich Gazette Jan 28 1924 Syracuse (NY) American 1/27/24 Saginaw Mich News Courier Jan 10 1924 Lansing (Mich) Journal 1/8/24 Aurora (Ill) Beacon News Jan 12 1924 Springfield (Ill) Journal 1/13/24 Terre Haute (Ind) Star 1/20/24 Goldsboro (NC) Daily Argus Jan 24 1924 Cleveland Plain Dealer Jan 27 1924 Cleveland Press Jan 25 1924 Indianapolis (Ind) Times 1/24/24 Cleveland Press Jan 25 1924 Cleveland Plain Dealer Jan 27 1924 Cleveland Press Jan 25 1924 Indianapolis (Ind) Times 1/24/24

Middletown (Ohio) Journal Jan 30 1924

ARTHUR DEWEY TO PORTRAY ROLE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Long Search Ends In Choice For Griffith's "America" Role

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first president.

Although some historical authorities claim that the Father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington Green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long stage experience, was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Washington—he is living the part.

South Bend (Ind) News Times 1/20/24

MOVIE SOLDIERING IS DIFFERENT FOR HARD-BOILED BUCK

D. W. Griffith's "America" to Have Premiere on Eve of Washington's Birthday.

By MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Jan. 19.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, 'America,' the photodrama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the 44th Street theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battle around Bunker Hill.

"They gave me a three cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and would you believe it, a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out."

"Here I was after 30 years service being told by ythis movie generalissimo, that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he came back, 'an' yo ulook like you lost most of the parts now.'

He ast me if I knew what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I connness it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Easton (Pa) Free Press 1/27/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE TO STAR IN "AMERICA"

Lionel Barrymore, in addition to his successful starring venture with David Belasco, has been engaged to play the part of Walter Butler in the forthcoming D. W. Griffith production "America."

Mr. Barrymore comes back to Mr. Griffith after an absence of many years. It was some ten years ago in the old Biograph days that Lionel Barrymore became a member of the stock company organized by Griffith, thus beginning his screen career under the Griffith direction. He continued his screen work for several years, when he returned to the stage.

The part for which he has been selected in "America" is one demanding great versatility and force. He will do his screen work daytime and Sundays, keeping his night and matinee engagements at the theatre.

In addition to Barrymore, the cast for "America" now includes Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Erville Alderson, Marie Burke, with many of the important minor roles still to be cast.

Norwalk (Conn) Hour 1/26/24

SOLDIERING IS DIFF HARD-BOILED

By MAURICE HENLE

New York, Jan. 23.—"On the eve of Washington's birthday, Feb. 21, 'America,' the photodrama of the War of Independence being made by D. W. Griffith, will have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York."

That announcement, just made, reminds us of a conversation we had with one of the "actors" in the film. He was a buck private, a hard-boiled member of the Sixteenth Infantry, and he had just returned to the army base at Governor's Island after participating in the filming of scenes of battle around Bunker Hill.

"They gave me a three cornered hat," he mused, chuckling, and a gun of the vintage of '76. An' a long barreled blunderbuss that sounded like a powder house when it went off. I was togged out in a uniform that made me look like two ends o' the rainbow in a wrestling match, and would you believe it, a wig with a tent pole sticking in the tail of it to make it stand out."

"Here I was after 30 years service being told by ythis movie generalissimo, that I didn't know how to drill," he went on complainingly, but still chuckling.

"'You're supposed to be a general,' this Griffith fellow told me.

"'Of what?' I replied.

"'A general of parts,' he came back, 'an' yo ulook like you lost most of the parts now.'

He ast me if I knew what a 'closeup' was. 'Sure,' I answers, 'arms inspection.' And the face he made convinced me I wasn't right.

"Then he wanted Slim Pickerings to register 'amazement.' And Slim bulged out his eyes and looked like a white horse chokin' to death on a hedge-apple. He looked so bad Miss Carol Dempster, the star of the film, screamed and almost fainted.

"Then Bill Gilhooley was told to register 'grief.' He telescoped his mouth, drawed up his chin till his nose hung over and down like a red carrot hanging from a football.

"Well, the time came to lead my men up Bunker Hill and the Eighteenth Infantry was on top of the hill as the minutemen. Everybody was talkin' about 'long shots' as though the old rusty flintlocks they gave us could be shot at long range. I connness it was all Greek to me, but we had a great time and put up some tough fightin'."

That's that.

Lynn (Mass) News 1/26/24

SOCIETIES HELP IN MAKING FILM

"America" Will Be Authentic Reproduction of Early Life In This Country

In an effort to make the picture, "America", which is being made by David Wark Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, an authentic reproduction of the early life in this country, patriotic societies are leaning famous old homes in their possession and priceless relics and antiques from their museums. Wide interest has been aroused in the making of this picture and the historian of the D. A. R., as well as other prominent historians, has aided Griffith in the research work which has occupied months of painstaking effort before actual work was bekun. The government and army are assisting in every day and it seems certainn that there will be a film equal to its great theme and the greatest production yet accomplished by the cinema.

Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, president general of the national society, and many of the national board have witnessed the taking of some of the scenes, as have also representatives of the Sons of the American Revolution, the Lexington Historical society, the Massachusetts Historical society and the Colonial Dames.

Using Historic Places

Traveling with his company, Griffith has visited the principal famous places endeared by great events in American history, using them as settings. From Lexington Common, the Hancock-Clark house and Bunker Hill, he has gone on to Washington, to Richmond, along the James river to the Byrd mansion at Westover and to the Carter estate.

He has transported large bodies of regular trops, loaned by the courtesy of Secretary Weeks, which have taken the parts of King George's redcoats, the minute men of Lexington and Concord, and the blue and buff heroes of Washington's army. The troops have had to be trained in the manual of war of revolutionary times. Several infantry companies from New York have been used to depict the battle of Bunker Hill, while the famous Third Cavalry, led in person by Major Wainwright, have reproduced Morgan's raid.

Use War Relics

Patriotic societies have made it possible thtat the drum actually beaten at Bunker Hill was used again, as well as flintlocks, powder horns, vehicles, farming implements, furniture, and even garments worn during this time of the country. The audience will see not only the exact spot of Concord and Lexington, where the first shot was fired for independence, but some of the old muskets really used at that mementous occurrence. The muskets found on the field of Bunker Hill after the battle, and now in the O. A. R. museum, will be among those used.

Careful Selection

Griffith has spent a great deal of time in selection of a suitable cast. Thousands were interviewed before the ones most fitting for Washington, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Prescott Lee, Dorothy Quincy and others were decided upon. At every spot where scenes are being taken, descendants of revolutionary soldiers have volunteered as "extras" so that when completed, numbers of these in each section of the country will appear upon the screen. Griffith has co-operated with them in every place, himself a descendant of an old Virginia family and a soldier, giving him an added interest and zeal.

It will be many weeks before the picture is completed, but there is no doubt that the public will await with interest the showing of what promises to be a picture of value for all time.

Sioux City Journal 1/27/24

ARTHUR DEWEY TO IMPERSONATE WASHINGTON

Located after a country wide search during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty Fourth Street Theatre, New York, Feb. 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nthersole, Richard Mansfield, and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mulvey, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Hunter, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to gather an important role in "America."

Toledo (Ohio) Blade Jan 26 1924

Duluth (Minn) Herald Jan 31 1924

Lewiston (Me) Journal Jan 31 1924

New Orleans (La) Times-Picayune Jan 31 1924

Kansas City (Mo) Star Jan 31 1924

Peoria (Ill) Journal Jan 31 1924

Bloomington (Ill) Bulletin 1/25/24

Sacramento (Cal) Bee 1/25/24

Screen News 1/26/24

Boston Traveler Jan 28 1924

Green Mirror Cincinnati Feb 2 1924

DEWEY TO PORTRAY ROLE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Located after a country-wide search during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first President.

Although some historical authorities claim that the father of his country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass. to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington Green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long stage experience was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits, and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Wash-ington—he is living the part.

Oklahoma (Okla) Oklahoman 1/27/24

GRIFFITH PICKS 'AMERICA' STAR

George Washington Player Is Chosen After Interviews With Hundred Actors.

Located after a countrywide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first president.

Although some historical authorities claim that the father of his country was more than six feet in height Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the Middle West, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington Green.

Dewey, in addition to being an actor of long stage experience was found to be deeply learned in American history. Since childhood his favorite diversion has been to read and re-read Washington Irving's five volume biography of George Washington. He brought to his role not only a fine, sympathetic understanding of Washington's character, but as well a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits, and costumes. Those close to him declare that he is not merely acting Wash-ington—he is living the part.

Topeka (Kansas) Capital 1/27/24

Portland (Ore) Oregonian 1/27/24

GRIFFITH OBJECTS

Much interest is heard from the D. W. Griffith offices because of the recent statement that "The Covered Wagon" had broken the record of "The Birth of a Nation" on Broadway.

"The Covered Wagon" has now passed its 45th week on Broadway. "The Birth of a Nation" ran 44. But Griffith wants us to know that the seating capacity of the Liberty Theatre, where "The Birth of a Nation" ran, is so much greater than that of the Criterion Theatre that "The Covered Wagon" would have to continue 33 weeks more to equal the actual record of Griffith's old masterpiece!

Another similar report, which has not had so much circulation, was to the effect that "Little Old New York" had broken all records of the Capitol Theatre, in New York, as a money-maker. It was said to have bettered the results of "Robin Hood" and "Rosita." But in figuring up their profit and loss, the Hearst organization had not taken into account their full-page advertising, free of charge, in the Hearst papers! "Robin Hood" and "Rosita" and the rest deducted the costs of such advertising from their totals, but the Cosmopolitan people checked it up in a different way!

Cosmopolitan Cast in Griffith Film.

Many famous players are portraying parts in "America."

Cincinnati Post Feb 1 1924

WHO'S WHO IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S LATEST FILM, 'AMERICA'

Many Favorites in Cast of the Big Patriotic Picture

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty Fourth Street Theatre, New York, Feb. 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nthersole, Richard Mansfield, and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mulvey, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Hunter, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to gather an important role in "America."

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/27/24

Percy Sykes of London, former commander-in-chief of the British forces in Persia and authority in royal court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular [illegible] in "America," the photodrama of the war of independence being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is scheduled to have its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street theater, New York, Feb. 21.

Knoxville (Tenn) Journal & Tribune Jan 27, 1924

Carol Dempster in D. W. Griffith's "America"

Fascinating Carol Dempster, remembered in several outstanding "D. W. Griffith pictures," will be seen this month as the leading woman in Mr. Griffith's epic of Revolutionary days, "America," made for the Daughters of the American Revolution. The premier is scheduled for February 21, in New York City. Miss Dempster is seen here with a few of the feathered players in the new film.

Carol Dempster, leading woman in D. W. Griffith's "America," now being filmed, had a narrow escape from death when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of one of the scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The scene had to be [illegible]

The Club-Fellow of WASHINGTON MIRROR

CAROL DEMPSTER

The Canadian Pacific Feb 1 1924

NEW GRIFFITH PICTURE TO HAVE WORLD PREMIERE

Kansas City Mo Star Jan 27 1924

GRIFFITH IS THE MASTER

Charlotte (N C) Observer Jan 31 1924

Lynn (Mass) Item Jan 28 1924

JASPER JONES IN THE MOVIES

By Barney G.

69

Expert On Court Etiquette Is Engaged by Griffith

Sir Percy Sykes, London, Eng., formerly chief in command of the British military forces in Persia, and authority on British royal court etiquette, has aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which Mr. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, and which is scheduled to have its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre, New York city, February 21, the eve of Washington's Birthday.

M.P. Exhibitors Trade Review Feb 6 1924

D.W. GRIFFITH deserves credit for realism. According to the cast of his "America" is Arthur Dewey said to be a descendant of a Revolutionary family. And not only that, but one of his ancestors is reported to have fought in the Battle of Lexington. Which adds the last touch in making the picture a [illegible]

San Francisco (Cal) Call Post 1/26/24

HOLLYWOOD, Jan. 26.—Plans to pay annual tribute to David Wark Griffith, "master director" of the films, are under way.

They will first take the form of an organization, the D. W. Griffith Alumni club.

Blanche Sweet and Carmel Myers are the originators of the idea, which has met with enthusiastic response in all directions.

Among the Griffith "alumni" who have responded are: Mary Pickford, the Talmadge sisters, Henry Walthall, Spottiswood Aitken, George Siegmann, Ralph Lewis, Raoul Walsh, George Walsh, the Gish sisters, Colleen Moore and Bessie Love.

There are but a fraction of the number whom Griffith picked, with unerring eye, for their screen aptitude.

Not a few were taken out of the ranks of extras and have held a foremost place for years despite all competition since the days of the old Biograph, in which "the master" pioneered.

One of the purposes of the club is to inaugurate a yearly Griffith day on which the industry will do homage to the director.

Bakersfield (Calif) Spotlight Review Jan 27 1924

"Shooting the Revolution.

D. W. Griffith is having all kinds of a time in fighting the American revolution with a camera. First, the fact that nobody in the research department of the studios could find out the color of Paul Revere's horse stopped the shooting. Nobody ever did find out.

But they ordered up a horse from New York to Boston—nobody knows why, as horses have been seen in Boston—but the fact remains they did. And for some reason—nobody knows why—the horse came to Boston via an ocean voyage. The trip affected the horse in the same manner a rolling ocean affects almost anybody with a stomach, only as a horse's stomach is twice as large as a human's, the poor beast felt twice as bad.

The lanterns were hung in the old North chapel, the crowds gathered, Paul Revere was ready to make the dash and the poor horse had to beg off. We told you this a long time ago.

But now the shooting has again come to a standstill. Mr. Griffith can not find a George III. If you look anything like the Hanoverian king notify Mr. Griffith at once. Up to last week the director had made camera tests of 20 men, who admitted they looked like the dead king. Every one was rejected. The supply of material has given out. And there sits the distraught director, the release date for his "America" set for February 1 and no king.

Another disaster was encountered. Washington does not cross the Delaware in this "America." The picture general could not. The east has had summer all winter, and as no eastern state boasted a river that could "supe" for the Deleware the Delaware will not be [illegible]

Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 1/30/24

Spokesman Review Herald 1/30/24

Tribune 1/31/24

Feb 2 1924

Movie Plays and Players

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the 44th Street Theatre, New York, Feb. 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nethersole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mainidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America."

M.P. Classic Brooklyn (N.Y.) March 1924

Battle Creek (Mich) Eve News 1/23/24

WHO'S WHO IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S LATEST FILM, 'AMERICA'

Many Favorites in Cast of the Big Patriotic Picture

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty Fourth Street Theatre, New York, Feb. 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nethersole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mainidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America."

Moline (Ill) Dispatch 1/18/24

Waiting [illegible]

The unusual winter has hit the movies hard. Companies planning to take snow and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow. D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the War of Independence, America, perhaps the biggest of all the many pictures waiting on the weatherman, is reported to be one of the hardest hit of all. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware river, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that ice bound stream. He expects to go to Canada in the hope of finding a similar stream where all feature a shortage of frozen lakes, but the river had but a thin coating of ice, and in many cases ducks of wild ducks were still making their home there. Which caused Griffith to redouble his prayers for more data cold at Valley Forge.

Lupino

Lynn (Mass) Telegram Dec 21 1924

FROM "SPEAKIES" TO THE "MOVIES"

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre, New York, February 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nethersole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mainidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America."

Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph 1/31/24

MANY PROMINENT ACTORS IN FILM

D. W. Griffith to Present Number of Celebrated Stars in Picture "America"

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre, New York, February 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Nethersole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Mainidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America."

Bangor (Maine) Commercial 1/27/24

Horse Falls, Hurts Star in 'America'

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman in "America," the film romance of America's struggle for liberty, which D. W. Griffith is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, was painfully injured when she was thrown from a horse in one of the outdoor scenes for the picture at Mamaroneck, N. Y., where Griffith's studios are located. Her mount slipped in the mud.

Griffith and others rushed to her aid. A physician, hastily summoned, found she was suffering from a badly wrenched shoulder and a slightly sprained angle, not serious, although painful injuries. Her costume was ruined, and she was much shaken up. It was necessary for her to withdraw from the filming for several days. She has now completely recovered.

Parkersburg (W Va) News 1/27/24

Arthur Donaldson has been selected by D. W. Griffith to play George Washington in "America." Mr. Griffith examined thousands of photographs and interviewed hundreds of actors before reaching a decision.

Bangor Telegram Jan 31 1924

Scranton (Pa) Republican 1/31/24

NEW D. A. R. MOVIE

Will Have Its Premiere in New York on Feb. 21.

Our Movie Fans

Lynn (Mass) Item 1/31/24

Tribune 1/27/24

Feb 3 1924

Actor Found For Part As Washington

Indianapolis (Ind) Dispatch Jan 26 1924

Dewey Good Role Of Washington in Griffith's America

Lynn Telegram 1/18/24

GRIFFITH'S $1.50 TOP AT 44TH ST. FOR 'AMERICA'

Proceeds of Pict[illegible] Also Starred [illegible]

Illinois Boy is Chosen to Impersonate Washington

Macomb (Ill) Daily Journal 1/26/24

PLAYS IN NOTED FILM PICTURE

FORMER COLCHESTER BOY PLAYS PART OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

STAGE NAME IS DEWEY

Newland's Wife is Also on The Stage—Son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland of Colchester.

Added interest to the great motion picture production "America" is given in this locality in the fact that Arthur Newland, a native of Colchester, McDonough county, has been chosen by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray "George Washington." His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland, have been residents of Colchester many years, and his father held the office of post master there for 28 years. He was born in Colchester 45 years ago and received his education in the schools there. He left Colchester in 1907, to go on the stage, and his last visit there was three years ago in June.

His stage name is Arthur Dewey, and he was chosen from among more than 100 applicants, including many noted stars, for the role of the Father of his Country because of his striking physical resemblance to the first President. He is exactly six feet tall, and Washington in his letters to his London tailor described himself as that height.

Griffith is filming the photodrama of the War of Independence under the title of "America" for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Most of those appearing in the cast are descendants of Revolutionary families, and one of the ancestors of Arthur Newland was Ashabel Smith, who answered the summons of Paul Revere. Newland, besides being a successful actor, has made a deep study of American history, and brings to the role a sympathetic understanding of Washington's character and a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits and costumes. It is said he is not merely acting Washington — he is living the role.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with Kibble & Martin, and has since been in a number of motion pictures.

Mr. Newland is married and his wife also is on the stage.

Mr. Newland's youngest brother is a rural carrier out of Colchester.

Denver (Colo) News 1/27/24

ACTOR TO PORTRAY WASHINGTON IN BIG PLAY IS SELECTED

Arthur Dewey Looks Part, in Height Height and Has Studied History.

(D)

Jan 26 Peoria (Ill) Journal 1/26/24 Lewistown (Ill) Record 1/26/24 Toledo (Ohio) Times 1/22/24

ARTHUR NEWLAND, COLCHESTER, ILLINOIS.

COLCHESTER BOY IN THE MOVIES

STARS AS GEORGE WASHINGTON IN THE Historical Play Produced by D. W. Griffith—Chosen from Hundred Applicants for the Part.

Arthur Newland, born and reared in Colchester, has been selected to play the leading role in a new historical picture, "America" produced by D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost motion picture prducers of the present time. Newland who goes under the stage name of Arthur Dewey, will play the part of George Washington.

Resembles Washington.

Local people, who knew Newland, recall his striking resemblance to America's first great leader. Newland is six feet tall and has a remarkable facial resemblance to Washington. He has been a close student of history and is said to actually live the part.

Newland was born in Colchester forty-five years ago and is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland, long time residents of McDonough county and Colchester. The father was postmaster in his home city for almost thirty years. Arthur Newland was educated in the Colchester High school and left there to go on the stage in 1907. As an actor he has made a brilliant record and his work in his latest picture promises to place him among the immortals of the screen.

The picture, "America," in which the Colchester man is starred is now being filmed by Mr. Griffith for the Daughters of the Revolution.

Dewey was chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage.

In "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the battle of Lexington.

Quincy (Ill) Herald 1/26/24

Native of Colchester, Ill., Stars In Historical Film

Arthur Newland in a characteristic pose as George Washington in the picture "America."

Arthur Newland, born and reared in Colchester, McDonough county, Illinois, who recently has been selected to play the leading role in a new historical picture, "America," produced by D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost motion picture producers of the present time. Newland who goes under the stage name of Arthur Dewey, will play the part of George Washington.

Resembles Washington.

Local people, who knew Newland, recall his striking resemblance to America's first great leader. Newland is six feet tall and has a remarkable facial resemblance to Washington. He has been a close student of history and is said to actually live the part.

Newland was born in Colchester forty-five years ago and is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland, long time residents of McDonough county and Colchester. The father was postmaster in his home city for almost thirty years. Arthur Newland was educated in the Colchester High school and left there to go on the stage in 1907. As an actor he has made a brilliant record and his work in his latest picture promises to place him among the immortals of the screen.

The picture, "America," in which the Colchester man is starred is now being filmed by Mr. Griffith for the Daughters of the Revolution.

Dewey was chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage.

In "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the battle of Lexington.

Colchester Ill. Boy Given Big Part in Griffith Movie

Arthur Dewey of Colchester, Ill., has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatergoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the battle of Lexington.

Arthur Dewey as Geo. Washington in D. W. Griffith's "America"

Illinois boy selected as "George Washington" for D. W. Griffith's "America". Photo-drama of the Revolution.

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

MUCH TO INTEREST SCOUTS IN NEW FILM

Boy Scouts will be interested in a new film being made by David Mark Griffith. It is to be a story of the War of Independence and will be called "America". Government officials, the United States army, prominent historians, patriotic societies and descendants of Revolutionary families are helping in every way to make the film true to history.

Not only have historical experts aided in the great amount of research work necessary for such an undertaking but societies have placed at Griffith's disposal the old homes, relics and antiques made famous during the revolution. Therefore when we see the drum which Miss Irma Harrison uses in the film, we shall know that it is the actual drum used in the battle of Lexington. Some of the actors will wear clothes actually worn during the war.

"America" the story of the American Revolution, of the high ideals which swayed the founders of the United States, of the sublime courage with which they worked to achieve their ideals, has long been Griffith's dream.

Scouts, you will surely want to see this wonderful production which we hope will be shown in Toledo sime time in the future.

For this account we are indebted to the Daughters of the American Revolution who have made headquarters a present of their magazine. Scouts, come up to the office and read the many interesting accounts. The magazine comes once a month.

Saginaw (Mich) News-Courier 1/27/24

Griffith Has Trouble With British History Details

NEW WYORK, Jan. 26.—For the filming of "America," the photodrama of the War of American Independence which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, D. W. Griffith and his specially organized research bureau not only had to search deeply through American history, but English history as well.

And Mr. Griffith and his research staff found that, sparse as was the information to be gleaned on certain disputed points of revolutionary history, it was voluminous when compared with existing data on the etiquette and procedure obtaining at the royal court of King George III.

For of all the hosts of worthies who wrote proudly of their presentation at court or described the magnificence of such functions, not one had the foresight to realize that Mr. Griffith in filming his "America" 150 years later would need very exact notations of the prevailing niceties of bowing, speech and conduct of such social affairs.

Hence, on the his account, Mr. Griffith's new film, which is to have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, Washington's Birthday Eve, Feb. 21, are laid in London. There is one of the House of Lords, another in the King's throne room and another showing the presentation to the august monarch of Miss Nancy Montague, played by Miss Carol Dempster, and of Walter Butler, played by Lionel Barrymore.

Existent pictures, gathered after much trans-Atlantic cabling and a voyage or two, made plain the appearance of the chambers and of the gorgeous costumes. But a picture cannot tell the minute details of proper conduct. The very industrious scribes of the period either knew not, or knowing thought the subject unworthy of their busy pens—and the publishers of the wide variety of present day book and correspondence courses in what and what not to do had not been born.

To add to the misery of Griffith and his forces, not a man could they find whose surnomy and scrupulest form resembled that of the Kings who made log intimous.

And this ,as though many and great enough obstacles had not already been surmounted—the solving of the problem of the color of Paul Revere's horse, of the riddle of how many buttons there were on the uniforms of the Continental Army, or finding an actor who looked like George Washington and had enough idealism to give feeling to the role and so on ad infinitum.

Finds Ideal King George.

Then suddenly and unexpectedly came the solution of both problems. First, a foreign actor of long experience presented himself at the studio. Griffith didn't need to take a second look. Here was King George III, in person or at least his direct descendant several generations removed. The resemblance between this actor's visage and the best authenticated portraits of the monarch was so great that for a fleeting second Griffith wondered if he was "seeing things."

And hardly had this lucky happening happened, than along came a distinguished visitor, Sir Percy Sykes of London, England. Sir Sykes Griffith happened to tell chance Griffith happened to tell him of the difficulties in learning the etiquet of the Court of George Third.

Whereupon it developed that not only was Sir Percy intimately familiar with proper etiquet of the English Royal Court, but as well with that of Persia, India and numerous other lands, to say nothing of that of King George Third himself. Furthermore, he would be pleased to place his knowledge at the disposal of Mr. Griffith; yes, and even to aid in staging the formal presentation of Miss Dempster and Mr. Barrymore and several others to the reincarnation of the King.

As a matter of fact, it seemed, there has not been such a wonderful change in the thing, you know. You bow twice nowadays, whereas old George demanded three bows; you bend your knees a bit differently and so on. But on the whole, it's much the same.

Terre Haute Tribune 1/28/24

Carol Dempster, leading [illegible] Griffith's "America," now [illegible] had a narrow escape from [illegible] death when she was thrown from [illegible] horse during the filming of one of the [illegible] scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The injuries are to be refilmed.

New York states is "all set" to behead about a repeal of its censorship law. Will Hays, head of the picture industry, is leading the campaign. Governor [illegible] had this to say of censorship recently: "The criminal law prohibits the publication of indecent and obscene literature and the commission of such acts. Since interference with literary or artistic productions beyond this prohibition of the criminal law is contrary to the [illegible]

Bloomington (Ill) Bulletin 1/27/24

Colchester, Ill. Boy Given Big Part in Griffith Movie

Brooklyn (N.Y.) Eagle 1/27/24

Hartford (Conn) Times 2/1/24

PROMINENT ACTORS ADDED TO "AMERICA"

Newark (N.J.) News 2/2/1924

Atlanta (Ga) Journal 1/29/24

Atlanta (Ga) Journal 1/29/24

Springfield (Ill) Regt 1/27/24

FORMER COLCHESTER BOY PICKED FOR PART OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

ARTHUR DEWEY

Arthur Dewey, a native of Colchester, Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Bloomington (Ill) Bul 1/27/24

Danville (Ill) Cour-News Jan 28 1924

ILLINOIS BOY TO STAR IN GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"

Arthur Dewey, as George Washington

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

Olney (Ill) Mail Jan 28 1924

Nat Stk Yds (Ill) Nat Live Stk Rep Jan 29 1924

ILLINOIS BOY SELECTED AS "GEORGE WASHINGTON"

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, wellk nown throughout thiss tate as an actor, has been- selcted by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including an umber of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance ofthe first President, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

Rockford (Ill) Republic 1/29/24

Camden (N J) Post Telegram 1/2/24

STAR PLAYERS IN CAST OF 'AMERICA'

Griffith Picture Will Have Its Premiers in New York February 21

LIONEL BARRYMORE HAS IMPORTANT PART

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesqui-centennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York, February 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star to-day, is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead," with Lionel Barrymore, Olga Nethersole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Malaidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charlesh Benesch, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer and returned to portray an important role in "America."

Watertown (Conn) Dem 1/2/24

Colchester, Ill. Boy Given Big Part in Griffith Movie

Arthur Dewey of Colchester, Ill., has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

DeKalb (Ill) Independent January 28 1924

ILLINOIS BOY SELECTED AS "GEORGE WASHINGTON" FOR GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" PHOTODRAMA OF REVOLUTION

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph 1/29/24

FIRST PRESIDENT

ARTHUR DEWEY.

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in America, the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatregoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

Paxton (Ill) Record January 29 1924

Norwalk (Conn) Hour Feb 2 1924

Arthur Dewey in D. W. Griffith's spectacle "AMERICA," to be shown in the New Gorkin Theatre soon.

MOVIELAND NEWS NOTES

Arthur Dewey in "America" by D. W. Griffith, now showing at the Gorkin Theatre.

Elmira (N.Y.) Advertiser Feb 2 1924

THE NEW WAY OF STUDYING HISTORY—Is to see it. Schoolboys are expected to be unanimously in favor of discontinuing the old method. Here, for instance, is the Battle of Bunker Hill, as it will be shown on the screen in "America," a pictorial history being made by D. W. Griffith on the actual scenes of revolutionary battles and events in the east.

So Norwalk (Conn) Sentinel 2/2/24

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country wide sesqui-centennial celebration of the freedom of this country. When "America" has its world premiere on Feb. 21, theatre lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well-known players in "America" are: Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist, and actor, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it. Rilley Hatch, concert singer and actor, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck." Arthur Donaldson who created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company in the United States. Erville Alderson, Sydney Dean, Edwin Holland, James Clarence Malaldy and Charles Bennett.

Boston (Mass) Post 2/4/24

College Girl in Cast of "America"

Miss Smita Grat, a graduate of the Emerson College of Oratory has been given the role of grande dame of the court of King George III. in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo drama of the War of Independence, which he is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Paris (Ill) Gazette Jan 30 1924

FAMOUS ACTOR

Filming Production For Daughters of American Revolution.

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblence to the first President, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey, when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatre-goers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

Boston (Mass) Advertiser 2/2/24

STARS IN COURSES ARE AT WAR WITH GRIFFITH

Even a cinema wizard can't command the elements. D. W. Griffith, whose magic hand is now applying itself to the production of "America," film of our good revolution, simply can't get winter to do its stuff so he can photograph the crossing of the Delaware, etc.

The gale which tore the Shenandoah loose from its moorings also acted up for the inconvenience of Griffith at his Mamaroneck, N. Y., studio, blowing half of the exteriors for "America" into Long Island Sound.

Jacksonville (Ill) Democrat Jan. 31 1924

Chicago (Ill) Journal 2/2/24

Arthur Dewe as George Washington in D. W. Griffith's "AMERICA"

By VIRGINIA DALE

"THE Birth of a Nation" finds exhibition again after nine years; it is not long since its initial showing. The interest attending it now is as keen, if not keener, than when it first thrilled and astonished and made history in the cinematic world. Griffith, its producer, is the real pathfinder in the photoplay field. He made his name a synonym of greatness when it seemed impossible that anything greater than pettiness could come into the nickelodeons.

Following the immensity of "The Birth of a Nation" everyone wondered what Griffith would do next. They told in breathless wonder of his invention of the close-up, of his hundreds of mummers on horseback, of his "making" of players into stars. Mechanically, artistically, he was the man of the hour. The fine thing is that he has remained so.

Every player who was importantly cast in this first great spectacle has "made through" to brave triumphs. Many who were given "bits" rose to stellar fame. There you have Griffith's discernment. In practically every succeding photodrama he has brought out some new pictorial effect. There you have his mechanical versatility. And his stories have been varied and widely imagined, but always touched off by the lightning sureness of his genius.

I am not afraid that after nine years of progress "The Birth of a Nation" is going to seem small beer. I've as much faith it is going to amuse and intrigue as any other certain masterpiece which the passage of time can not corrode. I've a great desire to say "Much obliged" to the gentleman who [illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times Feb 3 1924

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which D. W. Griffith is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere in New York, February 21, patrons will find, in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" follow:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Rilley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney-at-law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Dean, another musical comedy star today is as well known in film form as a few years ago he was in light opera circles.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Otto Kruger, Richard Bennett and many other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Malaldy, another star veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who broke his ankle with Bryan Hours, and the result is [illegible]

Sioux City (Iowa) Journal 2/3/24

Old Court Etiquette Revived for Picture

Sir Percy Sykes, of London, former commander in chief of the British forces in Persia, and authority in royal court etiquet, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photodrama of the war of independence, being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is scheduled to have its world premier at the Forty-Fourth Street theater, New York, February 21.

Until Sir Percy, who has been thrice presented at the court of St. James, as well as at the royal courts of India, Persia and other eastern countries, volunteered, Griffith and his research workers were at a loss to learn the details of court ceremonies in 1775, for despite the voluminous writings of the diarists of that period, none of them described formal court etiquette in detail.

Just prior to Sir Percy's arrival, Griffith, after months of search, had engaged a foreign actor who bore an uncanny resemblance to the most authenticated picture of King George Third for that role.

My Herald Feb 3 1924

Far from gentle reader of these columns confesses that he is sick to death of letters from Egyptologists and wants to know why I don't publish a little live news for a change.

And so, being devoted to a life of service, I submit herewith the latest gossip as I have gleaned it from press agents and other unreliable sources:

D. W. Griffith's new picture, "America," will open at the Forty-fourth Street Theater on February 21. . . . Anita Stewart, who is appearing in "The Great White Way" at the Cosmopolitan, is very fond of flowers. "Sincerity will make or break a picture," says Finis Fox, who is now directing "A Woman Who Sinned." William Clifford has abandoned his career on the speaking stage and will return to the screen. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Pat O'Malley are planning a trip to Ireland next summer. . . . Jackie Coogan will not go out on location for his new film, "A Boy of Flanders."

St Louis (Mo) Post Dispatch Feb 3 1924

Sir Percy Sykes, former Commander in Chief of the British forces in Persia, was able to give some advice to D. W. Griffith in staging scenes of "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which will be presented at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York.

Rochester (N.Y.) American Feb 3 1924

Expert on Court Etiquette Helps Griffith in Play

SIR PERCY SYKES of London, former commander-in-chief of the British forces in Persia, who is an authority on court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Boston (Mass) Morning Globe Feb 2 1924

Even a Villain Has a Heart

HE was dressed in a well-cut gray suit, a brick-red tie, a blue and white striped shirt with a soft collar of the same material, and he appeared in deep thought as he smoked his cigarette, back of a set in D. W. Griffith's studio. His eyes were brown and clear, his hair combed back, and his voice was soft and smooth. This is a partially accurate description of Louis Wolheim, villain par excellence, who made a great success in "The Hairy Ape," and who has been seen in many movies as an out and out blackguard. He is never wanted for any other type of character, largely because of his nose, which was battered in a football accident before he went to Cornell. He played for that university, as it was realized that not only his weight and strength would be useful, but also the idea that his looks would help. He has just finished work on "The Uninvited Guest," which J. Ernest Williamson made in the Bahamas, and he is now playing the part of Captain Hare in Griffith's "America." Incidentally he was the super-heavy in "Unseeing Eyes," a man who could not look at another man without coming to grips or putting a bullet through the victim. But once Wolheim leaves the stage at the studio, he forgets all about his murderous conduct, and is a kindly person, whose voice causes one to forget the scarred and battered nose.

For some time Mr. Wolheim worked in serials, until one day Lionel Barrymore wanted him to play in "The Jest." Prior to that he had never been on the stage. The part awarded him was Gabrielle.

"When I began," said Mr. Wolheim, "I discovered that I could not speak above a whisper. I did not like the stage then, and finding that I interfered with my movie work I asked to be released. They made fun of me at first, but I must admit that I was glad to be out of it. Then I saw Lionel Barrymore later and he told me that he became so carried on the stage by four or five actors and that there was nothing to do but grin and laugh enough to fill the bill. So I told him that if he wanted action and roughness I could give him that without the ordeal of a rehearsal. I did it, and therefore my first real premiere before an audience was as a villain.

The Success Villain.

"The first season when I had managed to get out to play the role of a villain, I did not look after the rehearsal I felt certain and wondered why I was not satisfied with the work I did in the course."

Speaking of work in the movies as a whole, Mr. Wolheim declared that he had been caught in the rapid development of the industry.

"In general it is a case of the movies catching up to the actors," he said. "Actors who were good in the silent drama have found difficulty in the talking drama. Many of them have been unable to get the voice and diction of the character."

Luck Rescues Movie Producer

Toronto Star

Griffith's Difficulties in Filming Historical Picture Solved by Chance

FOR the filming of "America," the photo-drama of the War of American Independence which he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution, D. W. Griffith and his research bureau had to search American history and English history as well.

And Mr. Griffith and his research staff found that, sparse as was the information to be gleaned on certain disputed points of revolutionary history, it was voluminous when compared with existing data on the etiquet and procedure obtaining at the royal court of King George III.

For of all the hosts of worthies who wrote proudly of their presentation at court or described the magnificence of such functions, not one had the foresight to realize that Mr. Griffith, in filming "America," 150 years later, would need very exact notations of the prevailing niceties of bearing, speech and conduct of such social affairs.

Several of the scenes in Griffith's new film are laid in London. There is one of the House of Lords, another in the King's throne room and another showing the presentation to George III. of Miss Nancy Montague, played by Miss Carol Dempster, and of Walter Butler, played by Lionel Barrymore.

Existent pictures, gathered after much trans-Atlantic cabling and a voyage or two, made plain the appearance of the chambers noted and of the gorgeous costumes. But a picture cannot tell the minute details of proper conduct. The very industrious scribes of the period either knew not, or knowing, thought the subject unworthy of their heavy pens—and the publishers of the wide variety of present day book and correspondence courses in what and what not to do had not been born.

To add to the misery of Griffith and his forces, not a man could they find who remembered George III.

Their suddenly and unexpectedly upon the solution of such problems. First, an English actor of experience presented himself. Of the usual English dight had to take a second look. There was King George III. in person.

And hardly had this lucky happening happened than some years in the Hyphated nation, Sir Percy Sykes of Lockhart Bramard, by chance, happened to be on the scene of the problem in solving the problem of the court of King George.

Whereupon it happened that one day Sir Percy Sykes and Mr. Griffith were in the Griffith court room, Sir Percy Sykes, the Griffith court room, and Mr. Griffith, the Griffith court room, and Mr. Griffith, the Griffith court room, and Mr. Griffith

Washington (D.C.) Star Feb 1 1924 73

FIRST PHOTOGRAPH OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL. This particular conflict, one of the big points in early American history, is herewith pictured for the first time. Of course, the photograph is a new one, and the battle is D. W. Griffith's version of the affair. It is a scene in the new photoplay, "America." Many of the scenes for the picture were taken in the neighborhood of Washington, showing stirring events when the thirteen colonies were struggling for life. Wide World Photo.

Binghamton (N.Y.) Press, Feb. 2, 1924

THE NEW WAY OF STUDYING HISTORY—Is to see it. Schoolboys are expected to be unanimously in favor of discontinuing the old method. Here, for instance, is the Battle of Bunker Hill, as it will be shown on the screen in "America," a pictorial history being made by D. W. Griffith on the actual scenes of revolutionary battles and events in

Chicago

THE DAILY NEWS, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1924. Chicago (Ill)

Bleak Days at Valley Forge. The Scene as Gen. George Washington Cheered His Despairing Continentals, from New Film "America," by David Wark Griffith.

Clarksburg (W.Va) Telegram Feb. 3, 1924

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the war of independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of the country. When "America" has its world premiers at the Fourty-fourth street theater, New York, February 21, theater lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year.

Times Feb 10 1924

Several prominent actors have been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo-drama of the War of Independence, which is being produced for the Daughters of the American Revolution. When "America" is presented at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre Feb. 21, the audience will find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, many other favorites, including Lucille La Verne. Then there is Louis Wolheim, who is famed now for his performance in "The Hairy Ape"; Riley Hatch, concert singer and actor on both stage and screen; Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star; Orville Alderson, lawyer and actor; Sydney Deane, also a musical comedy entertainer; Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead," and James Clarence Malaby, another veteran.

City Leader Feb 9 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH'S new photoplay, "AMERICA," dealing with the War of Independence, will be shown at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre February 21. The following artists will be seen in the large cast: Louis Wolheim, Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Riley Hatch and Lucille La Verne.

Columbus (O) State Journal Feb 3 1924

Griffith Retorts

With the [illegible] claim that a new record has been made for the longest motion picture on Broadway, it is interesting to recall that "The Birth of a Nation" ran at the Liberty Theater for 44 weeks, writes the D. W. Griffith, Inc., office. This theater had a seating capacity 75 per cent greater than the Criterion Theater, for which the new record is claimed. To draw a fair comparison, it would be necessary for "The Covered Wagon" to continue 33 weeks more to equal the actual record of D. W. Griffith's old masterpiece.

"Way Down East" also makes a forbidding challenge to the new record, as this picture ran for 42 weeks at the Forty-fourth St. Theater with a seating capacity of more than 1400, or more than twice as large as the Criterion. To equal "Way Down East" record, "The Covered Wagon" would have to run more than 80 weeks.

As to prices and volume of money, "The Birth of a Nation" played to the highest theatrical prices of that day, or $2 a seat, and a similar price for today would be $3 a seat, which is the standard theatrical price. "Way Down East" played at $2 for orchestra seats, with $1.50 for the best seats at $1, and 50 cents at $2, whereas "The Covered Wagon" has had the top price at $1.10.

The total receipts show that both "The Birth of a Nation" and "Way Down East" played to more than twice as many people and to [illegible] as much money as "The Covered Wagon."

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JANUARY 13, 1924.

GHTS FROM STUDIOS

PICTURE RECORDS DISPUTE SUBJECT

Claim Two Film Dramas Played to More People Than 'Covered Wagon.'

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH always believes in trying his pictures out of the big city first. He takes them to some small town and lets the country audience be his guide. A few nights ago he took "America" in sixteen reels to Montclair, N. J., and showed it before making his final cutting and editing.

Saginaw (Mich) Herald Courier Feb 3 1924

Griffith Let Comes Out With Challenge As to Record Film Run

Says D. W. Griffith's Films Still Hold Record for Runs

IN FIELAND

Mineral Wells (Tex) Index 1/22/24 — Indianapolis (Ind) Sunday Star Feb 17 1924

Mrs. Norman R. Grethouse, formerly Miss Tottye Price who lived in Mineral Wells a few years ago and who has been selected by David Wark Griffith, from several hundred applicants, to take the part of Mrs. Gage, wife of General Gage, British commander-in-chief at Boston during the Revolution, in the D. A. R. Picture "America."

To the left and above are scenes from the D. W. Griffith production of "America" the photodrama of the War of Independence filmed under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Arthur Dewey is George Washington and Carol Dempster is Nancy Montague.

Below—A lovely pose of Frieda Hempel whose beautiful voice was heard here recently in concert. Miss Hempel's season is a full one, and she has already given her "Jenny Lind" recital more times in America than her famous predecessor.

Moving Picture World (NYC) 2/16/24

World (NYC) Feb 10 19

Mineral Wells (Tex) Index 1/23/24 — Binny Hampton (NY) Sun 2/5/24

Former Mineral Wells Girl Chosen To Take Part Griffith Movie

Mrs. Norman R. Grethouse, formerly Tottye Price of this city has been chosen to represent Texas in "America", in the collossal photodrama of the War of Independence, being filmed by David Wark Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mrs. Grethouse was selected by Mr. Griffith and by Miss Carol Dempster who plays the leading role in the film, to portray the role of Mrs. Gage, wife of General Gage, the British commander-in-chief at Boston during the Revolution. Her remarkable facial resemblance to the spouse of the noted commander had been noted by Miss Dempster, her close personal friend, long before the filming of "America" was projected.

In making "America" Griffith has chosen his actors and actresses primarily for their physical resemblance to the famous historical personages who appear in the action. He had rejected hundreds of applicants for the role of Mrs. Gage before Miss Dempster called his attention to Mrs. Greathouse, who was at once engaged for the role.

Among the hundreds taking part in the new picture is a representative of almost every state in the union and the selection of Mrs. Greathouse assured Texas being represented. Mrs. Greathouse was born in Stephenville, Texas, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Price, who now reside in El Paso. Her early girlhood was spent in Weatherford and Seymour and following her marriage she lived in numerous towns and cities of Texas.

Like practically all of those taking part in "America" Mrs. Greathouse is a direct descendant of prominent revolutionary families.

"America" which represents Griffith in his first public presentation at the Forty-Fourth Theatre, New York, on the eve of Washington's birthday this year, is the first attempt to present the dawn of American liberty in pictures from on the screen.

In making it Griffith has enjoyed the assistance of the leading historical societies and of the United States regular army. Large bodies of infantry and cavalry were loaned him by the war department, through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks and having the aid of Battle complete, the fort and town of the revolutionary period, the Hessians, a regiment Minutemen and the loyalist contingent of American Indians, the usual battle of the revolution.

Spectacle and consideration has been given this public spectacle, and from these sources could scarcely be found a more complete picture of the War of Independence than is to be presented in the coming feature of the Griffith series.

Mrs. Greathouse is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Price, who now reside in El Paso. Her early girlhood was spent in Weatherford and Seymour and following her marriage she lived in numerous towns and cities of Texas.

Like practically all of those taking part in "America" Mrs. Greathouse is a direct descendant of prominent revolutionary families.

"America" which represents Griffith in his first public presentation at the Forty-Fourth Theatre, New York, on the eve of Washington's birthday this year, is the first attempt to present the dawn of American liberty in pictures from on the screen.

In making it Griffith has enjoyed the assistance of the leading historical societies and of the United States regular army. Large bodies of infantry and cavalry were loaned him by the war department, through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks and having the aid of Battle complete, the fort and town of the revolutionary period, the Hessians, a regiment Minutemen and the loyalist contingent of American Indians, the usual battle of the revolution.

Spectacle and consideration has been given this public spectacle, and from these sources could scarcely be found a more complete picture of the War of Independence than is to be presented in the coming feature of the Griffith series.

MORE ACTORS ADDED BY GRIFFITH TO 'AMERICA' CAST

A number of prominent actors have been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sequicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York, February 21, theater lovers will find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performances in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theater in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Netherole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Malaidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an impression in

TELEGRAPH, WEDNESDAY

THE REA

D. W. Griffith's "America" Tried Out on Invitation Audience at South Norwalk—Production, Now in 18 Reels, Required Four Hours to Show.

"America" at South Norwalk.

A SECRET trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour showing, and this will have to be cut down before it opens on Broadway, February 21. Incidentally, the official title of the new special is now "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." This has been done in order to avoid confusion as to the theme, and because of the fact that Mr. Griffith hopes to make a series of separate films portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Pittsburgh Post 2/6/24

We're a lucky bunch of citizens after all. Here we are getting the best film shows in the land at a price within the reach of all. Other towns have the same sort and honestly their citizens have to pay a lot of more money for an admission.

This outburst on the price of pictures comes after we hear that Douglas Fairbanks and D. W. Griffith in their coming new pictures intend to have an admission charge of $2. Glad to note the opening of the shows will be in New York where it has often been said "you can get away with anything."

Now pictures may cost the producers a wad of jack but believe me if they present a worth while attraction they get their dough back many times over. Of course it takes a financied to get the pictures set but still he ought to be satisfied with a fair return of interest.

Our Newark managers are to be congratulated for bringing the best pictures here and charging a nominal price. Oft times we have had first releases shown in our houses but the managers never jacked up the price. Good thing for all of us we have alert managers. And most of all they are entitled to our consideration and patronage.

Adds to "America" Cast

Many Favorites Augment Griffith Production for D. A. R.

A number of prominent actors have been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Mr. Griffith is making for the D. A. R.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York, February 21, Washington's Birthday eve, theatre lovers will find, in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, also Lucille La Verne, Louis Wolheim, Riley Hatch, Arthur Donaldson, Erville Anderson, Sydney Deane, Edwin Holland, James Clarence Malaidy and Charles Bennett.

To Curb Idle Rumors In the Film Studios

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign in the studios to suppress harmful rumors which, despite their falsity, gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the colonial period which prevails in the picture.

My Review 2/9/24

WILD TALES DO GREAT INJURY TO MOVIE BUSINESS

An Example of It at the Griffith Studio Bears Evidence

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which, despite their falsity, gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the Colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press it had swollen into a $200,000 catastrophe, all through idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in taking the Revolutionary battle scenes at Lexington, when two cases containing six thousand feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 180,000 feet of negative had been stolen and secretly sold.

So much exaggeration of this nature arises among the actors that the lectures will be designed to impress them with the harm such looseness may cause the industry.

Close-Ups of Famous Film Stars

D. W. Griffith has captured a Barrymore—Lionel, no less—to play an important part in his production of "America." This is Lionel's first appearance with D. W. for 10 whole years—for he began his screen career in Griffith's stock company.

The role for which he has been cast is an unpleasant one—to say the least. For he will play the part of Walter Butler, who, in the pre-revolutionary days (and, for that matter, during the revolution) led a band of Indians in a guerilla warfare against his own people.

Evansville Herald Feb 17 1924

Topeka (Kansas) Capital 2/9/24

Evansville (Ind) Courier 2/9/24 — Republican-Register

QUITE A CAST IN 'AMERICA,' NEW GRIFFITH FILM

Many Favorites Will Be Found in This Patriotic Picture

A number of prominent actors have been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York, February 21, theater lovers will find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performances in "The Hairy Ape," is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theater in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Netherole, Richard Mansfield and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Malaidy, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an impression in

DISPUTE CLAIM OF RECORD SET BY "COVERED WAGON"

"Birth of Nation" Figures Are Cited.

SATAN'S TOE IN THE PICTURES

Henry M. Flagler's Sea-Encompassed Estate on the Sound Has Become the Setting of a Movie Studio

The Flagler Estate on Orienta Point

By MORDAUNT HALL.

ON Satan's Toe, as James Fenimore Cooper called Orienta Point at Mamaroneck, is a large mansion where years ago, in the quiet of an evening, four oil magnates sat at a huge mahogany desk mapping out the destinies of liquid fuel, discussing Wall Street and the Florida East Coast Railroad. Now, over the same desk in the same room of this frame structure, one of the motion picture magnates considers such affairs as the price of stories, the salaries of screen stars, the high cost of carpenters, electricians, dress materials and lumber.

Where for years in the huge vacant house, guarded by a retired butler and a solitary gardener, there hung such gloom that the place was said by the near-by residents to be haunted, one at present sees gay and good-looking women, painted and rouged, attired in laces and satins, clinging to the arms of high-booted men in satin suits and tricornered hats, gray wigs and decorative black bows. They have done their share toward chasing away the spooks, and if there remained some stubborn ghost, he fled from the glare of the studio lights when they invaded the mansion.

On the green lawns by the Sound the days of George Washington are being recreated under the eye of David Wark Griffith. For the property is his.

The home that once was the pride of Henry M. Flagler, financial magnate, is now one of the most convenient Eastern motion picture studios. To make space for wardrobe and other paraphernalia, Mr. Griffith tore down some of the walls and turned out no less than sixteen bathtubs. There were about forty-two rooms in this house, which Flagler first started to build in 1899. He was superstitious about finishing the place, believing that he might die when it was completed. So he first built one section, and then waited for two years, after which he finished another part of the house. Then finally, not even fooling it, he turned superstition to the face when and boldly gave orders for completion.

He commissioned a gun expert of a coat of something like $100,000 and had his own private bombproof, secured for 200 yards into the waters of the Sound. Had one thought of the use from the New Jersey coast for the transformation of the rocks muddy shores into a smooth bathing beach. Most of the designing, even to the architectural peculiarities, was done by Mr. Flagler himself. He designed his own tile, and sent the drawings to Holland for the squares to be made there. Even the chandeliers were according to his own ideas; and there is one chandelier, still in the house, designed of solid brass, with crystal hangings, weighing 1,100 pounds. It cost $25,000.

So jealous was the Florida railroad king that no copies should be made of any of his interior fixtures for other homes that he insisted on having all molds destroyed. Incidentally, the gigantic chandelier, with the myriads of crystals, was the cause of the dismissal of one of Mr. Griffith's employes about a year ago. He was seen night after night going out with something evidently concealed under his coat. He was eventually questioned, and discovery was made that he was stealing the crystals from the chandelier. He was able to dispose of them for about $7 each. They were of finely cut French glass. Most of the hangings are of silk, except in one room, where the walls are covered with hand-tooled, specially designed colored Spanish leather. A terrific storm in the Summer of 1922 smashed windows and tore down part of this leather, which now hangs from some of the panels in uneven remnants.

In this same mansion where Mr. Griffith the other day discussed with Lionel Barrymore scenes for a revolutionary film Flagler used to sit for hours with John D. Rockefeller, H. H. Rogers and John D. Archbold, arguing over the oil business. The desk in Griffith's office, which if it had speech could reveal many interesting stories, is of solid mahogany, parts of it being two inches thick. Eight thousand dollars was offered for the desk a short time ago and refused.

A room at present used to store some of the costumes was in the past occupied by Edwin Booth, who often joined the oil magnates in their discussions. The tragedian was a domineering, fearless, impatient individual even with these men of affairs, and on more than one occasion he swept out of the room, angrily insisting that business so dominated all the cells of their brains that they could not appreciate anything in the way of literature or art.

The following evening he would be seen with them again, and if they listened to him without interrupting his stories by injecting Wall Street matters, he would remain in their company until John D. Rockefeller went off to Pocantico Hills, H. H. Rogers to the north shore of Long Island and Archbold to Manhattan. Then Booth and Flagler would have another cigar in peace before bedtime. Upon them attended George Holland, Flagler's butler.

Holland was for twenty-eight years in Flagler's service, to which he came from England. He is 60 now, and after his master died in May, 1913, he continued as caretaker of the then gloomy place, his only companion in the huge house and the thirty-two acres of land being an elderly gardener, who had also been in Mr. Flagler's employ. Together they used to sit and smoke corn-cob pipes at noon or on a Summer's evening, talking over the days of the past, wondering in the quiet of the estate what was going to happen to it. Now Holland is employed by Mr. Griffith as a sort of superintendent.

Scheduled trains still stop at Mamaroneck as at other suburban stations. But Holland remembers that when Flagler was alive even through expresses halted for a few instants at Mamaroneck station, the conductors always looking out to see if the "old man" was on the platform. Flagler never knew when he might be seized with the whim to go to noisy Manhattan, and to humor him the New York, New Haven & Hartford directors arranged to have all trains stop.

Toward the latter part of 1918, Mr. Griffith, then producing pictures in California, decided that the sunshine of California did not make up for the scenery of other sections of the country. He came East.

One day when "shooting" a scene on the north shore of Long Island, Griffith, with one of his assistants, looked through his powerful field glasses over at Orienta Point and asked what that part of the country was called. He drove over in a couple of days and cast an eye on the Flagler estate and became fascinated not only with the house but with the grounds.

The beautiful, neglected gardens, the sandy beach, the breakwater and the sea wall all appealed to Griffith, who thought that if he could become the owner of the estate he would at any rate be certain that none of his locations were duplicated by other picture men. In 1919, just before he was ready to make another Mutaeres production, he bought the mansion and the grounds for $600,000 and immediately went to work adding on a high studio and a power plant. Residents in the neighborhood were greatly incensed. They thought his carrying electricity on poles to the property, and to the end, in order to get what he wanted, he was forced to purchase an additional thirty acres.

It was in this studio that all the interior scenes for "Way Down East" were made, and most of the exteriors were also taken on the estate. Aside from the players employed in the films, there are 6 [illegible] employes here, while 2 [illegible] are taking produced [illegible] these productions, numbers [illegible] a move to ninety persons in the aforesaid and a number of other occasions, such as this rather [illegible] city men, workmen women and production machine operators.

Detroit (Mich) News 2/3/24

Covered Wagon' Record Is Scorned By Griffith

He Quotes Figures to Show His Own Big Ones Have Made More Money; Film Gossip of a Week.

By HAROLD HEFFERNAN.

ALL this talk about "The Covered Wagon" being the greatest money-winning picture in the history of the film business, has finally stirred the great D. W. Griffith into a fury. Mr. Griffith, as you should know from your movie primer, produced two of the biggest and most profitable films of all time in "The Birth of a Nation" and "Way Down East." Stories to the effect that these wonders of the silent drama are being pushed down the ladder in the matter of box office receipts have brought out some interesting data from the earliest files of the film industry.

Not until "The Covered Wagon" had passed its forty-fourth consecutive week in the Criterion Theater, New York—thus exceeding the long-run mark set by "The Birth of a Nation"—and its promoters began to make the matter known by a whirlwind publicity campaign, did the master speak. Mr. Griffith began by declaring that the Criterion is a 75 per cent smaller theater than the Liberty, the house that accommodated "The Birth" during its record-making run several years ago. To draw a fair comparison between the popularity of the two pictures Griffith declares it would be necessary for "The Covered Wagon" to continue 33 more weeks to equal the actual record of his old masterpiece.

And on top of that Griffith points out that "Way Down East" is in a position to make a forbidding challenge to the new record as it ran for 42 weeks in a theater with a seating capacity twice as large as that of the Criterion. To equal the "Way Down East" record, it is estimated that "The Covered Wagon" would have to run more than 80 weeks.

As to prices and volume of money passing the windows, "The Birth" and "Way Down East" seem to have things pretty much their own way. "The Birth" played to the highest theatrical prices of that day, of $2 a seat, and a similar price for today would be $4 a seat, which seems to be the standard theatrical rate on Broadway when affairs are normal. "Way Down East" played at $2 for orchestra seats with 200 of the best seats selling at $3 and $5 more at $5, whereas "The Covered Wagon" has held the top price at $1.50.

The total records, according to Griffith's figures, show that both "The Birth" and "Way Down East" played to more than twice as many people and to not less than four times as much money as the new [illegible]. The theater in which "The Covered Wagon" is now running seats less than 700 people, a smaller capacity than 75 per cent of Detroit's neighborhood houses. So, with all credit to "The Covered Wagon," and the likelihood of its continuation for perhaps another year in the same surroundings, it should be remembered that capacity and the amount of money taken in are the deciding factors in awarding the world's money-making championship to a photoplay.

Davenport (Ia) Dem-Leader 2-3-24

Popula[illegible] Screen Stars [illegible] Cast of "[illegible]erica"

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America", the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York, Feb. 21, theater lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun-Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape", is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck".

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theater in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star today, is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holand, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Netherole, Richard Mansfield, and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Malaby, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America".

Portland (OR) Press Herald Feb 7 1924

[illegible] Pickford's "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall", Douglas Fairbanks' "The Thief of Bagdad", Jack Pickford's "The Hill Billy", and D. W. Griffith's "America", will all have [illegible] Broadway run[illegible]

Portland (ME) Press-Herald Feb 8 1924

Stage and Screen News

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign aiming [illegible] the studios to suppress silly and hurtful rumors which despite their falsity, gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend [illegible] in retakes in making "America," because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the Colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press, it had swollen into a $250,000 catastrophe, all through idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in taking the Revolutionary battle scenes at Lexington, when two cases containing six thousand feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 150,000 feet of negative had been stolen and secretly sold.

So much exaggeration of this nature arises among the actors that the lectures will be designed to impress them with the harm such [illegible] may cause.

My Exhibitor Trade Review Feb 16 1924

Actor Selected By Griffith To Play Part Of George Washington

YORK, Feb. 1.—Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined and more than 100 actors, including a number of Broadway stars, interviewed in person, Arthur Hoyt has been selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the [illegible] of George Washington in America, the photodrama of the War of Independence, which he is making for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Hoyt was selected because he was considered to have the most [illegible] character resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Hoyt and many other prominent men were taken to Mount Vernon, to study the [illegible] and bearing of the first president.

Although some historian [illegible] the Father of his Country, and had his own private bombproof, secured for 200 yards into the waters of the Sound, there was no thought of the use from the New Jersey coast for the transformation of the rocks

---

Washington (DC) Times 2/9/24

Griffith's Aid.

Mr. Percy Sykes, former commander-in-chief of the British forces in Persia, was able to give some advice to D. W. Griffith in staging scenes of the War of Independence, which will be presented at the Forty-fourth Street Theater in New York soon.

Parkersburg Homegrown Feb 10 1924

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign among the studios to suppress silly and hurtful rumors which, despite their falsity, gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently an incident occurred during the taking of Revolutionary battle scenes for D. W. Griffith Production "America," when two cases containing [illegible] feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 150,000 feet of film had been stolen and sold.

So much exaggeration of this nature arises among the actors that the lectures will be designed to impress them with the harm such [illegible] may cause.

Sunday Star Feb 10 1924

Close-Ups of Famous Film Stars

[illegible] has received a Paramount contract on her work in Griffith's "America." This is Gloria's first [illegible] W. for its whole year—for he began his action [illegible]

This role for which he has been cast is an unusual one and the [illegible] Walter Butler, who, in the previously [illegible] during the Revolution, [illegible] against [illegible]

My Exhibitor Feb 17 1924

Boston Post 2/17/24

MOVIE PATRIOTS SUFFER IN SNOW, SAME AS IN 1776

Yesterday's snowstorm, even if it did disgruntle some folks who thought they'd get through the winter without buying rubbers, brought joy to the hearts of George Washington and his Revolutionary soldiers. During the entire winter George and his cohorts had been waiting, literally with bated breath, for just the tiniest bit of a snowstorm, so they could shiver around in rags and bare feet as in the good old days in Valley Forge.

Griffith About to Move.

The storm brought the greatest joy of all to D. W. Griffith, who, in spite of [illegible] as the real boss of George and his soldiers, Griffith had begun to feel that the weather man had played him dirt, for his biggest picture, "America," is scheduled to open Feb. 21, and up to yesterday no snow had arrived.

The whole picture had been made, awaiting only some Valley Forge scenes and editing and titling. Griffith was figuring on meeting the emergency by moving his whole company north.

War's Hell.

Yesterday's flurry brought out Washington and a portion of his tattered army to the Valley Forge that has been built on the Larchmont Yacht Club's grounds near the Griffith studio in Mamaroneck. Rehearsal for hours, extras and leading men, including Arthur Dorsey of Washington and Noah Beery as the hero of the piece, had half a dozen movie cameras under the eye of the director.

Today nearly the whole Revolutionary army, about 400, will be brought to the scene.

Boston Sunday Post 2/17/24

AMERICA ACCLAIMED AS GRIFFITH'S BEST

[illegible]

Philadelphia Public Ledger Feb 10 1924

Big Productions Due This Month

[illegible]

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL REPRODUCED FOR THE FILMS. [illegible]

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something. As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the detailed film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our men were waged, and to part in the unusual [illegible] Griffith is taking the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and servants, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and many living Revolutionary descendants, and the national guard of the United States Army as "extras."

As for the requirement of "letting the public in" to view the actual making of a motion picture [illegible] Griffith is now the actual director of a motion picture in preparation of its battle scenes, every movie fan who happens to live within a reasonable distance of the actual sites where Griffith is now working, is given an opportunity to see a dozen movies in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the men from the farms and trousers chests of their ancestors, the silver trimmed hats, buckles, etc., worn by the Minutemen, ranging from pieces of the Revolution, ranging from pieces of arms and drums, to pistols and muskets, [illegible] with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in the picture. Because of the enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "extras" in "America," hundreds of men who actually served in the Revolutionary War, and who have posed before photographers instead of present day camera men.

Griffith's aim in producing the epical picture has been achieved largely through the assistance of a special library of research the Daughters which has collected, [illegible] the United States Army, the general public and the general public and general [illegible] of Boston, the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] Revolution.

Although it would seem that [illegible] Griffith, [illegible] Revolutionary [illegible] Boston, [illegible] Revolutionary [illegible] Boston, [illegible] Revolutionary [illegible] Boston

My Herald Feb 10 1924

Brooklyn Life

MOVIES CAUSE TALK—The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which despite their falsity gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the Colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press, it had swollen into a $200,000 catastrophe, all through idle gossip.

Brooklyn Life 2/16

"AMERICA"—D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary War picture which is to open February 21st at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices."

This is done to avoid confusion as to the theme, since the dramatic story Mr. Griffith has produced emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence.

WITH UNITED STATES SOLDIERS AS EXTRAS. The Battle of Bunker Hill is fought again for D. W. Griffith's film spectacle "America," made for the Daughters of the Revolution and soon to be shown throughout the country.

My News Feb 10 1924

What's So Rare as Busy Studio Going Full Tilt?

By McELLIOTT.

It is not only imaginary, this glamour which hangs around the movies. It is part and parcel of the spirit which makes a crowd gather at Fifth avenue and Forty-first street, just below the lions of the library, to watch a cameraman train his machine on a group of players descending from a limousine; it's what causes a saleswoman to drop you, poor earth mortal, in the very middle of a glove purchase to fly to the aid of a very blond, very orange-lipsticked houri who has the look of a star. She may only resemble Gertrude Whoozis, but the chances are the salesgirl's eyes are keen, as she is a dyed-in-the-wool fan and knows her film catalogue backward.

Highly Colored Maidens.

Also this is something of the charm and mystery which causes your friends to say to you wistfully: "Do take me round to a studio some day when they're making a film. I've never been," and to stand agape once there, at the bewildering phantasmagoria of highly colored maidens in crystal evening frocks, green carpenters hammering deafeningly all over the place, some temperamental director's orchestra waiting positively outside a drawing room set—all the chary detail that makes a picture factory itself out within the first six of some seventeen playwright's pages.

Claire Hampton

My Tribune Feb 10 1924

Brooklyn Standard Union Feb 10 1924

South Bend (Ind) News-Times

Detroit News

Washington Brought to Life for Film of American Revolution

Deutsch Amerika

Portland, Me. 78

Griffith Makes "America" for D. A. R. With Aid of U. S. Army and Historians

RE-ENACTS RIDE OF PAUL REVERE

Reproduces Trip of Washington Across The Delaware River

FILMS MINUTEMEN AT BAY ON BUNKER HILL

Depicts Farmers Firing Shots That Were Heard All Round The World

HISTORIC SOCIETIES HELP OBTAIN DATA

And Robert Chambers Writes Love Story Which Runs Through The Play

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in a Love Scene

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight the Battle of Bunker Hill

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison With the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy; that 250,000 feet of film has been used already, and more than 50,000 persons have appeared in the scenes; that thousands of regular Army soldiers drafted for the purpose through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks, camped more than a fortnight in Putnam County to appear in a few scenes; and that when completed the picture will actually have cost more than a million dollars.

When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Taking Actual Sites

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie camera men attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies for use in mediocre pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by State troopers in New York, and the pirates' cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

Enthusiasm Aroused

Although he had long realized the dramatic possibilities of the American Revolution as the basis for a photoplay, Griffith has been surprised, he says, at the enthusiasm which his project seems to have aroused. His New York office and his studios at Mamaroneck, New York, have been literally flooded with requests from historical organizations which wish to aid with historical data so to appear in the picture; with valuable historical information from descendants of the Revolutionary period, gift requests from manufacturers which figured in the cause of Revolutionary soldiers for him to bring as command and take pictures in their own homes and historic

Which hundreds have turned out to watch the rehearsing and taking of scenes, and thousands who never saw a motion picture before, and who had forgotten that there was a War of Independence, have had an opportunity to see a dozen camera men at work, and to have their interest aroused to a degree bordering on a fever, in the process of taking a number of scenes in the property by Harry Carey of the film of which the Minutemen have made.

Pageantry Unearthed

And one of the interests with which the filming of "America" is being followed by patriotic societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes is the fact that pageantry which has long been left on the shelf from the time of the Revolution, and which has been revived only in Washington's birthday celebrations, and in the celebration of Lexington and Concord, and Bunker Hill Days, is being revived in the Griffith production, and being staged in the actual places where it took place and repeated to light and sound effects.

Guns Will Go

And the guns that so

[illegible]

Not Easy Sought

[illegible]

Modern Shared

[illegible]

"America." Pell may be remembered as author of "Down To The Sea In Ships," the film of New Bedford in its whaling days. He has been a life-long student of New England history.

During the filming of the battle scenes, Griffith has also had the benefit of the advice and aid of United States Army officers. Indeed the filming of several scenes at Somers, Putnam County, New York, where in fact United States Army infantry manoeuvres, with Griffith in command.

Monuments In Way

Owing to the monuments and modern buildings which now occupy and surround the sites of the principal Revolutionary engagements, Griffith found it impossible to stage his bigger scenes, dealing with huge bodies of moving men, on the actual scene of these battles.

So, after his technical staff had visited the principal battlegrounds, and with the aid of ancient documents and maps visualized Lexington Green, Concord Bridge, Breed's Hill, Dorchester Heights, and other leading battlefields of New England, Griffith had constructed at Somers, New York, a set more than seven miles in extent. And with the assistance of army officers and historical advisers this vast area was laid out as an exact reproduction of the various fields where the chief engagements of the war were fought.

Under the direction of regular army officers an encampment for several thousand soldiers, with complete water supply, commissary, electric and ventilation plants was made, and a similar one for Griffith's large company of players. The whole encampment covered a neighboring hillside to the extent of a square mile.

Special trains carried the 26th Infantry from Fort Slocum and Hamilton, and the 16th Infantry from Governor's Island, together with a troop of cavalry from Fort Ethan Allen, a field battery from Fort Slocum, a detachment of engineers in command of Lieut. Dr. Wirt, and a perfect unit under Capt. H. S. Davis on the scene at Somers.

Hundreds of people with camera equipment of every type of the reserve forces, formed the largest such unit ever brought together outside of war manoeuvres.

Many special cars and automobiles brought visitors and movie men, and there was a population of more than a thousand.

Common, the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very modern structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like madmen, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians, directed his players and United States Soldiers, refighting the battles of the War of Independence.

From the minute the soldiers arrived in camp they had been drilled in the manual of arms, in the tactics and strategy of Revolutionary times. During rehearsals they had doffed their modern khaki and donned the

D. W. Griffith

Although it would seem that every detail regarding such a well known incident as Paul Revere's ride through Middlesex to warn the Minutemen of the coming of the British forces in command of Major Pitcairn, would be public property and the knowledge of every school child, the research workers found that such was not the case. Despite the fact that Revere's ride has been ably told in prose and verse, even eye-witness historians had neglected to mention what to Griffith was a very important item—the color of the nameless yet famous steed he rode.

Paintings of Revere generally show the horse as white, which the research workers, after weeks of seeking through yellowed documents, found to be incorrect. They were finally able to solve the problem. And this was but a minor incident, a petty puzzle among the many disputed points they were called upon to settle.

Even with his research bureau Griffith would have found the solution of many disputed points impossible had it not been for the voluntary aid of local historians and patriotic societies, including such prominent personages as Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, president of the Daughters of the American Revolution, G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the American Revolution, Edwin B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society.

[illegible] The action starts, while cameras grind furiously, on the ramparts of Bunker Hill (General Prescott walks briskly in and his setting heart into his humorous foot soldiers, and tells them not to fire until "you can see the whites of their eyes," while the British advance in the formation of Bunker's Hill, over the ramparts [illegible] shots fired by the British vanguard in the bay.

"Fire," commands Prescott, and the Minutemen obey. Down goes the front rank of the advancing redcoats, but not the march pushed on by Sir William Howe and Pitcairn. Within the ramparts there is rush, but the redcoats are pushed back, a second, a third, a fourth, a common rallies. Behind the lines is seen to roll back behind a barrier to the sight of Harry. And the cry of Gen. Gridley goes up, and after a pause the redcoats are seen to roll back behind the ramparts, and the battle is over.

[illegible] in the Old North Church was redone in its original settings, and John Adams and Hancock revisited the Hancock-Clarke home.

Thence Griffith and his players sped by special train southward through New York to the principal points of historic interest in New York and New Jersey, and so on to Washington, and into Virginia.

The Battle of Quiry around the National Capital were used as backgrounds for elaborate scenes. Then moving Southward to Quiry Hall, where Washington called upon the Father Tree Cavalry at Fort Hunter, which assisted Cornwallis at the siege.

With the state that suggested Lincoln, Jefferson, Washington, Adams and Hancock, Griffith is [illegible] and [illegible] Island to make the battle scenes at Somers, Major Wainwright, aide to Secretary of War Weeks not only placed the cavalrymen at Griffith's order, but himself assumed the costume and character of the celebrated Morgan.

On through Virginia swept Griffith and his company, pausing at the historic Byrd mansion, Westover, to take several scenes, with Richmond society girls, descendants of Revolutionary families as extra people. Along the banks of the James River numerous "shots" were made.

Back at his Mamaroneck, N. Y. studios, Griffith built several gigantic sets to complete the picture. These included interiors of the British House of Lords, the throne room, the king's private audience chamber, and other magnificent "sets."

Barrymore, Villain

Lionel Barrymore, who and his first motion picture training under Griffith in the old Biograph studio, was engaged for the role of Walter Butler, the villain of the Revolution. After looking over thousands of actors, Arthur Dewey was engaged to portray Washington, and Arthur Donaldson the role of King George Third.

Miss Carol Dempster plays the leading woman's role, that of Nancy Montague, with Neil Hamilton playing the hero. Scores of other well known actors are in the cast.

"Woman is learning to stand on her feet." That's fine. Perhaps she will keep off the feet of men who have the street car seats.—Long [illegible] Telegram.

Arthur Donaldson as King George

PROMINENT ACTORS IN CAST OF "AMERICA"

Griffith made a country-wide search recently to find a man whose personality resembled that of George Washington for his forthcoming production, "America."

Hundreds of actors were interviewed and over a thousand photographs were examined, finally D. W. G. selected Arthur Dewey as bearing the most perfect likeness. Publicity now claim that Dewey is a descendant of an old revolutionary family and that one of his ancestors fought in the battle of Lexington.

Of course it may be true; but true or not, it will give his press agents something to [illegible]

Working in "America."

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the war of independence," which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country. When "America" has its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York, Feb. 21, theater lovers will find, in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the features of the New York stage.

Given Big Role in New Griffith Film

Lionel Barrymore, in addition to his starring venture with David Belasco, has been engaged to play the part of Walter Butler in the forthcoming D. W. Griffith production, "America."

Barrymore comes back to Mr. Griffith after an absence of many years. It was some ten years ago in the old Biograph days that Lionel Barrymore became a member of the stock company organized by Griffith, thus beginning his screen career under the Griffith direction. He continued his screen work for several years, when he returned to the stage.

The part for which he has been selected in "America" is one demanding great versatility and force. He will do his screen work daytime and Sundays, keeping his night and matinee engagements at the theater.

In addition to Barrymore, the cast for "America" now includes Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, [illegible] Marie Burke, [illegible] and a number of prominent [illegible] will be [illegible]

Exaggerated Stories Injure Film Industry

[illegible]

Chicago Tribune News Feb 1 1924

Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer Feb 10 1924

San Francisco (Cal) Herald 2/5/24

Montreal (PQ Can) Star 2/9/24

Hartford (Ct) Courant 2.10.1924

Springfield (Mass) Repub 2/10/24

D. W. GRIFFITH MAKES AMERICA FOR THE D. A. R.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule America as the new film has been named, should surpass even the Birth of a Nation.

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in America can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy—that 250,000 feet of film has been used already, and more than 7,000 persons have appeared in the scenes; that thousands of regular army soldiers drafted for the purpose through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks, camped more than a fortnight in Putnam county to appear in a few scenes; and that when completed the picture will actually have cost more than a million dollars.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of America is being followed may be gained from the fact that his (Griffith's) command torical societies and descendants of revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth invaluable relics of the revolution, ranging from pistols, spurs, and drums, to garments and costumes crumbling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props," in America, historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

The noted director was also fortunate in having the personal aid of Robert W. Chambers, the author, who not only wrote the charming love story which runs through America, but personally accompanied Griffith and his players out on location.

Also aiding Griffith from the historical side, is John L. E. Pell, who made the historical "employment" of America. Pell may be remembered as author of Down to the Sea in Ships, the film of New Bedford in its whaling days. He has been a life-long student of New England history.

During the filming of the battle scenes, Griffith has also had the benefit of the advice and aid of United States army officers. Indeed the storage of several scenes at Rodeen, Putnam county, New York, were in fact United States army infantry maneuvers, with

Owing to the monuments and modern buildings which now occupy and surround the sites of the principal revolutionary engagements, Griffith found it impossible to stage his bigger scenes, dealing with huge bodies of moving men, on the actual scene of these battles.

So, after his technical staff had visited the principal battlegrounds, and with the aid of ancient documents and maps visualized Lexington Green, Concord Bridge, Breed's Hill, Dorchester Heights, and the other leading battlefields of New England, Griffith had constructed at Somers, New York, a set more than seven miles in extent. And with the assistance of army officers and historical advisers this vast area was laid out as an exact reproduction of the various fields where the chief engagements of the war were fought.

Under the direction of regular army officers an encampment for several thousand soldiers, with complete water supply, commissary, electric and sanitation plants was made, and a similar one for Griffith's large company of players. The whole encampment covered a neighboring hillside to the extent of a square mile.

Special trains carried the 16th infantry from Fort Schuyler and Hamilton, and the 16th infantry from Governor's

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

D. W. Griffith, who made America.

Island, together with a 15-piece band from Fort Slocum, a complete corps in command of Lieut. De Witt, and a medical unit under Capt. N. T. Davis into the camp at Somers.

Reserve cavalry units assembled under command of Capt. Love of the reserve corps, formed the largest such unit ever brought together outside of war maneuvres.

Other special cars and automobiles brought Griffith, his players, technicians and advisers—a company of more than a thousand.

And the battle was on.

Griffith had extended an invitation to the general public to be present. And the general public came. The roads leading into Somers were black with traffic. They came afoot, they came in automobiles; they came in ancient horse-drawn rigs, they came on bicycles—they came until at times there were 15,000 of them scattered over nearby hillsides. At times it seemed as though the whole of Putnam county had stopped work and left its farms and its firesides to watch America in the making.

If the reader will put himself or herself in the place of one of these horrified spectators, he will see as he passes along the road to Somers first the vast encampment, for weeks the home of Griffith and his players, and of a section of the United States army. There is a military atmosphere about the place, with its neat barracks, set the figures moving about make it seem strangely unlike a military camp.

Indians in warpaint, and colonial damsels mingled with scarlet-coated grenadiers, soldiers in the buff and blue of the continental army, and minutemen in homespun. Should the reader have happened along at lunch time he would have found this motley mass besieging the commissary, and have seen British redcoats and revolutionary heroes chatting affably over two mugs of steaming coffee and two appetizing sandwiches; D. W. Griffith himself, standing between a major of the United States army and General Prescott of Bunker Hill fame; a very up to date movie cameraman borrowing a very modern match from one of the immortals of Lexington Green.

Ascending the summit of a nearby hill, which overlooks a broad and spacious valley, and gazing into the valley, the reader would have seen spread before his or her eyes a whole colonial settlement, with Lexington Common, the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very modern wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither the medium, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians directed his players and United States soldiers, refighting the battles of the War of Independence

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

Lionel Barrymore, who had his first motion picture training under Griffith in the old Biograph studio, was engaged for the role of Walter Butler, the villain of the Revolution. After looking over thousands of actors, Arthur Dewey was engaged to portray Washington, and Arthur Donaldson the role of King George Third.

Miss Carol Dempster plays the leading woman's role, that of Nancy Montague, with Neil Hamilton playing the hero. Scores of other well known actors are in the cast.

The English court scenes were supervised by Sir Percy Sykes, of London, England, formerly in command of the British forces in Persia, who has been thrice introduced at the English court, as well as at those of India, Persia and other eastern countries, and who is a recognized authority on formal court procedure.

Several ambassadors have been among the distinguished guests who have watched the filming of scenes.

And the Daughters of the American Revolution, who inspired the making of this photodrama to express not only the romance, but the high ideals of the founders of the republic are jubilant over their brain-child of America.

"Good Morning Rosamond"
This is the final production and farewell week At the Rockford Theatre with Clyde M. Waddell
AND THE Waddell Players
Presenting this most beautiful and romantic comedy drama.

Fall River (Mass) Herald February 12 1924

Fitchburg (Mass) Sentinel Feb 12 1924

Springfield (Mass) Union-Herald Feb 11 1924

Chicago (Ill) News Feb 9 1924

Strain Is Tremendous In Big Movie Studio

This Little

Stage and Screen News

8 Burlington (W) News

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Seeks a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion G...ith is not only making the de... film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women descendants of Revolutionary ... and the United States Army helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even "Birth Of A Nation."

No other film during ... ever created such widespread as that upon which ... working. This ... an or... ity to see a dozen ... and to learn ... a faithful ... most widely known as an author ... has written a num... of historical ... and ... regarded ...

... reproduction of the ... where the chief en... of the war were fought. ... the direction of regular ... officers an encampment for ... thousand soldiers, with ... water supply, commis... and sanitation plants ... roads, and a similar one for ... Griffith's large company of players. The whole encampment covered a neighboring hillside to the extent of a square mile.

Special trains carried the 15th Infantry from Fort Schuyler and Plattsburg, and the 16th Infantry from Governors Island, together with a 12 plane band from Fort Slocum, a complimentary corps of command of Lieut. Gen. M. F. Davis into the scene at Boston.

Numerous civilians assembled under command of Capt. Lord of the Marine Corps. Among the crowds were not only thousands of our representative citizens, men and women, who brought Griffith, his players, authorities and artists a number of more than a thousand.

And the battle was on.

Griffith had intended an battle in the general public to be present. But the general public came. The battle became a real battle. The men fought with ... They came from far and near ... to the battle ... the Revolutionary ... the Civil War and the World War ... the ... of the ... the ... the ...

Screen Mirror Feb. 16 1924

„America"

Ein geschichtlicher Kolossalfilm.

Paul Reveres Ritt. (Aus Griffiths Film „America.)

In knapp zwei Jahren werden anderthalb Jahrhunderte verstrichen sein seit der Unabhängigkeitserklärung der Vereinigten Staaten, und die Befreiung des Landes vom englischen Joch wird Anlass geben zu zahlreichen Gedenkfeiern. Gewissermassen als Auftakt dieser grossen Tage hat der Meister der amerikanischen Filmkunst D. W. Griffith einen Kolossalfilm „America" vorbereitet und dass gerade er der geeignetste Mann ist, diese gewaltige Aufgabe zu lösen, haben seine früheren Grossfilms: „Birth of a Nation", „Intolerance", „Orphans of the Storm" bewiesen.

„America" wird indessen kein trockener historischer Film sein, der die geschichtlichen Ereignisse in Bildern aneinanderreiht; Griffith hat in Robert W. Chambers einen amerikanischen Schriftsteller gewählt, der die Gabe der lebendigen Schilderung, die Fähigkeit der Entwicklung einer spannenden Handlung und die gründliche Kenntnis der Geschichte des Landes in vollem Masse besitzt. Chambers hat eine Reihe von Romanen aus der „Gesellschaft" des modernen Amerika geschrieben, die ihn zu einem der beliebtesten Autoren gemacht haben: gerade in diesen Romanen ist seine Zeichnung der Einzelgestalten und die Steigerung der fesselnden Handlung rühmenswert, und gerade diese Romane stempeln ihn zum fähigen Filmautor. Andererseits sind seine Romane mit historischem Hintergrund „Ailsa Paige" (aus der Zeit des Bürgerkrieges) und „Cardigan" (aus der Zeit des Befreiungskrieges) vielleicht seine wertvollsten Arbeiten; in dem letzteren Roman steht er gleichwertig neben Fenimore Cooper, dessen grossen Indianerromane ihm dabei offenbar Vorbild waren. Die Wahl dieses Autors als Text dichter des „America"-Films gewährt die Sicherheit einer packenden Fabel.

Soweit nun Griffith als Verfilmer inbetracht kommt, bürgen seine früheren Leistungen für den Erfolg seiner neuen Schöpfung. Mit unermüdlichem Eifer hat Griffith an diesem Americafilm gearbeitet; seit Monaten ist er mit seinem Herr von Mitarbeitern — Schauspielern, Hilfsregisseuren, Technikern und Sachverständigen — in einem Sonderzug herumgereist, um jede der historischen Szenen an dem Ort des Geschehnisses aufzunehmen. Die Erzeugnisse führten ihn bald nach Massachusetts, bald nach Pennsylvanien, dann wieder nach New York und New Jersey . . . die Zuschauer werden zahlreiche historische Stätten in naturwahrer Wiedergabe zu sehen bekommen und darin liegt der höchste Wert dieses Films — seine erzieherische Eigenschaft.

Die Schlacht bei Bunker Hill. (Aus Griffiths Film „America.)

Der Amerikaner besitzt den Stolz des aus eigener Kraft Gewordenen, er besitzt die Liebe zu seinem Land und die Verehrung für die Helden seiner Geschichte, aber ihm fehlt eins: die Pietät für die Stätten, an denen diese Geschichte sich abspielte — die Pietät kann gerade durch diesen Film gefördert werden und so erfüllt „America" die höchste Mission des Films: neben der Unterhaltung auch erzieherisch und bildend zu wirken.

Bei seinem ernsten Bestreben, den Amerikanern einen historisch echten Film zu geben, fand Griffith überall bereitwillig Unterstützung. Die gebildeten Amerikaner sind sich durchaus bewusst, dass die grosse Masse des Volkes der Erziehung zum wirklichen Patriotismus bedarf, der nicht in gedankenlosem Hurrageschrei und hysterischen Flaggenhuldigungen besteht. Der wahre Patriotismus kann nur aus der gründlichen Kenntnis der Geschichte des Landes und dem vollen Verständnis für die Verdienste der Helden der Geschichte erstehen — ein Film der diese Kenntnis und dieses Verständnis fördert ist ein Verdienst um Land und Volk.

Patriotische und historische Gesellschaften haben sich Griffith restlos zur Verfügung gestellt; sie haben ihm historische Stätten und Museen geöffnet, sie haben ihm aus ihren Archiven und Sammlungen alles überlassen, was er für seinen Film benötigte. Kriegssekretär Weeks hat ihm unbezahlbare Dienste geleistet: die Schlachten des Befreiungskrieges wurden an Hand der fachmännischen Berichte noch einmal durchgekämpft und Soldaten der Bundesarmee vollführten in britischen und in amerikanischen Uniformen alle die blutigen Kämpfe, die unserem Lande die Freiheit gaben. Die britischen Rotröcke und die Blauen der Continentalarmee standen in realistischen Kämpfen vor der Camera und spielten geschichtliche Ereignisse geschichtlich bis in die kleinsten Einzelheiten. So darf man von dem neuesten Griffithfilm Grosses erwarten — Grosses und Wertvolles. Der kann sein Land nicht lieben, der seine Geschichte nicht kennt. Und der nur wird seinem Lande mit Leib und Seele ergeben sein, der sich der Kämpfe und Opfer, der Nöte und Sorgen bewusst ist, die zu seiner Grösse geführt haben. Die Nativisten, die mit dem Worte „Americanisation" Unfug treiben, sollten sich klar werden, dass die Amerikanisierung nur durch Erziehung zum Verständnis erfolgen kann und müssten damit bei sich selbst den Anfang machen. Wir erwarten, dass Griffiths „America" in diesem Sinne amerikanisierend wirken wird.

* * *

Schuld haben, heisst oft im Rechte sein.

A Washington Film for "Washington's Birthday"

THE DAILY HOTEL REPORTER, NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 18

SNOW COMES TO AID OF VALLEY FORGE FILM

Enables Washington's Soldiers to Suffer Properly.

Dramatic and Music Notes

With a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got this morning after taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture "America" which opens at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary War. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the fall of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions all this time for the first real snow. Rides is a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" and Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go with in the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

With the opening of the picture set for next Thursday, it became necessary for all scenes to be finally arranged in the picture Tuesday night that the negative might be turned over to the cutters for final selection of the finished print.

So the weather man and his varied moods remained in suspense some eight hours at minute before dashing off a just snow that will save the tragic footprints of Valley Forge into "America."

GRIFFITH STAFF COMING.

Will Witness Presentation of "America" at Empress.

"AMERICA" COMING

Big Picture to Have First Showing in This City.

FOR YOUR AMUSEMENT

82

SUNDAY NEWS, FEBRUARY 17, 1924.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" OPENS THURSDAY;

THE STAGE is set on Lexington Green for "the shot that's heard around the world." To go on: On the eve of Washington's birthday, which happens to be Thursday, D. W. Griffith's massive production "America" opens at the Forty-fourth Street theatre.

My Journal of Commerce on America Feb 9 1924

NOW that the militant William A. Brady, who is second only to Morris Gest as a personal publicist, has taken up his annual assault against the ticket speculating evil, another managerial controversy breaks loose among the moving picture magnates over the subject of length of runs and box office records on Broadway, which impels David Wark Griffith, the pioneer of the 2-hour feature presentation, to indite the following:

"With the recent claim that a new record has been made for the longest run of a motion picture on Broadway, it is interesting to recall that 'The Birth of a Nation' ran at the Liberty Theatre for forty-four weeks. This theatre had a seating capacity 75 per cent greater than the Criterion Theatre, for which the new record is claimed. To draw a fair comparison it would be necessary for 'The Covered Wagon' to continue thirty-three weeks more to equal the actual record of D. W. Griffith's old masterpiece.

"'Way Down East' also makes a forbidding challenge to the new record, as this picture ran for forty-two weeks at the 44th Street Theatre, with a seating capacity of more than 1,400, or more than twice as large as the Criterion. To equal the 'Way Down East' record 'The Covered Wagon' would have to run more than eighty weeks.

"As to prices and volume of money, 'The Birth of a Nation' played to the highest theatrical prices of that day, or $2 a seat, and a similar comparative price for today would be $3 a seat, which is now the standard theatrical price. 'Way Down East' played at $2 for orchestra seats, with 200 of the best seats at $3, and eighty seats at $5, whereas 'The Covered Wagon' has held the top price at $1.50.

"The total records show that both 'The Birth of a Nation' and 'Way Down East' played to more than twice as many people and to not less than four times as much money as the new claimant."

Tel Feb 13 1924

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH always believes in trying his pictures out of the big city first. He takes them to some small town and lets the country audience be his guide. A few nights ago he took "America" in nineteen reels to Norwalk, N. J., and showed it before making his final cutting and editing.

CAROL DEMPSTER.

Now that snow is here the cameras will film Valley Forge. While the snowfall may not be as heavy as it was in Washington's day, it is much better than a green Valley Forge, with which Mr. Griffith was faced before the weather man relented and let him have snow.

"America," with the added title of "Sacrifice No. 1," comes to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre on the eve of Washington's Birthday. The new name is added because Mr. Griffith expects to make other patriotic films of America.

Speaking of "America": It is characteristic of a Griffith film that little or nothing is said about a cast while it is in the making. Yesterday we asked for a complete cast and were furnished with the following names: Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack, Irma Harrison, Lucile Laverne, Erville Alderson, Louis Wolheim and Riley Hatch.

My Telegraph Feb 17 1924

GRIFFITH PICTURE GIVEN A SECRET TRIAL SHOWING

A secret showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," was held Tuesday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour showing, and this will have to be cut down before it opens on Broadway, February 21. Incidentally, the official title of the new special is now "America, Series One—The Sacrifice." This has been done in order to avoid confusion as to the theme, and because of the fact that Mr. Griffith hopes to make a series of separate films portraying dramatic history of America's development.

My Telegraph Feb 17 1924

Motion Picture Editor The Morning Telegraph:

Dear Sir—We notice in your paper that the industry is giving a luncheon to Thomas A. Edison for his work as the pioneer of the motion picture business. This is a very worthy idea and should be generally applauded. It occurs to us that the thing should be carried farther. Why not honor D. W. Griffith, who took the business where Edison left off, and made it, by dint of his directorial genius one of the outstanding arts?

Sincerely,
Three Broken Blossoms.

Rutherford, N. J., Feb. 16, 1924.

Middletown (O) Journal 2-13-24

SNOWS OF '76 ARE DIFFICULT TO REPRODUCE

The oldest inhabitant may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in Revolutionary Days and a winter today than D. W. Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76. Also of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of Colonial times show that New England, New York and even more southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck registers spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next Summer, in the hope that the village prophet, who insists that the seasons have changed round, may be right.

Danville (Ky) Herald 2/4/24

PROMINENT ACTORS IN CAST OF PLAY 'AMERICA

Names of prominent actors have been added to the cast of Griffith's "America," the drama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the celebration of the Sesquicentennial anniversary of the founding of this country.

Aberdeen (S D) News 2/5/24

Miss Zinita Graf, South Dakota Teacher Who Will Enter The Movie World

Every now in a while South Dakota swings into the limelight through the prominence of a son or daughter who has won fame of national attention. This time a former South Dakota woman has "got one over" on the aristocracy of Europe in competition for a place in a movie. Miss Zinita Graf, a native of South Dakota, has already won as well as honor. She is a lass who took the chance on the golden city in search of fortune and found it. Having a fine voice and large dramatic training, Miss Graf, that is, Zinita, has been a teacher of Eastern college, has been selected for the part of Lady Dorothy Dudley in the Griffith production "America," the phenomenal story of the Revolutionary War, which will be produced in Washington on the 22nd of February.

Miss Graf was selected for the role of the Duchess of Portland, a grande dame of the Court of King George Third, by Mr. Griffith and by Sir Percy Sykes, of London, England, who aided in staging the court scenes in the picture. Sir Percy Sykes has been during presented at the Courts of St. James as well as at the courts of Persia (where he was in command of the British forces) and of India. He is regarded as an authority on court etiquette.

The world premiere of "America," with which the D. W. Griffith organization will celebrate the 150th anniversary of the founding of the nation, will take place in New York on February 22, with Miss Graf in the role of Lady Dorothy Dudley in the film.

Miss Graf was born in Iowa, spent her childhood in Nebraska, and later in South Dakota. She is a graduate of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., and has been a teacher in Eastern colleges. She has been selected for the part of Lady Dorothy Dudley in the Griffith production "America," the phenomenal story of the Revolutionary War, which will be produced in Washington on the 22nd of February.

Snow a Joy to Reel Troops of '24, but Was Different Story in '77

(NEWS photo)

Nathan Harrington (Neal Hamilton), D. W. Griffith and George Washington (Arthur Dewey), l. to r., drank hot coffee toast to weatherman for delayed snow delivery.

(NEWS photo)

Picturing barefooted Continental troops was cold, realistic job for these actors.

IN GEORGE WASHINGTON'S camp in 1777 snow meant privation and suffering for the troops in Valley Forge, but to D. W. Griffith and his actors at Mamaroneck yesterday it brought joy, for it made the picture "America" possible.—Story on page 20.

Tacoma (Wash) Ledger 2/10/24

Griffith Rebuilding Big Sets for "America"

D. W. Griffith and his force, states a wire from New York, are busy rebuilding the towns of Lexington and Concord, destroyed when the recent gale hit Mamaroneck, and Paul Revere is recovering from a black eye received when he bumped into Gen. Washington during the blow.

Morning Telegraph Feb 17 1924

Hear Get "America" Chicago

It is said that the present journey of Aaron Jones to the Big Town has to do with the picketing of a contract for the showing of "America." The Griffith spectacle would make an excellent feature for "The Tex O'Rourke" at the Woods. However, if there is truth in the rumor that D. W. G. and William Randolph Hearst had dealings in a certain way regarding the new motion picture, it will probably go to the Hippodrome, Belasco & Mayer being clearly out of the D. W. Griffith orbit forever.

Union (Ore) Hudson Dispatch 2/7/24

Toledo (O) Times 2/10/24

~~MANY STARS IN~~ GRIFFITH FILM

Well Known Players Added to Cast of Patriotic Picture, "America."

My Am. P News Feb 23 1924

Griffith Modifies Title for "America"

D. W. Griffith has modified the title of his production "America" to read "America—Sacrifice No. 1." The change was made because Griffith intends to make other patriotic pictures of America.

CAROL DEMPSTER as the belle in "America," David Wark Griffith's heavy cinema production, which opens at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre on the eve of Washington's Birthday.

Bulletin (Cal) Times 2/11/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 2/10/24

Screen Mirror Feb. 16 1924

„America"

Ein geschichtlicher Kolossalfilm.

Paul Reveres Ritt. (Aus Griffiths Film „America.)

In knapp zwei Jahren werden anderthalb Jahrhunderte verstrichen sein seit der Unabhängigkeitserklärung der Vereinigten Staaten, und die Befreiung des Landes vom englischen Joch wird Anlass geben zu zahlreichen Gedenkfeiern. Gewissermassen als Auftakt dieser grossen Tage hat der Meister der amerikanischen Filmkunst D. W. Griffith einen Kolossalfilm „America" vorbereitet und dass gerade er der geeignetste Mann ist, diese gewaltige Aufgabe zu lösen, haben seine früheren Grossfilms: „Birth of a Nation", „Intolerance", „Orphans of the Storm" bewiesen.

„America" wird indessen kein trockener historischer Film sein, der die geschichtlichen Ereignisse in Bildern aneinanderreiht; Griffith hat in Robert W. Chambers einen amerikanischen Schriftsteller gewählt, der die Gabe der lebendigen Schilderung, die Fähigkeit der Entwicklung einer spannenden Handlung und die gründliche Kenntnis der Geschichte des Landes in vollem Masse besitzt. Chambers hat eine Reihe von Romanen aus der „Gesellschaft" des modernen Amerika geschrieben, die ihn zu einem der beliebtesten Autoren gemacht haben: gerade in diesen Romanen ist seine Zeichnung der Einzelgestalten und die Steigerung der fesselnden Handlung rühmenswert, und gerade diese Romane stempeln ihn zum fähigen Filmautor. Andererseits sind seine Romane mit historischem Hintergrund „Ailsa Paige" (aus der Zeit des Bürgerkrieges) und „Cardigan" (aus der Zeit des Befreiungskrieges) vielleicht seine wertvollsten Arbeiten; in dem letzteren Roman steht er gleichwertig neben Fenimore Cooper, dessen grossen Indianerromane ihm dabei offenbar Vorbild waren. Die Wahl dieses Autors als Textdichter des „America"-Films gewährt die Sicherheit einer packenden Fabel.

Soweit nun Griffith als Verfilmer inbetracht kommt, bürgen seine früheren Leistungen für den Erfolg seiner neuen Schöpfung. Mit unermüdlichem Eifer hat Griffith an diesem Americafilm gearbeitet; seit Monaten ist er mit seinem Herr von Mitarbeitern — Schauspielern, Hilfsregisseuren, Technikern und Sachverständigen — in einem Sonderzug herumgereist, um jede der historischen Szenen an dem Ort des Geschehnisses aufzunehmen. Die Erzeugnisse führten ihn bald nach Massachusetts, bald nach Pennsylvanien, dann wieder nach New York und New Jersey.... die Zuschauer werden zahlreiche historische Stätten in naturwahrer Wiedergabe zu sehen bekommen und darin liegt der höchste Wert dieses Films — seine erzieherische Eigenschaft.

Die Schlacht bei Bunker Hill. (Aus Griffiths Film „America.)

Der Amerikaner besitzt den Stolz des aus eigener Kraft Gewordenen, er besitzt die Liebe zu seinem Land und die Verehrung für die Helden seiner Geschichte, aber ihm fehlt eins: die Pietät für die Stätten, an denen diese Geschichte sich abspielte — die Pietät kann gerade durch diesen Film gefördert werden und so erfüllt „America" die höchste Mission des Films: neben der Unterhaltung auch erzieherisch und bildend zu wirken.

Bei seinem ernsten Bestreben, den Amerikanern einen historisch echten Film zu geben, fand Griffith überall bereitwillig Unterstützung. Die gebildeten Amerikaner sind sich durchaus bewusst, dass die grosse Masse des Volkes der Erziehung zum wirklichen Patriotismus bedarf, der nicht in gedankenlosem Hurrageschrei und hysterischen Flaggenhuldigungen besteht. Der wahre Patriotismus kann nur aus der gründlichen Kenntnis der Geschichte des Landes und dem vollen Verständnis für die Verdienste der Helden der Geschichte erstehen — ein Film der diese Kenntnis und dieses Verständnis fördert ist ein Verdienst um Land und Volk.

Patriotische und historische Gesellschaften haben sich Griffith restlos zur Verfügung gestellt; sie haben ihm historische Stätten und Museen geöffnet, sie haben ihm aus ihren Archiven und Sammlungen alles überlassen, was er für seinen Film benötigte. Kriegssekretär Weeks hat ihm unbezahlbare Dienste geleistet: die Schlachten des Befreiungskrieges wurden an Hand der fachmännischen Berichte noch einmal durchgekämpft und Soldaten der Bundesarmee vollführten in britischen und in amerikanischen Uniformen alle die blutigen Kämpfe, die unserem Lande die Freiheit gaben. Die britischen Rotröcke und die Blauen der Continentalarmee standen in realistischen Kämpfen vor der Camera und spielten geschichtliche Ereignisse geschichtlich bis in die kleinsten Einzelheiten. So darf man von dem neuesten Griffithfilm Grosses erwarten — Grosses und Wertvolles. Der kann sein Land nicht lieben, der seine Geschichte nicht kennt. Und der nur wird seinem Lande mit Leib und Seele ergeben sein, der sich der Kämpfe und Opfer, der Nöte und Sorgen bewusst ist, die zu seiner Grösse geführt haben. Die Nativisten, die mit dem Worte „Americanisation" Unfug treiben, sollten sich klar werden, dass die Amerikanisierung nur durch Erziehung zum Verständnis erfolgen kann und müssten damit bei sich selbst den Anfang machen. Wir erwarten, dass Griffiths „America" in diesem Sinne amerikanisierend wirken wird.

* * *

Schuld haben, heisst oft im Rechte sein.

A Washington Film for "Washington's Birthday"

Arthur Dewey as "George Washington" with Carol Dempster, who is one of the featured players in "America." The selection of Mr. Dewey for the character of Washington is considered another Griffith master stroke.

The D. W. Griffith production "America," made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, is receiving "the finishing touches" from "D. W." preparatory to the New York premiere, on Washington's Birthday.

As [illegible] here, Mr. Dewey has perfected a excellent make-up, which, together with the striking resemblance in his appearance to the First President of the United States, makes the illusion startlingly perfect.

Daily Herald. Feb. 13. 1924

SNOW COMES TO AID OF VALLEY FORGE FILM

Enables Washington's Soldiers to Suffer Properly.

[illegible]

Feb. 18

PALISADIAN

FOR YOUR AMUSEMENT

[illegible]

THE DAILY HOTEL REPORTER, NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 18

Dramatic and Music Notes

With a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith go this snowstor mlor taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture "America" which opens at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of organs importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary War. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the fall of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of Infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions all this time for the first five inch flakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north to the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

With the opening of the picture set for next Thursday, it became necessary for all scenes to be finally arranged in the picture Tuesday night that the negative might be turned over to the cutters for final assembly of the finished print.

So the weather man and his varied moods in addition have eight hours of actual labor ahead with a cast that will have the bitter hospitals of Valley Forge into "America."

Daily Herald. Feb. 13. 1924

"AMERICA" COMING

Griffith Failure to Have First Showing in This City.

[illegible]

Danbury (Conn) News Feb. 18. 1924

GRIFFITH STAFF COMING.

Will Witness Presentation of "America" at Empress.

[illegible]

Bridgeport Times Feb. 19 1924

82

SUNDAY NEWS, FEBRUARY 17, 1924.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" OPENS THURSDAY;

THE STAGE is set on Lexington Green for "the shot that's heard around the world." To go on: On the eve of Washington's birthday, which happens to be Thursday, D. W. Griffith's massive production "America" opens at the Forty-fourth Street theatre.

My Journal of Commerce Feb 9 1924

NOW that the militant William A. Brady, whose second only to Merle Gest as a personal publicist, has taken up his annual assault against the ticket speculating evil, another managerial controversy breaks loose among the moving picture magnates over the subject of length of runs and box office records on Broadway, which impels David Wark Griffith, the pioneer of the feature presentation, to indite the following:

"With the recent claim that a new record has been made for the longest run of a motion picture on Broadway, it is interesting to recall that 'The Birth of a Nation' ran at the Liberty Theatre for forty-four weeks. This theatre had a seating capacity 75 per cent greater than the Criterion Theatre, for which the new record is claimed. To draw a fair comparison it would be necessary for 'The Covered Wagon' to continue thirty-three weeks more to equal the actual record of D. W. Griffith's old masterpiece.

"'Way Down East' also makes a forbidding challenge to the new record, as this picture ran for forty-two weeks at the 44th Street Theatre, with a seating capacity of more than 1,400, or more than twice as large as the Criterion. To equal the 'Way Down East' record 'The Covered Wagon' would have to run more than eighty weeks.

"As to prices and volume of money, 'The Birth of a Nation' played to the highest theatrical prices of that day, or $2 a seat, and a similar comparative price for today would be $3 a seat, which is now the standard theatrical price. 'Way Down East' played at $2 for orchestra seats, with 200 of the best seats at $3, and eighty seats at $5, whereas 'The Covered Wagon' has held the top price at $1 50.

"The total records show that both 'The Birth of a Nation' and 'Way Down East' played to more than twice as many people and to not less than four times as much money as the new claimant."

Feb 13 1924

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH always believed in trying his pictures out of the big city first. He takes them to some small town and lets the country audience be his guide. A few nights ago he took "America" in nineteen reels to Norwalk, N. J., and showed it before making his final cutting and editing.

CAROL DEMPSTER

Now that snow is here the cameras will film Valley Forge. While the snowfall may not be as heavy as it was in Washington's day, it is much better than a green Valley Forge, with which Mr. Griffith was faced before the weather man relented and let him have snow.

"America," with the added title of "Sacrifice No. 1," comes to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre on the eve of Washington's Birthday. The new name is added because Mr. Griffith expects to make other patriotic films of America.

Speaking of "America": It is characteristic of a Griffith film that little or nothing is said about a cast while it is in the making. Yesterday we asked for a complete cast and were furnished with the following names: Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack, Irma Harrison, Lucile Laverne, Erville Alderson, Louis Wolheim and Kitty Hatch.

My Telegraph Feb 13 1924

GRIFFITH PICTURE GIVEN A SECRET TRIAL SHOWING

A secret showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," was held Tuesday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour showing, and this will have to be cut down before it opens on Broadway, February 21. Incidentally, the official title of the new special is now "America, Series One—The Sacrifice." This has been done in order to avoid confusion as to the theme, and because of the fact that Mr. Griffith hopes to make a series of separate films portraying dramatic history of America's development.

My Telegraph Feb 17 1924

Motion Picture Editor The Morning Telegraph:

Dear Sir—We notice in your paper that the industry is giving a luncheon to Thomas A. Edison for his work as the pioneer of the motion picture business. This is a very worthy idea and should be generally applauded. It occurs to us that the thing should be carried farther. Why not honor D. W. Griffith, who took the business where Edison left off, and made it, by dint of his directorial genius one of the outstanding arts?

Sincerely,
Three Broken Blossoms
Rutherford, N. J., Feb. 16, 1924.

Middletown (O) Journal 2-13-24

SNOWS OF '76 ARE DIFFICULT TO REPRODUCE

The oldest inhabitant may be louder and more persistent in his opinion of how the weather has changed since he was a boy, but probably no one in the United States knows better the difference between a winter in Revolutionary Days and a winter today than D. W. Griffith.

Griffith and his research workers, restaging Revolutionary times down at Mamaroneck for scenes in "America," which he is making for the D. A. R., are plentifully supplied with accurate reports of the snowfall day by day in '74, '75 and '76. Also of the thickness of the ice on the Delaware and other important streams. But they are waiting in vain for either the ice or the snow to be duplicated this winter.

While the informal reports of Colonial times show that New England, New York and even more southern territory was covered by from one to fifteen feet of snow at this season of the year, the official thermometer at Mamaroneck registers spring heat.

It is reported that Griffith is thinking seriously of deferring the taking of his winter scenes until next Summer, in the hope that the village prophet, who insists that the seasons have 'changed 'round, may be right.

Aberdeen (S D) News 2/5/24

Miss Zinita Graf, South Dakota Teacher Who Will Enter The Movie World

Every one in a white South Dakota reviews into the limelight through the prominence of a son or daughter who has won fame or national attention. This time a former South Dakota woman has "put one over" on the aristocracy of Europe in competition for a place in a court scene in a production of D. W. Griffith. South Dakota has given to the world as well as America's best, she has a few who look the part. Chosen as the perfect type to represent Lady Grace Dewey, including a dancer and three musicians, Miss Zinita Graf, the pretty teacher at Yankton College, has been selected for the part of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photoplay of the Sixty "America" has chosen for the D. A. R. to be presented at the Congress of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Miss Graf was selected for the role of the Duchess of Portland, a grande dame of the Court of King George Third, by Mr. Griffith and by Sir Percy Sykes, of London, England, who aided in staging the court scenes in the picture. Sir Percy Sykes has been twice presented at the Court of St. James as well as at the Court of Paris (where he was in command of the British forces) and of Italy. He is regarded as an authority on court etiquette.

The world premiere of "America," with which the Theatre Theatre will open the opening of the Forty-fourth Street and celebration of the freedom of the country, in New York on February 21, will mark Miss Graf's debut in the motion picture world.

Miss Graf was born in Iowa, graduated from Grinnell College in Iowa, and then became an instructor in the Yankton College, teaching English. She is a member of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mpls Journal on America 2/17/24

Snow a Joy to Reel Troops of '24, but Was Different Story in '77

(NEWS photo)

Nathan Harrington (Neal Hamilton), D. W. Griffith and George Washington (Arthur Dewey), l. to r., drank hot coffee toast to weatherman for delayed snow delivery.

(NEWS photo)

Picturing barefooted Continental troops was cold, realistic job for these actors.

IN GEORGE WASHINGTON'S camp in 1777 snow meant privation and suffering for the troops in Valley Forge, but to D. W. Griffith and his actors at Mamaroneck yesterday it brought joy, for it made the picture "America" possible.—Story on page 29.

Union (Ore) Hudson Dispatch 2/7/24

Tacoma (Wash) Ledger 2/10/24

Morning Telegraph Feb 17 1924

Griffith Rebuilding Big Sets for "America"

D. W. Griffith and his force, states a wire from New York, are busy rebuilding the towns of Lexington and Concord, destroyed when the recent gale hit Mamaroneck and Paul Revere is recovering from a block eye received when he bumped into one Washington during the blow.

Chicago

It is said that the present journey of Aaron Jones to the Big Town has to do with the marketing of a contract for the showing of "America." The Griffith spectacle would make an excellent bid here for "The Ten Commandments" at the Woods. However, if there is truth in the rumor that D. W. G. and William Randolph Hearst had dealings in a certain place, it will naughty go to the Hearst-ian Brothers & Kate being aware and with D. Hearst [illegible]

Toledo (O) News 2/10/24

~~MANY STARS IN~~ GRIFFITH FILM

Well Known Players Added to Cast of Patriotic Picture, "America."

[illegible]

CAROL DEMPSTER as she looks in "America," David Wark Griffith's latest cinema production, which opens at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre on the eve of Washington's Birthday.

THE NEW WAY OF STUDYING HISTORY—[illegible]

Buffalo (N Y) News 2/1/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 2/10/24

My Dm P News Feb 23 1924

Griffith Modifies Title for "America"

[illegible]

Following my Feb 10 1924
Kinch-Press

Photoplay Magazine March 1924

THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL. "Don't shoot till you see the whites of their eyes!" U. S. Regulars posed this historic battle picture for D. W. Griffith's new movie, "America."

"AMERICA"—A Film of the Revolution

A revel in Colonial days in Northern New York, with Lionel Barrymore as Walter Butler, leader of the "blue-eyed Indians"

The eve of the America Revolution. Paul Revere warning the American farmers that "the British are coming"

Carol Dempster (at right) as Nancy Montagu, the heroine in "America"

Neil Hamilton (at left), cast by D. W. Griffith in the rôle of hero in his latest picture

George Washington — a remarkable impersonation by Albert Dewey

Grand Forks (ND) Herald Feb 9 1924

Gregus-Pabedger Feb 9 1924

Former Teacher at Yankton College Takes Role of Court Lady in Movie

MISS ZENITA GRAF

New York, Feb. 8.—Chosen as the perfect type of court lady from among a group of beauties of foreign titles, including a Duchess and three Countesses, Miss Zenita Graf, formerly a teacher at Yankton college, S. D., has been selected for the last of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Miss Graf was born in Iowa, studied dramatic art in Boston, Mass., and then taught dramatics in the Yankton Institution of learning. She is a member of the P. G. E. sorority.

Bismarck (ND) Tribune Feb 10 1924

SNOW STORM IS VERY OBLIGING TO MR. GRIFFITH

Comes Just in Time for Him to Finish "America" on Schedule

With a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got his snow-storm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture, "America," which opens at the 44th Street Theatre the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary War. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the day of snow

Through the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of Infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions all that time for the first snow flakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" uuntil Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north to the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

With the opening of the picture set for next Thursday, it became necessary for all scenes to be finally arranged in the picture Tuesday night that the negative might be turned over to the cutters for final assembly of the finished print.

So the weather man and fate carried the suspense to within forty-eight hours of disaster before obliging with a real snow that will carry the bloody footprints of Valley Forge into "America."

My American 2/16/24

Seattle (Wash) Times Feb. 10. 1924

'AMERICA' HAS BIG CAST

D. W. GRIFFITH IS DIRECTING FILM FOR D. A. R.

Famous Photoplay Will Be Given Its Premiere in New York City This Month.

A number of prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which Griffith is making for the Daughters of the Revolution as their contribution to the country-wide sesquicentennial celebration of the freedom of this country.

When "America" has its world-premiere at the 44th Street Theatre, New York, February 21, theatre-lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year.

Other Well-Known Players.

Other well-known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, Mexican revolutionist and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents, who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Founded Art Theatre.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theatre in Kansas City, Mo., and gave up the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sydney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known to film fans as a few years ago he was to light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who played in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore, with Olga Netherosle, Richard Mansfield, and other stars too numerous to mention.

James Clarence Melville, another stage veteran of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to become an important role in "America."

Davenport (Ia) Dem-Leader 2/16/24

Open Campaign to Stop Rumors About Pictures

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which despite their falsity gain the dignity of facts thru wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than serious news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation to the effect that D. W. Griffith had spent $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complications in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the original period which prevails in the picture.

When the incident reached the press, it had swollen into a film epic catastrophe, all thru idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in taking the revolutionary battle scenes at Lexington, when two cases containing six thousand feet of negative were wanted for two hours. The story later spread that the loss of negative had done damage and severely hurt.

Bronxville (NY) Home News Feb 13 1924

D. W. Griffith announces that his new Revolutionary War production, which will have its first showing on Feb. 21, at the 44th Street Theater, will be called "America. Series 1—The Sacrifices." This title has been given to avoid confusion as to the theme, since this film emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence, and because Griffith hopes to make into pictures the rest of a series of elaborate productions portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Washington (Pa) Observer Feb 10 1924

Motion Pictures Discover America

French Revolution Now Exhausted; Ours Comes Next

My Eve Journal Feb 15 1924

At the Screen Door

Former South Dakota Teacher Wins Movie Honors

News-Dispatch Feb 11 1924 Wilmington "N.C." Dispatch 84

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

14

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN, the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something. Griffith's result of this suggestion proved not only making the de- patriotic film, but leading historians, men, de[illegible] societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is had everything pitching him and if everything goes according to schedule "America" [illegible] as the new film has been named, should surpass even "Birth of a Nation," "Intolerance," or any other film during [illegible] which Griffith is now working. This is in part to its patriotic nature, [illegible] has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times [illegible] where the great [illegible] our first war were [illegible] in part to the unusual [illegible] which Griffith is making [illegible] of building replicas of [illegible] buildings which must [illegible] drama written about [illegible] Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society being Revolutionary descendants and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of a big battle scene—state militia reports were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in southern states. A number of such attempts were stopped by State troopers in New York, and the pirated scenes did not reach the screen until the new Griffith picture had been released.

The authenticity of Griffith's production is "leaving" nothing to be desired, and he is convinced of the fact that to stage a production of this sort of the War of Independence and even earlier in the history of the United States, he must have the cooperation of the United States Army. He has found it, and more than that, he has found a company of players who are willing to live and perform exactly as the men who fought for the independence of our country did. The soldiers who are taking part in the production are not "extras" in the sense that they are being paid for their services, but they are being fed and housed at the expense of the Government, and they are being paid the same wages they would receive if they were in the service of their country. Thousands of men who have served their country in the World War are among the players, and they are being paid the same wages they would receive if they were in the service of their country.

Although it would seem that there would be no difficulty in getting men to take the parts of the soldiers, there was a great deal of difficulty in finding men who could ride horses. This difficulty was overcome by the cooperation of the Cavalry Division of the United States Army, which furnished men who could ride horses and who were able to take the parts of the soldiers of the Revolutionary period. The men who were selected for the parts of the soldiers of the Revolutionary period were all men who had served in the World War, and they were all men who had served their country in the World War, and they were all men who had served their country in the World War.

Much of the filming of "America" is being followed with great interest by the general public, and society people are being invited to see the production. The production is being made in the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chamberlain called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our eastern coast never used horses, but fought afoot. Chamberlain has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

D. W. Griffith who made "America"

Irma Harrison as Miss Dorothy

most widely known as an author of love stories, has written a number of historical novels, and is generally regarded as one of the best posted men in the country on the Revolutionary period. He has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chamberlain called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our eastern coast never used horses, but fought afoot. Chamberlain has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the cases and treasure chests of their museums, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, spurs, and drums, to garments and costumes crumbling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props" in "America," historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

Griffith's aim in preserving historical accuracy has been achieved largely through the establishment of a special bureau of research. This innovation, which has proven so successful, that the motion picture industry is contemplating establishing a similar institution under the directorship of Will H. Hays, czarina of Hollywood and movieland who was here for months before the opening week, driving through the principal public and private collections of books, documents and prints for minute information.

Although it would seem that there would be no difficulty in getting men to take the parts of the soldiers, there was a great deal of difficulty in finding men who could ride horses. This difficulty was overcome by the cooperation of the Cavalry Division of the United States Army, which furnished men who could ride horses and who were able to take the parts of the soldiers of the Revolutionary period. The men who were selected for the parts of the soldiers of the Revolutionary period were all men who had served in the World War, and they were all men who had served their country in the World War, and they were all men who had served their country in the World War.

Much of the filming of "America" is being followed with great interest by the general public, and society people are being invited to see the production. The production is being made in

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the "thrill-hunter," likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practised by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

So said D. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a historical feature, founded on the story of the American Revolution—was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director paused for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and customs at that period. The pictures had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed by heirs and kinsfolk of the period had been taken out of their cedar chests to add necessary human-interest details to the more prosaic and prosaic records of historical documents, a curious periodicals and yellow volumes that the book of the Revolution, and the Revolution, and the Revolution, and

Screen Mirror

Carol Dempster in "D. W. Griffith's "America"

Fascinating Carol Dempster, remembered in several outstanding "D. W. Griffith pictures," will be seen this month as the leading woman in Mr. Griffith's epic of Revolutionary days, "America," made for the Daughters of the American Revolution. The premier is scheduled for February 21, in New York City. Miss Dempster is seen here with a few of the feathered players in the new film.

Sioux Falls ($D) Press Feb 7 1924

FORMER S. D. TEACHER IN GRIFFITH'S PLAY

Yankton, S. D., Feb. 6.—Every once in a while South Dakota springs into the lime light through the prominence of a son or daughter who has won fame or national attention. This time a former South Dakota woman has "put one over" on the aristocrats of Europe in competition for a place in a court scene in a projected scenario. South Dakota has plenty of real aristocrats as well as bronco busters, and she has a few who look the part.

Chosen as the perfect type of court lady from among a group of bearers of foreign titles, including a duchess and three countesses, Miss Zinita Graf, formerly a teacher at Yankton College has been selected for the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America" the photodrama of the War of Independence.

86

WAR DEPARTMENT
RECRUITING PUBLICITY BUREAU
GOVERNORS ISLAND, N. Y.
OFFICIAL BUSINESS

PENALTY FOR PRIVATE USE, $300.

RECRUITING NEWS

A BULLETIN OF RECRUITING INFORMATION ISSUED BY DIRECTION OF THE ADJUTANT GENERAL OF THE ARMY

FEBRUARY 15, 1924

N.Y. Eve Journal Feb 16 1924

FORT MYER CAVALRYMEN STORMING CAMERA

LIONEL BARRYMORE AND CAROL DEMPSTER.
In D. W. Griffith's "America" opening Thursday at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

The 1923 Battle of Bunker Hill

By Captain GEORGE T. SHANK, 18th Inf.

Doughboy Depiction More Comfortable and Less Perilous Than History-Making Event of '75

LATE last September an American Expeditionary Force, consisting of the 18th Infantry, supplemented by a small detachment of the 16th, left its quarters in New York Harbor for a location in the hills of southern New York near the quaint old village of Somers. The mission of these troops was not to represent their country in battle, but on the contrary to play the part of their quondam enemies, the British Regulars, in the stirring scenes of Revolutionary history to be depicted for the first time on the silver screen, to serve as an indelible record of the patriotic deeds of our forefathers.

Now to go back and furnish the background for this strange expedition which astonished the sober countryside with the sights and deeds of armies long dead, and filled the green hills of Westchester County with the colorful scarlet and buff of the Grenadier Guards, the Royal Welsh Fusileers and the Light Infantry of His Majesty's Army in the Colonies.

These troops of the famous 1st Division were part of the army of actors to be used in the filming of the play "America," staged by that master genius of the movies, Mr. D. W. Griffith. A reconnaissance party preceded the expedition by several days, and, having met Mr. Griffith and his very able staff, soon caught the spirit of the place. It was found to be a patriotic production long dreamed of and now to be actually staged. It had had its inception in the minds of many, including that of our late President, and had the able assistance of the Daughters of the American Revolution and other historical societies, all of which were interested in placing on record an accurate reproduction of the historic events which erected in this country a liberty.

A pyramidal tent camp was established near Brewster, N. Y., water piped in, and the first day spent in getting acquainted with the various sorts of variegated uniforms of the British, Colonials, French, Tory Greens and Morgan's Riflemen. White wigs effected quite a transformation, it was found, and long flintlock rifles and bayonets afforded quite a contrast to the sight of a soldier in conventional O. D.

The troops were drilled for a short time in the facings and in forming fours, style of 1775, somewhat similar to the present British drill. Quickly becoming proficient in this they progressed to the manual of arms, which in those days was quite a complicated process, something like this:

1. Poise your firelocks, 2 motions (carry piece to center of body, barrel to rear).
2. Cock your firelocks, 2 motions.
3. Present, 1 motion (six inches to rear with right foot, butt to shoulder, ready for firing).
4. Fire, 1 motion.
5. Half cock your firelock, 1 motion (bring piece to port and fire cock hammer).
6. Handle your cartridge, 1 motion (slap your pouch, seize cartridge, bite the top well off).
7. Prime, 1 motion (shake the powder into the pan of the lock).
8. Shut your pan, 2 motions (close pan and bring piece to the order, barrel resting beside left toe, butt to the front, muzzle at center).
9. Charge with cartridge, 2 motions (place the cartridge in the barrel, shaking the powder into the barrel and then inserting the paper and ball).
10. Draw your rammers, 1 motion (draw the ramrod with the right hand).
11. Ram down your cartridge, 1 motion (bring muzzle opposite left shoulder and ram down with the right hand).
12. Shoulder your firelocks, 2 motions (left hand to butt, assuming position of left shoulder arms).

Tactics were found to be quite different from those of the present day. The fundamental principles of fire and movement were used, but the armies of 1775 fought in company front, close order, the front rank firing a volley, then handing back the empty pieces and taking the muskets of the rear rank for another volley. Battles of that age doubtless made a brilliant display, but the method of fighting seems suicidal to soldiers trained to take wide intervals and seek cover.

Real work began the second day by staging the Battle of Johnston Hall, fought in Tryon County, New York, near the stronghold of Sir John Johnston, Commissioner [illegible] Iroquois. This was followed by the Retreat from Lexington and Concord, the Battle of Merriams Corners, various other marches and small engagements, and ending up with the Battle of Bunker Hill and the surrender at Yorktown.

Perhaps the most [illegible] celebrated battle in America was that of Bunker Hill. This was staged with the greatest possible accuracy in [illegible] and will no doubt afford the best showing in the actual [illegible] of the battle. [illegible] the British regulars and Tory [illegible] on Bunker Hill. The British [illegible] and [illegible] steadily up the hill to the [illegible] 19th Infantry Band [illegible] they practiced [illegible] of the hill, the Grenadiers on the right. The troops were heavily laden and carried knapsacks. They delivered volleys with the regularity of a full dress parade and moved steadily onward right up to the breastworks, where Prescott gave that famous command, "Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes," and in the volleys that blazed from the rifles of the Minute Men the Grenadiers and Light Infantry lost from three-fourths to nine-tenths of their men.

The charge was repeated with like results. Then the third charge was made, but without knapsacks. This time the Red Coats held their fire and stormed the redoubt and breastworks with the bayonet. They went clear over, gaining a tactical victory, but with a loss of over twenty-five hundred men. Their victory was hard-won results.

The coming of this battle [illegible] [illegible] It was an inspiring sight to see the long lines of troops in triple rank, uniformed in bright scarlet coats [illegible] black leggins and cocked [illegible] up the hill to the [illegible] 19th Infantry Band [illegible] they practiced [illegible]

(Continued on Page Eleven)

THE BEGINNING OF THE LEXINGTON [illegible]

Chicago (Ill) Post 2/16/24

Publicity Editor

Brooklyn Eagle Feb 17 1924

N.Y. Morning Telegraph Feb. 17 1924

The Movie

Springfield (Mass) Motion Picture World 2/23/24

N.Y. Herald 2/17/24

N.Y. World Feb 17 1924

87 Columbus Despatch – Ohio Feb 17-24

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practised by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took H. W. Gould, one of the leading motion picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a concert feature founded on the story of the American Revolution—was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director paused for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and customs at that period. The story has been built at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed by heirlooms and boxes of the period had been taken out of their dusty tombs to add necessary humor-interest details to the more prosaic and private records of historical documents in current periodicals.

"Do you really believe that the story of the flapper took place during the Revolutionary period?" he was asked.

"Positively," he directly answered. "The letters and diaries I found back of it all proved when the women dressing the course revolution, the women for the emotion but always been organized. The men had obeyed in the long and the conservative manner. Letters and diaries gave us exactly what happened to Patricia and Gilbert, and Gilbert's sister Betty, and the Major Andre.

"But what do you think of the flapper of today? Do you think it is a good thing, or a bad thing?"

"Why, I think it is a good thing, and a bad thing, rather both, emphasized the emphasis in the one hand, the good thing you get in the flapper the original considerations of all the women folks.

"Girls that have made bad show and work in life is what is also the flapper is of all of it. Girls that of days take and manners of work sary evils; but it didn't require much pressure to make them revolt.

"Many men these days make remarks which are rather derogatory to the ladies, but they're not a patch on what they used to say in those days of old when knights were bold and supposedly gallant."

AND from one of the many books of reference the following extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, a distinguished Massachusetts clergyman, in Boston, is taken:

"When I hear an inquisitive gentledame inquire what dress the Queen is in this week, what the modus operandi of the court, I look at her as the very glassard of a trifle, the product of a quantize of a cypher, the epitome of nothing," scolded the dominie. "She is fitter to be looked, if she were of tinkable substance, than either to be honored or honored."

This concept was brought to Mr. Griffith's attention.

"Oh, yes, the ladies were used to that sort of thing, especially in New England. But they had lots of fun on the side."

"How did they compare with the modern girl as described recently by Dr. Charles Smith, of Roanoke College?" he was asked. "He drew a perfectly horrible picture of her as a hard-drinking, cigarette-puffing Amazon."

He smiled her on the ground that she was so extremist; that she hadn't found herself yet, and was the victim of rapid economic and industrial changes which has left her without an anchor.

"It is a matter of fact," he replied quietly, "the modern girl has found herself. The flapper has taken exactly the place to come into her own, but she has done it very consistently.

"Do the ladies of yesterday, for instance, the addition of some lighter diversion to our, it seems to us, rather monotonous life? It seems to us that the modern girl has taken the place of the 1776 belle, indulged in private dances, and drinks. King George was the first drinking authority, and the traditions of a far off time vanish.

"Of course, she wasn't supposed to go. But we found records where girls dressed up in huge clothes and attended these affairs. It is recorded as the wonder of the social season in the annals of a Northern family that a prominent young lad had attended a dance and had fainted when she entered the crowd, protested on shaved sticks, and was thus discovered."

"But did the girl of the 1776s break loose? How was the flapper born, and who was the ringleader?" was the next on the list of questions.

"After Washington became President he imposed on the men wearing powdered hair, but the ladies continued in going unscathed and the father of his Country was far too wise to interfere with them. He had plenty of troubles without that.

"Dorothy Quincy was the first flapper. At least she was the first flapper dancer who became known for her reckless and jovial capering. She was also very much joined in the Dragon set.

"In the end, the modern flapper didn't find and he's a labour, originated in the time.

"Betsy Ross was considered the most beautiful girl in America, and most admired by King George. Marrying her in London, he had her a dance, composed, and in 1776 have been most beautiful flower in the country but I don't know that had ever taken to drink there. The other contender was found in a young girl's diary, where she wrote that she should be married before she was 18, and that her husband should be her king.

"The beautiful Evelyn was 18 that year and that aspects of the age in dancing at the Court, and when the person joined the company in taking the hat of Pennsylvania, she which the first time made to Eve, the good

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter,' likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

Because this Amazing of 1924 likes bobbed hair, short skirts and sports costumes she is denounced as bold and bad, but——

The colonial flapper openly revolted against the powdered wig, petticoats and refused petticoats to powder her hair

Wicked liquor or cocktails are supposed to be the thirsty cost spoils and the bottle. The latest bobbed hair is today, but——

The first girl of the American Revolution was only 18, pretty and owner of a dance composed in the famous "Minuet" dance away and died at the age of twenty-seven.

"There was much indignation expressed publicly and privately against this emancipation of women. Why, Dr. Smith was very polite when he called the modern girl an Amazon. That's a compliment to her athletic appearance, her high spirits and indomitable will. In the old days they named the up-to-date girls 'daughters of Zion'—and much worse.

"AND, just as the girls of today enjoy dances which originated on the Barbary Coast, the girls of then used to originate dances founded on the 'scalp' and other wild Indian dances. No, indeed; they didn't confine their terpsichorean efforts to the minuet. They had plenty of others, such as the Allemand Valleys, De la Cunes, the Innocent Maid, the Successful Campaign, Priest's House, Blue Bonnet and Orange Tree."

"What about rouge and powder?" it was demanded.

"Surely they used rouge and powder," he replied, "but after the women stopped powdering their hair, it was the men who used most of it. Not only on their hair did they use it, but on their faces also. All the dandies carried powder puffs, which they used frequently.

"Men in those days used to go over to London and then come back and show all kinds of dog. Whatever the styles were on the Continent the Colonists used to exaggerate when they returned home. They would wear three watches, for instance, and the colors of the silks and velvets of which their elaborate costumes were made were at times very much more brilliant than they had found on the other side.

"All, or nearly all, of the personal dandyism, however, was killed before the war. George Washington himself used to wear very rich fabrics of velvet and silk, but they were always of the plain kind. Hancock was a great dandy. It wasn't the house guests who used to go to those Boston coffee; it was the most important one of the day.

"But it is to be noted that the needs of the dandies and their mothers was a very healthy one, and when they formed the society Sons of Liberty and Daughters and had of late their wives being the friends, the of the real wholesome, brilliant young girl of today."

88

Syracuse N.Y. Post Standard
2-17-29

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those investigations from the lips of their own folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impertinency practiced by femininity in 1929, there is a corresponding parallel to be found in the records of the social season of 1779."

It took H. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to gather the data which led to these conclusions.

Incidentally, Griffith, in his story of the American Revolution, was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director passed for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and morals at that period. The sequences had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and price charts and letters owned by prominent families of the period had been taken out of their cedar chests to aid necessary period dresses to be made from photos of dresses owned by the original wearers in colonial generations.

The film reflects that the days of the Roaring Twenties during the Revolutionary period, to use slang, "had nothing on us."

Prostitution, in diverse unusual diversions, the dives and cabins of Grand Street, if it could show on screen, would be a thrill to the man who invented the angle camera, but the women had always been conservative. The loss and decadence in the long period intervening, and the wives and daughters were so nearly the equals of their husbands and fathers in morals and manners that it was a long time before the Revolution was ended.

"Of course, the women had their vices, but they were not quite so numerous as those of the men, and they were not quite so flagrant. Women were the weaker vessels, and they had to be careful of their reputations, for men could not be trusted to be gentlemen in their presence.

"

Photoplay Mag. Chicago March 1924 — 99 — Brooklyn Motion Picture Mag. April 1924

"AMERICA"—A Film of the Revolution

A revel in Colonial days in Northern New York, with Lionel Barrymore as Walter Butler, leader of the "blue-eyed Indians"

The eve of the American Revolution. Paul Revere warning the American farmers that "the British are coming"

Carol Dempster (at right) as Nancy Montagu, the heroine in "America"

Neil Hamilton (at left), cast by D. W. Griffith in the rôle of hero in his latest picture

George Washington — a remarkable impersonation by Albert Dewey

Photograph by Diem

CAROL DEMPSTER

Carol Dempster's friends will tell you that Carol dreams not of stellar honors on the screen but of an operatic career, for which she studies whenever she is not engaged with her screen work. But, in the meantime, David Wark Griffith has again selected her as his heroine. The film is the spectacle of "America," which has now occupied him for months

Jersey City Journal 2/14/24 — Jy Tribune 2/17/24 — Jy American 2/17/24 — Jy Telegram Feb. 18 1924

The Plain Truth About a Moving Picture Studio

CAROL DEMPSTER as she looks in "America," David Wark Griffith's latest cinema production, which opens at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre on the eve of Washington's Birthday.

NEW GRIFFITH FILM ON NATIONAL HOLIDAY

90

2-17-24

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charms, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent women.

"Notoriously traditional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the dress of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and statesmen; when they imbibed the doctrine of the infallibility of these aforesaidsies from the lips of their own folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous woman of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by feminity in 1924, there is a corresponding precedent to be found in the records of the social season of 1776.

"It took G. W. himself, one of the leading matrimonial prizes, not about a million and a half to make the above statement, but it took him more than two years to settle the fate which lay in their conflicting "Women—in spite of the spirit founded on the stuff of the American Revolution—were serving conditions of the English lords on their island when the Revolt passed off and left them to give some interesting glimpses of life and manners of that period. The girls who took home made of the regard of the American Revolution women and British officers proved to be the most interesting of the lot. Their letters to their lady friends in various parts of the country, and their diaries, are full of gossip and scandal, and are a mixture of the modern high school girl's "line" and the gossiping letters of our great grandmothers in various parts of the country.

"Perhaps the most interesting of the lot are those of the Tory girls, who were the daughters of the English officers who had come to America to fight the Revolution. Their letters to their friends in England are full of the gossip of the day, and they show that the girls of that period were as much given to flirting and as much interested in the opposite sex as the girls of today are.

"The diaries and letters of these girls show that they were as much given to the use of cosmetics and powder as the girls of today are, and that they were as much given to the use of cigarettes and cigars as the girls of today are. The only difference is that the girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

"Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

"The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"

St. Louis (Mo) Globe-Democrat 2/17/24

91

The Battle of Bunker Hill, as seen by D. W. Griffith in his new picture, "America," with United States regular army men taking the parts of both British and Continental army soldiers.
Wide World Photo.

Feb 23 1924

TIMES SQUARE DAILY

GRIFFITH'S 'AMERICA' DRAWS $3,295.50 FOR TWO PERFORMANCES YESTERDDAY

Revolutionary Feature Hits New York With a Smash —Cost $950,000 to Make—Skeptics Predicted a Flop, but Were Fooled—Readying Road Shows

Griffith's "America" seems to have hit with a bang at the 44th Street, where it opened on Thursday night. Yesterday (Washington's Birthday) there was a sell-out at the matinee performance, with the net going to $1,672, while the night, with some second night seats out, rang up $1,622.50 at the box office, making $3,294.50 on the day. In addition an advance of about $1,500 for today's and tomorrow's performances was taken.

That looks as though the skeptics who after the opening performance stated that this picture had about as much chance as any other historic feature had of getting big money at the box office. At the matinee yesterday the specs started operating, and they were getting 100 per cent. advance on the street for the stuff that they managed to dig from the box office.

On the morning before the picture opened the length was in 16 reels. There was some cutting before the evening performance, but not quite enough. Griffith is still working on the picture, and by tomorrow it is believed that it will be down to the regular running length.

A discussion regarding the picture last night showed that the total production cost was in the neighborhood of $950,000, which takes in all the incidental expense that was incurred during the last few weeks of the making of the picture, when production was held up because of the lack of snow for the shooting of the Valley Forge scenes.

Generally it is believed that the Griffith idea is to flood the country with road shows of "America" and thus accomplish a clean-up on the Revolutionary period before the "Janice Meredith" pictures get around.

After the opening performance a question whether or not the English rights to the picture would be saleable arose, with a number of people entering the belief that because of the fact that the British received defeat at the hands of the Colonists the picture would not get across in Great Britain. Those, however, was combatted by the fact that a slight change of titling could readily be made that would show that it was the independent Englishman who was responsible for the growth of America, and this fact would make the English all the more ready to accept the picture. Albert Gray, who is handling the picture, stated last night that after the opening performance an offer of $500,000 for the rights to the United Kingdom had been made and rejected.

"America" Crowning Achievement for Griffith

Griffith and his horsemen have done it again over at the 44th Street with "America." The natural historic interest that the picture contains reaches its height in the depicting of Paul Revere's ride, midway in the first half, this being unquestionably due to the manner in which the director has presented it. Following a story from the pen of Robert W. Chambers, the theme is set in the Revolutionary period concluding with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

The picture seems to slow up towards the latter stages of the initial half and never again picks up the enthusiasm touched by that ride, although a second solo gallop is revealed in the after intermission period, as well as Griffith's well-known capabilities of picturing a body of horsemen on a rescue mission. Most of the later stanza is taken up with the story itself, and there is undeniably room for deletion. Running 164 minutes, the film is over long and suffers thereby.

Nevertheless it's a splendid production from whatever angle you take it and can not miss at the box office. The camera work is remarkable, even if Griffith has inserted a few of the same type of "phoney" background double exposure flashes that he used in the "Nation," besides projecting a uniform performance from the cast that is on a par with the qualifications the picture calls for.

Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Erville Alderson, Charles E. Mack, Arthur Dewey and Lionel Barrymore are the six principal players, with there being a wealth of lesser lights. Camera men are listed as Hendrik Startov, G. W. Bitzer, Marcel Le Picard and H. S. Sintzenich.

The underline on the title signalizes the picture as being of Series One with this first release of the unit, in turn, named as "The Sacrifice for Freedom."

It has been reported that this latest of Griffith specials about equals his "Way Down East" in cost, which would place the total in the neighborhood of $950,000. Besides which the effort gained its initial impulse through a request from the Society of Daughters of the Revolution.

The picture is there. Of that there can be no question, and it is simply further proof that Griffith not only has, but can still stage 'em and stage 'em right.

Toledo (Ohio) News-Bee Feb 13 1924

A MOVE launched on the coast some time ago to eliminate exaggerated references to the salaries of players and productions is to be encouraged generally thruout the industry, according to present indications. The plan has the unofficial sanction, at least, of the Hays organizations. It is felt that loose talk of millions has a dangerous effect on legislators in Washington who are usually well informed on developments in the picture business. The point is made that arguments used to bring about legislative relief are injured by the more or less careless use of figures on the part of zealous publicity men. As an instance, the Griffith offices say that published reports credit the director with spending about $200,000 in retakes for "America" when, as a matter of strict truth the basis for the report was the fact that during one scene, Griffith ordered a retake because one costume was not of the Revolutionary period.

"America" at South Norwalk.

SECRET trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour showing, and this will have to be cut down before it opens on Broadway, February 21. Incidentally, the official title of the new special is now "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." This has been done in order to avoid confusion as to the theme, and because of the fact that Mr. Griffith hopes to make a series of separate films portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Chicago Tribune

Sons of Revolution of Virginia

Editorials.

E. Walton James, Editor

QUARTERLY MAGAZINE 39

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH—PATRIOT

With David Wark Griffith's visit to Revolutionary Virginia, a stimulating memory in the mind of most of us, it is timely to consider what he is doing for his country in producing "America," whose cost of production will run into millions before it appears on the screen.

The business layman will say "Oh, he'll get it back pressed down and running over." Undoubtably true. Why shouldn't he if, as it is true, he is helping to build a cathedral of patriotism instead of laying the bricks of sensation for $8.00 a day?

What is this structure that is being built, with infinite pains, day after day, under the super-artistic direction of Griffith? It is that indefinable patriotism that is divorced from the glamor of the recruiting station. It is a patriotism that makes us, on bended knees, thank the God of Nations that we have religious, civil and political liberty, a lasting heritage from the men who died from Bunker Hill to Yorktown.

Today our national life is like a slave. We are perforated with the buckshot of bolshevism, socialism, industrial unrest, moral and moral laxity. While we chase the almighty dollar, and hit the high spots, slowly but surely our foundations of government are being undermined.

The memory of what men did at Trenton and Valley Forge, Concord and Lexington, is like a fairy legend, a thing for school histories and George Washington's birthday advertisement. Back these methods of perpetuating history place a veil over the Holy of Holies, where our ark of patriotism is cloistered. We are selling our birthright for a mess of political hodge-podge. We are hiding Americanism under a mask; making Democracy a jester in the drama of nations. We are reversing the world-circling challenge of Henry. Today we say "Give me death rather than liberty." Our wish gradually is being granted, while we wallow in efficiency and the theories of an up-to-date Constitution. The compass of nationalism has been smashed. Our rudder of thrift lost in the rising waves of commercialism. In peaceful, vaunted arrogance we failed to hear the roar of waters that are eating at the dam of constitutional liberty. We have forgotten the rugged steps by which our forebears ascended to the pinnacle of liberty. We have no patriotism because we have had no national sorrow in a century and a half. We need a great awakening, and David Wark Griffith is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness." No man can see "America" without having his patriotism born, or better, reborn.

If a reverence for every tradition of the War for Independence, love of historical accuracy, ability to take pains, high idealism and exhaustive research, expenditure of unlimited means, will accomplish the rebirth of patriotism than Mr. Griffith will do it.

Was it an easy task, in this day of sex plays, society dramas and Wild West horse riding, to secure enough financial backing for this stupendous production. Ask Mr. Griffith. His answer will surprise you.

David Wark Griffith will go down in history as a patriot because he has seen the impending storm and stands in the watchtower, signal light in hand. He is the Paul Revere of 1924. Every patriotic society in this nation should rally to his support, with an official endorsement of "America." Two lights shine in the old North Tower and he is ready to ride. God speed him!

Monmouth (Ill) Review January 25 1924

ILLINOIS BOY AS GEO. WASHINGTON

Oakland Tribune Sunday Feb 17 1924

San Francisco (Cal) Herald 2/17/24

My American Feb 22 1924

D.W. Griffith's 'America' Opens at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre; Ralph Lewis Has Own Company

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH is himself again. After dabbling for months in inconsequential film tales, he returned last night to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre with "America," which is by far the best thing that he has made since "Way Down East."

There are those who may even say that it is better. Certainly the lighting effects, the photography and the dramatic action constitute competition that "Way Down East" fails to meet, or any other Griffith production, for that matter.

"America" is an improved and modernized edition of "The Birth of a Nation." In many ways they are very much alike—differing, of course, in the causes that led up to the rebellions. If Mr. Griffith had not used the title "The Birth of a Nation" in his first picture, it would be an admirable title for "America," which, in reality, tells of the causes that led up to the Revolution, with the colonists' demand for freedom and the real birth of a new nation.

"America" is what the trade motion picture papers would call an audience picture. It has all that emotional appeal that wakens a sure response in the breast of every good American, and it is bound to arouse a sense of patriotism in the most indifferent soul.

In the past I have taken issue with Mr. Griffith because he has not always supplied himself with a story worthy of his directorial efforts. In "America" he has taken no such chance, but with Robert W. Chambers as the author he has had a mai ntheme, a romance in which two young people are a part of the happenings of those exciting days.

Of those two central figures, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton, honors go to Miss Dempster, who has been looked upon heretofore as merely a pretty young ingenue. She gave everyone a surprise with her performance of Nancy Montague by blossoming out as a full fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown, perhaps, even to Mr. Griffith. In the scene where her young brother dies she is especially good, matching her acting with her beauty.

Neil Hamilton gives a very fair account of himself, although he is outplayed both by Miss Dempster and Charles Mack, who is another protege of Mr. Griffith. Young Mack plays Charles Montague, son of the Virginia aristocrat who meets his death fighting with the Americans.

There is such a wealth of historical data associated with the period of 1776 that no one producer could possibly touch it all. Mr. Griffith has left unfilmed enough material to furnish at least three other productions. For example, he has not pictured Washington crossing the Delaware and he has only scratched the surface of the Winter at Valley Forge, showing only a few of the terrible privations suffered by the American troops.

The high light in the picture is the ride of Paul Revere, who rushes over fences and through growth to warn the citizens in the villages of Lexington and Concord of the approach of the British. The old North Church, with replicas of the Revere lanterns, were used to set this scene.

We have the Battle of Bunker Hill, the conflict at Lexington and Concord Bridge, all these things bringing back our history to us and making us better understand some of the suffering that our ancestors endured to found our Republic.

I feel in comment Mr. Griffith for his introduction of George Washington, in the past he has been portrayed in a side profile view. In "America" he is made to face the camera, and the resemblance that have made Abraham Lincoln, Mark Twain, Joseph Jefferson and Ben Franklin famous, Washington has Abraham Lincoln's nose, Mark Twain's hair, Joseph Jefferson's mouth and Ben Franklin's spectacles. Mr. Griffith has not yet found the man who looks like Washington, but he has made a good choice in the man who will do so when he does.

The story is charming and the love interest is beautiful. Mr. Griffith has not let the romance overshadow the story of the Revolution, but has woven it into the background of conflict a perfectly charming love story. It is all very upsetting and exciting, and it is quite beyond our imagination that the audience on the opening night actually sat in its seats without once leaping up and bellowing. For our own part, we only wanted a little help in the matter. If some one had only turned to us and said: "Come on, let's give a whoop!" we certainly should have left our seat for a time.

"America," of necessity episodic in construction, is marked by an almost continuous shift of locale, and still with this difficult situation to face, Mr. Griffith with his superb grasp of the subject, has kept his play remarkably free from involved situations. Unquestionably the force part of the picture is more perfectly worked out than the latter, and still the picture is so distinctly superior that the slight let-down toward the end does not affect its appeal.

In this hurried moment time should be taken to say that Miss Carol Dempster, the heroine, Mr. Neil Hamilton, the hero, Mr. Lionel Barrymore and Louis Wolheim are their parts to splendid style. The titles by Mr. Chambers are as sparkling and as brief and as the between as to be surprising, and the work of Mr. Griffith himself, to simply magnificent.

Shortly hand talk is continuing the twin sale and the box sale. The only criticism that could be lined has slight one that is creeping out its double thing there was at times a jarring note of the action. The drama was too much subordinated to the development of the spectacle.

Mr. Griffith introduces his audience to a company of very attractive and efficient players. Even if he has not shown and the pick that is now with the stars in the cast of Lionel Barrymore, he has made of the part of Washington a character of dignity and strong dramatic interest. Lionel Barrymore is a gifted actor, and he has made the character of Walter Butler, the Tory, a thing of fine dramatic power. Louis Wolheim, who is a well known character actor, has given a fine portrayal of Sir Ashley Montague, the Tory, and Charles Emmet Mack, who is a young actor of great promise, has given a fine portrayal of Charles Montague, the Virginia aristocrat who dies fighting with the Americans.

Mr. Griffith has a gift for discovering unknown talent, and he has made the most of it in this production. Among the unknowns who are seen in important roles are Lucille La Verne, who is a character actress of the first rank, Riley Hatch, Lee Beggs, Frank McGlynn, Jr., Arthur Dewey, Frank Walsh, Arthur Donaldson, Harry O'Neill, Harry Semalis, Hugh Baird, Michael Donovan, Emil Hoch, Edwin Holland, Daniel Carney, Louis Wolheim, Kate Bruce, Mae Marsh, Erville Alderson, Charles Bennett, Sidney Deane, W. W. Jones, E. Roseman, Riley Hatch, Louis Wolheim and others; story and titles by Robert W. Chambers; directed by David W. Griffith. At the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

LIONEL BARRYMORE and Carol Dempster in "America," the new Griffith screen production, which opened at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre last night.

22 1924

DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY

NOTABLES ATTEND OPENING OF GREAT GRIFFITH PICTURE

Movie folk galore and others prominent in social and civil life were on hand last night to see D. W. Griffith, famed for "Way Down East" and "Dream Street," do himself proud with his new massive production, "America." It was D. W.'s biggest night in a long time, and loud, lasting calls for the director brought but a faint and broken worded response from the overcome Mr. Griffith.

It was Carol Dempster, the star's, night too. When the heroine of "America—Series One" emerged from the theatre arrayed in a gorgeous gown of pale pink chiffon, trimmed with turquoise ribbons, a summer ermine wrap, a tea rose coquettishly placed in her chestnut brown curly hair, some admirer stepped forward and presented her with a splendiferous bouquet of white roses, and the crowd—on one side of the curtain—laughed and cheered.

But something—some one—was drawing a song toward the other end of the lobby. This Market Street Tab, that had been on its way out of the theatre, the stage-door lady, Mae Marsh, Mae Murray, Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster, Charles Emmet Mack, Louis Wolheim, Erville Alderson, Charles Bennett, Sidney Deane, Arthur Donaldson, Arthur Dewey, Frank McGlynn, Jr., Frank Walsh, Harry O'Neill, Harry Semalis, Hugh Baird, Michael Donovan, Emil Hoch, Edwin Holland, Daniel Carney, Lucille La Verne, Riley Hatch, Lee Beggs, Kate Bruce, Frank Bennett, Charles Mack, Jack Dempsey, Jack Curley, Jack Dempsey's manager, Jack Curley, Jack Dempsey's manager, Jack Curley, Jack Dempsey's manager

St. Louis (Mo) Globe-Democra 2/17/24

91

The Battle of Bunker Hill, as seen by D. W. Griffith in his new picture, "America," with United States regular army men taking the parts of both British and Continental army soldiers.

Wide World Photo

Feb 23 1924

TIMES SQUARE DAILY

GRIFFITH'S 'AMERICA' DRAWS $3,295.50 FOR TWO PERFORMANCES YESTERDDAY

Revolutionary Feature Hits New York With a Smash —Cost $950,000 to Make—Skeptics Predicted a Flop, but Were Fooled—Readying Road Shows

Griffith's "America" seems to have hit with a bang at the 44th Street, where it opened on Thursday night. Yesterday (Washington's Birthday) there was a sell-out at the matinee performance, with the net going to $1,672, while the night, with some second night seats out, rang up $1,622.50 at the box office, making $3,294.50 on the day. In addition an advance of about $1,500 for today's and tomorrow's performances was taken.

That looks as though the skeptics who after the opening performance stated that this picture had about as much chance as any other historic feature had of getting big money at the box office. At the matinee yesterday the specs started operating, and they were getting 100 per cent. advance on the street for the stuff that they managed to dig from the box office.

On the morning before the picture opened the length was in 16 reels. There was some cutting before the evening performance, but not quite enough. Griffith is still working on the picture, and by tomorrow it is believed that it will be down to the regular running length.

A discussion regarding the picture last night showed that the total production cost was in the neighborhood of $950,000, which takes in all the incidental expense that was incurred during the last few weeks of the making of the picture, when production was held up because of the lack of snow for the shooting of the Valley Forge scenes.

Generally it is believed that the Griffith idea is to flood the country with road shows of "America" and thus accomplish a clean-up on the Revolutionary period before the "Janice Meredith" pictures get around.

After the opening performance a question whether or not the English rights to the picture would be saleable arose, with a number of people entering the belief that because of the fact that the British received defeat at the hands of the Colonists the picture would not get across in Great Britain. Those, however, was combatted by the fact that a slight change of titling could readily be made that would show that it was the independent Englishman who was responsible for the growth of America, and this fact would make the English all the more ready to accept the picture. Albert Gray, who is handling the picture, stated last night that after the opening performance an offer of $500,000 for the rights to the United Kingdom had been made and rejected.

"America" Crowning Achievement for Griffith

Griffith and his horsemen have done it again over at the 44th Street with "America." The natural historic interest that the picture contains reaches its height in the depicting of Paul Revere's ride, midway in the first half, this being unquestionably due to the manner in which the director has presented it. Following a story from the pen of Robert W. Chambers, the theme is set in the Revolutionary period concluding with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

The picture seems to slow up towards the latter stages of the initial half and never again picks up the enthusiasm touched by that ride, although a second solo gallop is revealed in the after intermission period, as well as Griffith's well-known capabilities of picturing a body of horsemen on a rescue mission. Most of the later stanza is taken up with the story itself, and there is undeniably room for deletion. Running 164 minutes, the film is over long and suffers thereby.

Nevertheless it's a splendid production from whatever angle you take it and can not miss at the box office. The camera work is remarkable, even if Griffith has inserted a few of the same type of "phoney" background double exposure flashes that he used in the "Nation," besides projecting a uniform performance from the cast that is on a par with the qualifications the picture calls for.

Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Erville Alderson, Charles E. Mack, Arthur Dewey and Lionel Barrymore are the six principal players, with there being a wealth of lesser lights. Camera men are listed as Hendrik Startov, G. W. Bitzer, Marcel Le Picard and H. S. Sintzenich.

The underline on the title signalizes the picture as being of Series One with this first release of the unit, in turn, named as "The Sacrifice for Freedom."

It has been reported that this latest of Griffith specials about equals his "Way Down East" in cost, which would place the total in the neighborhood of $950,000. Besides which the effort gained its initial impulse through a request from the Society of Daughters of the Revolution.

The picture is there. Of that there can be no question, and it is simply further proof that Griffith not only has, but can still stage 'em and stage 'em right.

Toledo (Ohio) News-Bee Feb 13 1924

A MOVE launched on the coast some time ago to eliminate exaggerated references to the salaries of players and productions is to be encouraged generally thruout the industry, according to present indications. The plan has the unofficial sanction, at least, of the Hays organizations. It is felt that loose talk of millions has a dangerous effect on legislators in Washington who are usually well informed on developments in the picture business. The point is made that arguments used to bring about legislative relief are injured by the more or less careless use of figures on the part of zealous publicity men. As an instance, the Griffith offices say that published reports credit the director with spending about $200,000 in retakes for "America" when, as a matter of strict truth the basis for the report was the fact that during one scene, Griffith ordered a retake because one costume was not of the Revolutionary period.

"Ny Telegraph Feb 13 1924

"America" at South Norwalk.

A SECRET trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour was held yesterday at the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk, Ct., before a specially invited audience. The film was in eighteen reels, requiring a four-hour showing, and this will have to be cut down before it opens on Broadway, February 21. Incidentally, the official title of the new special is now "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." This has been done in order to avoid confusion as to the theme, and because of the fact that Mr. Griffith hopes to make a series of separate films portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Sons of Revolution of Virginia

Editorials.

W. Malcolm James, Editor

QUARTERLY MAGAZINE 39

DAVID MARK GRIFFITH—PATRIOT

With David Wark Griffith's visit to Revolutionary Virginia, a stimulating memory in the mind of most of us, it is timely to consider what he is doing for his country in producing "America," whose cost of production will run into millions before it appears on the screen.

The business layman will say "Oh, he'll get it back pressed down and running over." Undoubtably true. Why shouldn't he if, as it is true, he is helping to build a cathedral of patriotism instead of laying the bricks of sensation for $8.00 a day?

What is this structure that is being built, with infinite pains, day after day, under the super-artistic direction of Griffith? It is that indefinable patriotism that is divorced from the glamor of the recruiting station. It is a patriotism that makes us, on bended knees, thank the God of Nations that we have religious, civil and political liberty, a lasting heritage from the men who died from Bunker Hill to Yorktown.

Today our national life is like a sieve. We are perforated with the buckshot of bolshevism, socialism, industrial unrest, social and moral laxity. While we chase the almighty dollar, and hit the high spots, slowly but surely our foundations of government are being undermined.

The memory of what men did at Trenton and Valley Forge, Concord and Lexington, is like a hazy legend; a thing for school kiddies and George Washington's birthday advertisement. Even these methods of perpetuating history place a veil over the Holy of Holies, where our ark of patriotism is cloistered. We are selling our birthright for a mess of political hodge-podge. We are hiding Americanism under a mask; making Democracy a jester in the drama of nations. We are reversing the world-circling challenge of Henry. Today we say "Give me death rather than liberty." Our wish gradually is being granted, while we wallow in efficiency and the theories of an up-to-date Constitution. The compass of nationalism has been smashed. Our rudder of thrift lost in the rising waves of commercialism. In peaceful, vaunted arrogance we failed to hear the roar of waters that are eating at the dam of constitutional liberty. We have forgotten the rugged steps by which our forebears ascended to the pinnacle of liberty. We have no patriotism because we have had no national sorrow in a century and a half. We need a great awakening, and David Wark Griffith is "the voice of one crying in the wilderness." No man can see "America" without having his patriotism born, or better, reborn.

If a reverence for every tradition of the War for Independence, love of historical accuracy, ability to take pains, high idealism and exhaustive research, expenditure of unlimited means, will accomplish the rebirth of patriotism than Mr. Griffith will do it.

Was it an easy task, in this day of sex-plays, society dramas and Wild West horse riding, to secure enough financial backing for this stupendous production. Ask Mr. Griffith. His answer will surprise you.

David Wark Griffith will go down in history as a patriot because he has seen the impending storm and stands in the watchtower, signal light in hand. He is the Paul Revere of 1924. Every patriotic society in this nation should rally to his support, with an official endorsement of "America." Two lights shine in the old North Tower and he is ready to ride. God speed him!

Monmouth (Ill) Review January 25 1924

ILLINOIS BOY AS GEO. WASHINGTON

My American Feb 22 1924

My Morning Telegraph Feb 22 1924

D.W. Griffith's 'America' Opens at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre; Ralph Lewis Has Own Company

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH is himself again. After dabbling for months in inconsequential film tales, he returned last night to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre with "America," which is by far the best thing that he has made since "Way Down East."

LOUELLA O. PARSONS

There are those who may even say that it is better. Certainly the lighting effects, the photography and the dramatic action constitute competition that "Way Down East" fails to meet, or any other Griffith production, for that matter.

"America" is an improved and modernized edition of "The Birth of a Nation." In many ways they are very much alike—differing, of course, in the causes that led up to the rebellions. If Mr. Griffith had not used the title "The Birth of a Nation" in his first picture, it would be an admirable title for "America," which, in reality, tells of the causes that led up to the Revolution, with the colonists' demand for freedom and the real birth of a new nation.

"America" is what the trade motion picture papers would call an audience picture. It has all that emotional appeal that wakens a sure response in the breast of every good American, and it is bound to arouse a sense of patriotism in the most indifferent soul.

In the past I have taken issue with Mr. Griffith because he has not always supplied himself with a story worthy of his directorial efforts. In "America" he has taken no such chance, but with Robert W. Chambers as the author he has had a mat ntheme, a romance in which two young people are a part of the happenings of those exciting days.

Of those two central figures, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton, honors go to Miss Dempster, who has been looked upon heretofore as merely a pretty young ingenue. She gave everyone a surprise with her performance of Nancy Montague by blossoming out as a full fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown, perhaps, even to Mr. Griffith. In the scene where her young brother dies she is especially good, matching her acting with her beauty.

Neil Hamilton gives a very fair account of himself, although he is outplayed both by Miss Dempster and Charles Mack, who is another protege of Mr. Griffith. Young Mack plays Charles Montague, son of the Virginia aristocrat who meets his death fighting with the Americans.

There is such a wealth of historical data associated with the period of 1776 that no one producer could possibly touch it all. Mr. Griffith has left enough material to furnish at least three other productions. For example, he has not pictured Washington crossing the Delaware and he has only scratched the surface of the Winter at Valley Forge, showing only a few of the terrible privations suffered by the American troops.

The high light in the picture is the ride of Paul Revere, who rushes over fences and through yards to warn the citizens in the villages of Lexington and Concord of the approach of the British. The old North Church, with sentinel of the Revere lanterns, was used to set this scene.

We have the Battle of Bunker Hill, the battle at Lexington and Concord Bridge, all these being brought back not blurred by age and seeming as fresher reminiscences of the patriotism that our ancestors endured to found our country.

I pass in comment the portrait of Lionel Barrymore as George Washington, in the part in the film, prepared to be a very human one. It benefits by a more gentle treatment than have some other portraits that have made Washington looks like a dull, stupid, dull man. Arthur Dewey, who plays Washington, should be an actor of distinction, for he has the part and Mr. Griffith and he have given the role of Washington a fine interpretation.

There could be no comment on this without a tribute to the Revolutionary Dames, who, by their presence, gave to the film a dignity and a charm that it could not have had without them. Their presence, perhaps, added more to the success of the film than any one thing, because it was their ancestors who were the heroes of the Revolution and they were proud of the fact.

Mr. Griffith's "America" is a production that will be talked about for years to come. It will be a delight to those who like to see their history, their traditions and their ancestors portrayed on the screen in a manner that will make them feel that they are a part of the history of the country.

There will be much in the film to criticize, especially in the battle scenes, but it is a great story, a great theme, and it will be a great pleasure to see it.

Mr. Griffith has gone back to his own country, to the home of his ancestors, and he has brought to us a picture that will be a delight to all who love their country and who are proud of the fact that they are Americans.

There were many of the Daughters of the Revolution present last night—women who can boast of ancestors who took part in the stirring scenes that Mr. Griffith has filmed, and they, with those who know their American history, prophesy a successful run for this latest Griffith production.

FORTY-FOURTH STREET THEATRE—"America," a D. W. Griffith production, with story and titles by Robert W. Chambers. Historical arrangement by John L. E. Pell.

THE CAST:

Nathan Holden.....Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague.....Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague.....Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague.....Charles Emmett Mack
Patrick Henry.....Frank McGlynn, Jr.
George Washington.....Arthur Dewey
Captain Walter Butler...Lionel Barrymore
General Gage.....W. W. Jones
Paul Revere.....Harry O'Neill
Captain Hare.....Louis Wolheim

* * *

IN all the brilliant assemblage at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre last night there was no one who watched every scene in "America" any more keenly than did Marion Davies, who entertained a party of relatives and friends at the Griffith premiere. Miss Davies, having just had her own first night of "Yolanda," with all the nervous strain that attends such an event, understood Mr. Griffith's anxiety that everything should go smoothly. She is also making "Janice Meredith," Paul Leicester Ford's story of the Revolutionary period, and naturally she was eager to see Mr. Griffith's picture, which does not touch on the dramatic scenes that are featured in "Janice Meredith."

* * *

LIONEL BARRYMORE and Carol Dempster in "America," the new Griffith screen production, which opened at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre last night.

22 1924

DAILY NEWS, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY

NOTABLES ATTEND OPENING OF GREAT GRIFFITH PICTURE

Movie folk galore and others prominent in social and civil life were on hand last night to see D. W. Griffith, famed for "Way Down East" and "Dream Street," do himself proud with his new massive production, "America." It was D. W.'s biggest night in a long time, and loud, lasting calls for the director brought but a faint and broken worded response from the overcome Mr. Griffith.

It was Carol Dempster, the star's, night too. When the heroine of "America—Series One" emerged from the theatre arrayed in a gorgeous gown of pale pink chiffon, trimmed with turquoise ribbons, a summer ermine wrap, a tea rose coquettishly placed in her chestnut brown curly hair, some admirer stepped forward and presented her with a splendiferous bouquet of white roses, and the crowds on one side of the corridor applauded and cheered.

[illegible]

David W. Griffith — Richard Barthelmess

GRIFFITH'S TOUCH STILL MAGIC, "AMERICA" PROVES

By McELLIOTT.

Title: "AMERICA."
Type: HISTORIC DRAMA.
Directed and Produced by D. W. GRIFFITH.
Produced in the 44TH STREET THEATRE.

The first half of Mr. Griffith's "America" is all charm; the second half, all war. No one can outdo him in the films when it comes to charm, and he has a flair for battle scenes which serves him well in such a tale as this.

Charles Emmet Mack

It is only the flimsiest love tale he has picked to run, bright threaded, through this gory picture of the Revolution. But it's such a delicately imagined love—that of the good plowman (Neil Hamilton) for the fine lady (Carol Dempster)—that you are moved to contemplate the two young things with a sympathy belonging to friends, not to shadows on a motion picture screen. This, undoubtedly, is tribute paid Mr. Griffith, but in the flashing eyed, grim, young Mr. Hamilton he had fine material; and about Carol Dempster, slim and ardent and impulsive, there is a fragrance as of that elusive thing, charm, itself.

However, these are the lighter touches. War, grim and strident and ugly, is the background against which move such figures as Lionel Barrymore, Louis Wolheim and Riley Hatch. Barrymore's Capt. Butler is an evil, though dashing, character sketched in with dark strokes, while Wolheim's drawing of Capt. Hare is unforgettable. [illegible]

Lionel Barrymore and Carol Dempster

[illegible]

My Free Journal Feb 23 1924

"AMERICA" BRINGS FORTH CHEERS AS WONDERFUL SPECTACLE UNFOLDS

Distinguished Audience in Uncontrolled Enthusiasm at Premier of Another Griffith Masterpiece.

STORY HAS GREAT SETTING

Love Tale Interwoven With Stirring Events Immortal in History of United States.

FORTY-FOURTH STREET THEATRE — "America," Series One, "The Sacrifice." Motion picture written by Robert W. Chambers and produced and directed by D. W. Griffith.

The Cast.

Nathan Holden.....Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague.....Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague.....Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague.....Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams.....Lee Beggs
John Hancock.....John Dunton
King George III.....Arthur Donalson
William Pitt.....Charles Bennett
Lord Chamberlain.....Downing Clark
Thomas Jefferson.....Frank Walsh
Patrick Henry.....Frank McGlynn, Jr.
George Washington.....Arthur Dewey
Richard Henry Lee.....P. R. Scammon
Captain Walter Butler.....Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague.....Sidney Deane
General Gage.....W. W. Jones
Captain Montour.....E. Roseman
Chief of Senecas, Hiakatoo.....Harry Semalls
Paul Revere.....Harry O'Neill
Captain John Parker.....H. Van Bousen
Major Pitcairn.....Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker.....James Milaldy
Colonel Prescott.....H. Koser
Major General Warren.....Michael Donovan
Captain Hare.....Louis Wolheim
Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Brant..Riley Hatch
Marquis de Lafayette.....H. Paul Doucet
Edmund Burke.....W. Rising
Personal servant of Miss Montague, Daniel Carney
Household servant at Ashley Court..E. Scanlon
Lord North.....Emil Hoch
A Refugee Mother.....Lucille La Verne (by special courtesy)
Major Strong.....Edwin Holland

By THOS. B. HANLY.

D. W. Griffith's long heralded picture, "America," or the first of a series under that title, called "The Sacrifice," had its premier performance last night at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre before a particularly distinguished audience.

Viewed from any standpoint, this latest production of a great director must be called a masterpiece of exquisite photography, flawless direction and of blood-stirring, appealing force. Upon a screen of well-night limitless dimensions the man has projected the immortal story of the sacrifices of the American colonists to win freedom from the British crown, and he or Robert W. Chambers, the author, has interwoven in it all the love romance of a Tory maid for a patriot soldier and officer as it was beset y the machinations of Walter Butler, whose name is forever anathema to the northern counties of New York and the eastern territory of Pennsylvania.

Cheers From Audience.

Around this story he has thrown the great scenes which last night brought cheers from the audience. With photography which often resembles etchings in their delicacy, he has shown now in Virginia, now in Massachusetts, now in Philadelphia, great men and great events. You see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty in Boston. George Washington, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Jefferson, John Adams pass before you, and you shift to England, the palace of King George III, or Parliament with Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies.

You have Paul Revere's ride and the wonderful fight at Lexington and Concord. There is Bunker Hill and Valley Forge. The first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

Inserting Photographs.

The eye is scarcely permitted to rest on some wonderful photograph of continental architecture, interior or exterior, some gatherings of the aristocrats of Virginia or the Puritans of Massachusetts, before it is filled with a great vista of woodland and mountain and a battle raging thereon. Back and forth the director throws his shuttle and Chambers seems to perhaps the only word to express it all.

Brindy, Justice Montague of Virginia and his family are strong adherents of King George. His daughter, Nancy, and his son, Charles Edward, have been presented in court in London, and he has received letters from the British Whig, to the Williamsburg Gazette from his agent, Nathan Holden, a newspaper man, Hanson, who has been sent to get the views of Patrick Henry, that the Whigs have decided that if Boston be refused to pay taxes and stick to tea, military will be employed to make officers and soldiers of the Crown, and the Boston Tea Party, and the Boston Massacre, and the Boston Tea Party, and the Boston Massacre, and the Boston Tea Party, and the Boston Massacre

My Morning World Feb 22 1924

My Herald Feb 22 1924

My Eve Journal Feb 22 1924

My Eve Post Feb 22 1924

My Eve Globe-Sun Feb 22 1924

THE NEW FILM

AT THE 44TH STREET.

"AMERICA."

David Wark Griffith presents a historical motion picture play written by Robert W. Chambers, with arrangement by John L. E. Fell. Art director, Charles M. Kirk. Photographers, Hendrick Sartov, G. W. Bitzer, Marcel Le Picard and H. S. Sintzenich. Assistant director, Herbert Sutch. Film editors, James and Rose Smith. Scenic artist, Charles E. Boss. Directed by Mr. Griffith.

The Cast.

Nathan Holden	Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague	Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague	Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague	Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams	Lee Beggs
John Hancock	John Dunton
King George III	Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt	Charles Bennett
Lord Chamberlain	Downing Clark
Thomas Jefferson	Frank Walsh
Patrick Henry	Frank McGlynn Jr.
George Washington	Arthur Dewey
Richard Henry Lee	F. R. Scammon
Captain Walter Butler	Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague	Sidney Deane
General Gage	W. W. Jones
Captain Montfort	E. E. Rosecoe
Chief of Senecas, Hiakatoo	Harry Semels
Paul Revere	Harry O'Neill
Captain John Parker	H. Van Buren
Major Pitcairn	Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker	James Milady
Colonel Prescott	H. Koser
Major General Warren	Michael Donovan
Captain Hare	Louis Wolheim
Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Brant	Riley Hatch
Marquis de Lafayette	H. Paul Doucet
Edmund Burke	W. Rising
Personal servant of Miss Montague	Daniel Carney
Household servant at Ashley Court	F. Scanlon
Lord North	Emil Hoch
A Refugee Mother	Lucille La Verne
Major Streng	Edwin Holland

The mightiest thrill which we have ever met in the cinema is the ride of Paul Revere in "America." And the new historical romance which is on view at the 44th Street Theatre is the most stirring thing of its kind ever made. We are back on Park Row after seeing it, and we are still shaky.

It is possible for us to speak straightforwardly about our own opinion. Here is a motion picture which will set a new standard of achievement in the picture play fully as high and as commanding as Mr. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" set in its day. By virtue of this latest product of the man from Mamaroneck, Mr. Griffith, for our own part, passes definitely into the ranks of those whom we think of as being the immortals. And America once more may go serenely about the development of its newest art confident that the peer of all film directors is one of her own.

If we ever have been a little uncertain in the matter of pre-eminence in the picture directing field, we know now that it has been merely because of Mr. Griffith's long periods of absence from the screen. We simply had forgotten the genius which is his. Now we know. There is no one in the world who could have inspired actors, pictured emotion, revealed patriotism, wrung hearts, made drama, as Mr. Griffith has done in "America."

To have approached a theme basically episodic, whose action was laid over such vast territory, and to have moulded it into a good play cannot but appeal to othe admiration of playgoers everywhere. If in the overwhelming task of piecing it together there may be found an occasional moment in which one is puzzled by the terrific rush of events or the continuance shifting of location, one will scarcely consider it important. Nor will the fact that "America" is of extreme length cause a great deal of difficulty. To those who are caught by its spirit, it could not be too long.

In making this drama of the days when the forefathers gave birth to the idea of separating themselves from a tyrant rule, Mr. Griffith and Mr. Robert W. Chambers have succeeded in weaving a lovely and absorbing romance into a background of strife and sacrifice on the battlefield. Romance and spectacle are deftly and admirably interlocked. A tender and lovable Nancy Montague is acted by Miss Carol Dempster in the finest performance of this young woman's career, and Nathan Holden is the personification of sturdy, heroic, handsome Americanism as played by Neil Hamilton.

In the steady rise to its climax, this love story is made human and sweet and compelling by an admirable display of sincerity in sub-titling on the part of Mr. Chambers, and it is given vigor and dash by the most utterly alive combat pictures which the theatre or any one else ever has made. A method of softly waning photography binds them and saturates them in the whole.

While there is no end to praise in "America" the outstanding thing, perhaps, this is an utterly complete play, the running from start to finish of an idea, the presence of a central theme, the gradual building up of the plot, the slowly mounting of the fire, the decision that followed and the conclusion there is a whole, fine, artistic product.

Romantic and yet virile, and filled with perfect human appeal and the spirit of freedom, as it is in every line of the story, there is not a person who rides on theatre, who does not feel the stirring of the blood and the quickening of the pulse. It is a story of the days when men were men and women were women, and it is a story of two hours of pleasure and of inspiration. It is a story of the Revolution. It is a story of the Revolution. It is a story of the Revolution

Quincy (Ill) Journal January 25 1924 92

Hoopeston (Ill) Chronicle 1/25/24

Marion (Ill) Gazette January 26 1924

Toledo (Ohio) News 2/13/24

Arthur Newland, a Son of Colchester Postmaster, to Play George Washington

ARTHUR NEWLAND AS GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Added interest to the great motion picture production "America," is given in this locality in the fact that Arthur Newland, a native of Colchester, McDonough county, has been chosen by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray "George Washington." His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Newland, have been residents of Colchester many years, and his father has held the office of post master there for 28 years. He was born in Colchester 45 years ago and received his education in the schools there. He left Colchester in 1907, to go on the stage, and his last visit there was three years ago in June.

His stage name is Arthur Dewey, and he was chosen from among more than 100 applicants, including many noted stars, for the role of the Father of his Country because of his striking physical resemblance to the first President. He is exactly six feet tall, and Washington in his letters to his London tailor described himself as that height.

Griffith is filming the photodrama of the War of Independence under the title of "America," for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Most of those appearing in the cast are descendants of Revolutionary families, and one of the ancestors of Arthur Newland was Ashabel Smith, who answered the summons of Paul Revere. Newland, besides being a successful actor, has made a deep study of American history, and brings to the role a sympathetic understanding of Washington's character and a remarkable knowledge of the most intimate details of his ideals, moods, habits and costumes. It is said he is not merely acting Washington — he is living the role.

He became a familiar figure to the theatergoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," with Kibble & Martin, and has since been in a number of motion pictures.

Mr. Newland is married and his wife also is on the stage.

Mr. Newland's younger brother is a rural mail carrier out of Colchester.

ILLINOIS BOY SELECTED AS "WASHINGTON"

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected by D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first President, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatergoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the Battle of Lexington.

Illinois Boy Is to Portray Character of Washington

ARTHUR DEWEY

Arthur Dewey, a native of Illinois, well known throughout this state as an actor, has been selected to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage.

He became a familiar figure to the theatergoers of this state through his portrayal of Simon Legree in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Kibble and Martin, and has since been seen in a number of motion pictures.

Dewey is exactly six feet tall. In Washington's letters to his London tailor he described himself as "just six feet and of medium build."

Like most of those appearing in "America," Dewey is a descendant of Revolutionary families, one of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, having answered the summons of Paul Revere and fought valiantly at the battle of Lexington.

Poking Around A Movie Studio For A Day

In a movie studio with Artist Roland T. Scott.

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, Feb. 13.—Sometimes this entire little world seems to be tucked away within the four walls of a movie studio. Furniture and garb of every known period and place may be found. And certainly all the human emotions that send this old globe spinning around, from "Ambition" down—are there!

We were standing off in a corner of the big Griffith studio, near here, watching D. W. himself tell Lionel Barrymore how to go "thru the motions." Other actors of lesser caliber stood motionless, listening.

• • • •

GRIFFITH gets up at 5 a. m. Often he skips breakfast. They tell a story that he suddenly remembered one night at 10 o'clock that "By George, I forgot to eat anything today!"

Many scenes, that take but 30 or 60 seconds to flash on the screen, consume an entire day in filming. This holds true in all studios.

• • • •

ONE day I was visiting a certain movie studio, internationally famous. On the big floor, a busy scene, indeed, were screen celebrities known in the most remote corner of the world.

One whole company, making a war film, was standing about doing nothing. The star, a temperamental young woman, was arguing with the owner of the company. Her name had been in big electric lights on Broadway, advertising the film she was making. But the day before the sign had come down and the name of another star of the company, equally noted, went up.

That made the young woman in question very, very angry. And the following day the sign of her rival came down!

• • • •

IF there is one thing that amazes the visitor more than any other one thing at a movie studio, it is the carpentry work in preparation for a big set.

Before a scene is taken, the director's conception of the garden or house, or street—or whatever it happens to be—is given to architects. The latter make blueprint drawings, and these drawings are turned over to carpenters, who go ahead building the set according to specifications, just exactly as they would build a skyscraper!

Usually one scene is being "shot" in one end of a studio while carpenters are working on another in the opposite corner.

• • • •

NOT one person in a thousand of the unknowns who yearn to break into pictures could stand the strain of the world's most trying industry. So don't envy the beautiful girls whose smiling faces you see on the screen. Behind that smile lie hours of mental torture.

Brooklyn Eagle Feb 13 1924

"America" Opens Feb. 21.

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary War picture, which is to open Feb. 21 at the 44th Street Theater. It will be officially called "America, Series One —The Sacrifices." This is done to avoid confusion as to the theme, since the dramatic story Mr. Griffith has produced emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence.

Mr. Griffith hopes to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures portraying the dramatic story of America's development.

Belvidere (Ill) Republican February 6 1924

Danbury (Conn) News 2/14/24

GRIFFITH PICKS ILLINOIS BOY AS "GEORGE WASHINGTON"

[illegible] of Illinois, will [illegible] throughout this state [illegible] D. W. Griffith, the famous motion picture director, to portray George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence he is filming for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Dewey, chosen from among more than one hundred applicants, including a number of Broadway stars, because of his striking physical resemblance to the first president, was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He is known to his neighbors and intimates as Arthur Newland, having assumed the name of Dewey when he went upon the stage. [illegible]

THE EMPRESS.

"America" Has Premier Showing Here To-morrow.

[illegible] patrons of Danbury and vicinity will have the unusual opportunity to-morrow and Saturday of seeing the premier presentation of the latest screen production by David Wark Griffith when "America" will be shown at the Empress. The showing of the film here precedes its New York presentation, where such large productions generally have their premier showing. Not only will this be of more than usual interest to Danbury, but the fact that the producer and members of his technical staff, as well as some of the leading players in the picture are expected to be here.

When some of the principal scenes of "America" were being filmed near Somers, N. Y., last fall, many Danbury people went there to watch the work and see for themselves the magnitude of the production. Lionel Barrymore and Lionel Barrymore have the leading roles in the pretty love story running through the play. The romance was written for the screen by Robert W. Chambers, the noted novelist. The story is built, as its name indicates, on the history of America, and many scenes in American history are said to be faithfully reproduced in the picture. Hundreds of Valley Forge soldiers took part in both scenes. Famous characters in history are portrayed on the screen during the course of the play. Owing to the length of the photoplay, but one showing will be given at the evening performance. The matinee will commence at 2 o'clock and the evening performance at 7:30 o'clock.

[illegible]

FORTY-FOURTH STREET THEATRE

Albion (Ill) Register 1/31/24

ILLINOIS BOY AS GEORGE WASHINGTON

[illegible]

Pottstown (Pa) Ledger 2/15/24

First Real Snow of Winter Proved 'Life Saver' to Noted Film Producer

[illegible] Sunday's snow, the first of the season which covered the ground, was a "life saver" to David W. Griffith, world famous motion picture producer, now engaged in preparing the historical film "America," for distribution.

With a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture, "America," which opens at the Fourth-Fourth Street Theatre, New York, the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of vital importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his big action along the heights of the Schuylkill, where the American army spent the winter of the Revolutionary War. These dying days with a November evening the day of [illegible].

Through the courtesy of the United States Weather Bureau at Washington, Mr. Griffith was informed that there was no prospect of snow for the immediate future. Since then he has been waiting under instructions at that time for the first snow flakes as a signal to move to the encampment.

The pathetic[illegible] of open weather in this section changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to avoid the additional days that would have been necessary to go north to the snow line for Valley Forge scenes.

With the cutting of the pictures set for next Thursday, it became necessary for all scenes to be finally arranged in the picture Tuesday night that the negative might be turned over to the cutters for final assembly of the finished print.

[illegible] was fashed to New York immediately after the snow arrived. Big backgrounds and the camera were brought to Valley Forge, where in the [illegible] Monday. But then the weather man got into action and [illegible] to which Griffith [illegible] snow [illegible] the [illegible] of Valley Forge for "America."

Baltimore Sun Feb 17 1924

NO U.A. MEETING HELD SATURDAY

Griffith's Absence Caused Postponement

[illegible]

Washington Star Feb 17 1924

Campaign To Stop Silly Rumors Is On

Speakers From Will Hays Organization Will Point Out Dangers Of Giving Out Misinformation

[illegible]

This Little World

[illegible]

D. W. GRIFFITH MAKES AMERICA FOR THE D. A. R.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule America as the new film has been named, should surpass even the Birth of a Nation.

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in America can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy; that 250,000 feet of film has been used already, and more than 10,000 persons have appeared in the scenes; that thousands of regular army soldiers drafted for the purpose through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks, camped more than a fortnight in Putnam county to appear in a few scenes; and that when completed the picture will actually have cost more than a million dollars.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of America is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth invaluable relics of the revolution, ranging from pistols, spurs, and drums, to garments and costumes crumbling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props," in America, historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

The noted director was also fortunate in having the personal aid of Robert W. Chambers, the author, who not only wrote the charming love story which runs through America, but personally accompanied Griffith and his players out on location.

Also aiding Griffith from the historical side, is John L. E. Pell, who made the historical arrangement of America. Pell may be remembered as author of Down to the Sea in Ships, the film of New Bedford in its whaling days. He has been a life-long student of New England history.

During the filming of the battle scenes, Griffith has also had the benefit of the advice and aid of United States army officers. Indeed the filming of several scenes at Somers, Putnam county, New York, were in fact United States army infantry maneuvers, with

Owing to the monuments and modern buildings which now occupy and surround the sites of the principal revolutionary engagements, Griffith found it impossible to stage his bigger scenes, dealing with huge bodies of moving men, on the actual scene of these battles.

So, after his technical staff had visited the principal battlegrounds, and with the aid of ancient documents and maps visualized Lexington Green, Concord Bridge, Breed's Hill, Dorchester Heights, and the other leading battlefields of New England, Griffith had constructed at Somers, New York, a set more than seven miles in extent. And with the assistance of army officers and historical advisors this vast area was laid out as an exact reproduction of the various fields where the chief engagements of the war were fought.

Under the direction of regular army officers an encampment for several thousand soldiers, with complete water supply, commissary, electric and sanitation plants was made, and a similar one for Griffith and his large company of players. The whole encampment covered a neighboring hillside to the extent of a square mile.

Special trains carried the 16th infantry from Forts Schuyler and Hamilton, and the 16th Infantry from Governor's Island, together with a 35 piece band from Fort Slocum, a commissary corps in command of Lieut. De Witt, and a medical unit under Capt. N. T. Davis into the camp at Somers.

Reserve cavalry units assembled under command of Capt. Love of the reserve forces, formed the largest such unit ever brought together outside of war maneuvres.

Other special cars and automobiles brought Griffith, his players, technicians and advisers—a company of more than a thousand.

And the battle was on.

Griffith had extended an invitation to the general public to be present. And the general public came. The roads leading into Somers were black with traffic. They came afoot, they came in automobiles; they came in ancient horse-drawn rigs, they came on bicycles—they came until at times there were 15,000 of them scattered over nearby hillsides. At times it seemed as though the whole of Putnam county had stopped work and left its farms and its firesides to watch America in the making.

If the reader will put himself or herself in the place of one of these hurrying spectators, he will see as he passes along the road to Somers, first the vast encampment, for weeks the home of Griffith and his players, and the section of the United States army. There is a military atmosphere about the place, with its neat barracks, yet the figures moving about make it seem strangely unlike a military camp.

Indians in warpaint, and colonial damsels mingled with scarlet-coated grenadiers, soldiers in the buff and blue of the continental army, and minutemen in homespun. Should the reader have happened along at lunch time he would have found this motley mass besieging the commissary, and have seen British redcoats and revolutionary heroes chatting affably over two mugs of steaming coffee and two appetizing sandwiches; D. W. Griffith himself, standing between a major of the United States army and General Prescott of Bunker Hill fame; a very up to date movie cameraman borrowing a very modern match from one of the immortals of Lexington Green.

Ascending the summit of a nearby hill, which overlooks a broad and spacious valley, and gazing into the valley, the reader would have seen spread before his or her eyes a whole colonial settlement, with Lexington Common, the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very foreign wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like machines, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts and technicians, directed his players and United States soldiers, reliving a battle of the War of Independence.

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

D. W. Griffith, who made America.

Lionel Barrymore, who had his first motion picture training under Griffith in the old Biograph studio, was engaged for the role of Walter Butler, the villain of the Revolution. After looking over thousands of actors, Arthur Dewey was engaged to portray Washington, and Arthur Donaldson the role of King George Third.

Miss Carol Dempster plays the leading woman's role, that of Nancy Montague, with Neil Hamilton playing the hero. Scores of other well known actors are in the cast.

The English court scenes were supervised by Sir Percy Sykes, of London, England, formerly in command of the British forces in Persia, who has been thrice introduced at the English court, as well as at those of India, Persia and other eastern countries, and who is a recognized authority on formal court procedure.

Several ambassadors have been among the distinguished guests who have watched the filming of scenes.

And the Daughters of the American Revolution, who inspired the making of this photodrama to express not only the romance, but the high ideals of the founders of the republic are jubilant over their brain-child of America.

Exhibitors Trade Review March 1 1924

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY EVE FOR OPENING

'America,' New Griffith Production Has New York Premiere

WHEN 'America,' D. W. Griffith's drama of the War of Independence, is world premiered at the Lyric Theatre in New York on Washington's Birthday eve, Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton will be a trio of other stars in the cast, including Lucille La Verne, attracting a great deal of attention by her splendid performance as a prominent stage personality and Irma Harrison, who made her mark in the film of The Hairy Ape, another film of two seasons ago.

Besides these there are scores whose work here has been in movies but with the spoken drama probably the best known are Mr. Arthur Houghton, Estelle Archer, Denis Edwin H. Paul Lane, Mr. Charles Bennett, [illegible] that with such a cast the picture will [illegible]

Exhibitors Trade Review March 1 1924

Brunswick Courier Journal 2/17/24

TONING DOWN PUBLICITY

[illegible] Griffith's base publicity agent is sending out a notice to the effect that the motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign to teach actors and other movie employes to quit talking—that is talking "wise and smart." The point seems to be that more disagreeable publicity, the press agent avers, have arisen between movie companies, outside which sometimes proved to be misinformation, and to the end it has reached the point, he says, where it is not publicity desired.

"Facts will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization," the announcement reads, "pointing out that certain pictures which are to receive complete cooperation and therefore complete in supporting rather than adverse news."

The announcement goes on to point out that simple court proceedings being the finding of "Friday" will not be the "Friday" in the [illegible] Mayor John Hylan, [illegible] of which that is to be the feature of the [illegible] Friday.

Of course, the details of the Mayor's proposed campaign are not known, but it is said that the Mayor has in his mind a campaign against the movie industry, which he has been [illegible] for some time.

[illegible] Mayor Hylan's campaign will be [illegible] the Mayor's own [illegible] in the Mayor's own [illegible] the Mayor's own [illegible] the Mayor's own [illegible]

Taylorville (Ill)

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Sampel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Re-fight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and quietly polite, Revolutionary descendants, and the entire men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of the battle scenes—photo movie cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the actual work Griffith staged at great expense, in order to get them to itself exclusive, for use in motion pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by State troopers in New York and the photo cameras and film confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The authorities of Griffith's company in "America" are fortunate, but it is understood by the film that he aims to reproduce the entire battle of the War of Independence, and that the best part of the work of Griffith, and with that in view he expects to have Regular Army troops from the Army posts throughout the country, and the Navy, assist in the work of the film. Indeed, it is said that Secretary of War Weeks, who is a Pioneer in the sense of the word, and who has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chambers called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our eastern coast never used horses, but fought afoot. Chambers called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our eastern coast never used horses, but fought afoot. Chambers is a member of the Society of Colonial Wars, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

D. W. Griffith who [illegible]

Lillian Gish [illegible]

Seven miles up the valley horsemen are groomed, saddled and ready to ride; watch fires wait for the match on distant hilltops; out of sight thousands of British redcoats, Minutemen, Indians, early colonists, and members of the Continental Army stamp impatiently.

Generalissimo Griffith, surrounded by his staff, some in the smart uniforms of U. S. regulars, some in soft shirts and slouch hats stand in a group on the high wooden structure on the brow of the hill, whence a birdseye view of the whole range of hills and of the beautiful valley below, transformed into a Colonial town, may be had.

Hides up a "course." "The British are ready, sir," he announces. Over the field telephone comes word that the Indians are eager to be let loose on the general and as yet unsuspecting rabble. From all over the scene comes word that all is in readiness for the fray.

At last the director gives the signal. The action starts, while camera grind furiously. On the campaign of Bunker Hill General Prescott waits calmly for and fire pacing back into his homespun, [illegible] and taking three sat in short unit "red rag" and the calling of their cows," while the British advance in the formation of Bunker's Hill, while the Indians [illegible] the hill, where stood a very high and very modern wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like madmen, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians, directed his players and United States Soldiers, refighting the battles of the War of Independence.

From the minute the soldiers arrived in camp they had been drilled in the manual of arms, in the tactics and strategy of Revolutionary times. During the Revolutionary times. During the intervals they had doffed their modern shaves and donned the martial coats of generations of King George the Third, and the buff and blue of Washington's Army.

Under the supervision of Army officers hundreds of Colonial players, dressed in coat homespun, had manned the fortes of the Minutemen, and the workmen of Hancock [illegible] Concord, Massachusetts, [illegible] Lexington, Mass., the [illegible] Bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very modern wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like madmen, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians, directed his players and United States Soldiers, refighting the battles of the War of Independence.

Special trains carried the 15th Infantry from Fort Slocum and Hamilton, and the 15th Infantry from Governor's Island, together with a 21 piece band from Fort Slocum, a supplementary corps in command of Lieut. Co. Wm. and a medical unit under Capt. M. T. Dunn into the camp at Somers.

Reserve cavalry units stationed under command of Capt. Lucas of the reserve corps, filmed the largest work and also brought together parade of the organizations.

Other special cars and automobiles brought Griffith, his players, technicians and advisers a number of other than a thousand.

And the battle was on.

Griffith had contracted an invitation to the general public to be present. And the general public came. The train [illegible] Somers was loaded with people. Every train and every [illegible] was crowded. Thousands of motor cars passed by the camp. Hundreds of them stopped and the occupants were given the privilege of seeing the actual work of the film. Thousands of people were turned away because there was not room for them in the camp.

Although it would seem that great field regarding such a subject would be Fort Ticonderoga, Griffith is using the Minutemen of the colonial days in preparing for the Revolutionary period in the film. Indeed, it is said that the film company is using the Minutemen of the Revolutionary period in preparing for the film. Indeed, it is said that the film company is using the Minutemen of the Revolutionary period in preparing for the film. Indeed, it is said that the film company is using the Minutemen of the Revolutionary period in preparing for the film.

Although he had long cherished the dream of a film based on the American Revolution, Griffith was not in a position to do so until the Daughters of the American Revolution, through the courtesy of Mrs. Arthur Brisbane, president general, [illegible] Griffith, [illegible] the film. Griffith, [illegible] the film. Griffith, [illegible] the film.

Brazil 95 (Ind) Times Feb 9 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie cameras took attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in mediocre pictures. A number of such attempts were nipped by State troopers in New York, and the pirate cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can, perhaps, not be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with great fidelity to historical accuracy. For this the first of this kind to be made, and more than 3,000 people have assisted in the work that thousands of current Army officers flocked for the purpose through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks, stationed more than a thousand in various regions to assist in a few scenes, and that Army equipment in vast amounts, and actually Army troops, took a certain share.

Although he had long realized the dramatic possibilities of the American Revolution, as the basis for a photoplay, Griffith has been engaged for more or less during which he made many trips to have broken. He, in fact, and his staff of writers, Mamaroneck, New York, have been at work on the story for more than a year. Meanwhile, the Daughters of the American Revolution, in the hope of

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing.

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but—

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit —on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold, and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now.

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the "thrill-hunter," likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but—

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot.

Because Miss America of 1924 likes bobbed hair, short skirts and sports costumes, she is denounced as bold and bad, but—

The Colonial flapper openly scoffed against the cumbersome hoopskirt and refused point-blank to powder her hair.

GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent women.

"Mathematically conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his district, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling class and overlords; when they imbibed the spirits of the infidelity of those overseas, as from the lips of their own folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today are nothing on their ancestors of the years gone. For every regrettable and improperly worded to humanity in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It was H. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above disappearance. It took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

America, the great melting pot, founded on the ideals of the American revolution—now getting completely in the melting stage—is the legal when the diversity passed for fair as fair is give more interesting reading than is life and customs of that period. The data has been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and many diaries and letters passed to Griffith by heirs of the period had been taken out of their cedar chests to add necessary human details to the most precise and most records of historical documents of that period.

To the really serious read the book of Angus and Jane Grey, during the revolutionary period, by Ella Robert Ballard, who, in the guise of a novel, has given a vivid picture of the life and its representative people of the period. The story is a delight to read, and the author has given the reader a clear picture of the life of the period.

Mr. Griffith's work was the result of a study of the life of the period, and the author has given the reader a clear picture of the life of the period.

And from one of the many books of reference the following extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, a distinguished Massachusetts clergyman, in Boston, is taken:

"When I hear an inquisitive gentlemen inquire what dress the queen is in this week, what the modish apparelt of the court, I look at her as the very glossed of a ruffle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing," scolded the dominie. "She is fitter to be kicked, if she were of kickable substance, than either to be honored or honored."

The concept was brought to Mr. Griffith's attention.

Oh, yes, the ladies were used to that sort of thing, especially in New England. But they had lots of fun on the sly.

"How did they compare with the modern girl as described recently in the Chapter Smith, at Smoke College?" it was asked.

He drew a synthetic baseline picture of the girl, a hard-drinking, cigarette-puffing, Continental Amazon. He seemed not on the grounds that she was an anomaly, that she didn't stand herself on, and was the victim of rapid economic and industrial changes which have left her without an anchor.

"As a matter of fact," he replied quickly, "the modern girl has found support. The flapper has taken up the pace in some lots too fast, but she does it very successfully.

"In the 18 century it practiced, strained the opinion of young ladies, smoking cigarettes is not, it goes to show, that it is a modern habit than serving wine. Many women, considered proper, of course, sick in those days. Drinking was not exclusively a masculine social habit. But the young ladies of the 1776 indulged in private.

"I recall the days of the Civil War, when I remember going out on the streets of the city and seeing the young ladies in the home. The girls had the first time, and the girls had the first time, and the girls had the first time, and the

Sioux City Journal Iowa Feb 17/24

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter," likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

Because Miss America of 1924 likes bobbed hair, short skirts and sports costumes she is denounced as bold and bad, but——

The Colonial flapper openly revolted against the cumbersome hoopskirt and refused petticoats to powder her hair

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of Independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by feminality in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took D. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a two-reel feature, founded on the story of the American Revolution—was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director paused for half an hour to give some interesting sidelights on life and customs at that period. The picture had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and extracts therefrom had been passed to further that issue of the period had been taken out of their rather limited to use necessarily human interest details to the more prosaic and sweeps concerning historical documents in current periodicals.

"Do you really believe that the type of the flapper took place during the Revolutionary period?" he was asked.

"Certainly. The history and records prove it. The flapper and flirts of those days, in all the varied ways in which they differed from the women of today, were in their way just as numerous and just as pronounced as the flappers of today. The flapper of today is the product of the World War and the influence of the movies, and the influence of the movies is the product of the World War

SCREEN NEWS OF PRODUCTIONS AND PLA

Beauty and the Story

POSSIBLY, the most important presentations last week were David Wark Griffith's "America," and the Cosmopolitan production, "Yolanda." We will take up the cussion of Mr. Griffith's film next ek, and will dwell for the time being n "Yolanda," an extraordinarily utiful picture which lacks dramatic ct. It is most interesting ...

My Which Feb 25 1924

Neil Hamilton in "America."

Sunday News Feb 24 1924

Carol Dempster in the New Griffith Picture.

AMERICA

By DANNY

The genius of Griffith. The return of the Master. A tremendously big picture in many ways. And yet, when the end came—abruptly, unexpectedly—something was missing. What was it?

Box office value "America" has. Griffith the showman saw to that. And fought Griffith the artist to a standstill. There is much of showmanship; of box office value in the picture. That the newspaper critics raved over the ride of Paul Revere is natural. That the crowd was thrilled with it quite in keeping with what DW intended. And got.

But where was the grandeur; the epic value of the theme—the greatest in American history? Left to the melodramatic touches of the villain Butler, and his renegade Indians? Is that all Robert Chambers could find?

Where was DW's showmanship in not showing the blood stained tracks of the soldiers at Valley Forge! Colored processes are numerous. A touch of crimson blood on the white snow would have been supremely effective. And where was that great possibility of the camera—Washington crossing the Delaware! And where the reproduction of that famous painting, "The Spirit of '76"! with the tattered trio with fife and drum!

Of course the theme is tremendous. Of course no one—even DW—could in one night, show the real birth of this nation. And so much had of necessity, to be thrown away or forgotten. But that so much footage should be wasted on Walter Butler and his villainous crew seems a pity when there was so much more important matter to be considered.

"America" is big, is important. It will not have the life and sustaining power of "The Birth of a Nation," but when cut, it has big possibilities at the box office. The witchery of the Griffith photography is again anything. Some of the shots are ... What effects, what results ... And he can be thanked also for finding Neil Hamilton, his leading man. Hamilton will be heard of further.

My Sonntagsblatt Staats + Zeitung + Herold Feb 24 1924

D. W. Griffith's „America".

Von Julius Cohen.

Zum erstenmal in der Theatergeschichte kam Amerikas Unabhängigkeitskrieg als Drama zur Geltung, als D. W. Griffith „America Erste Serie: „The Sacrifice" (verfaßt von Robert W. Chambers) aufführte. Als eine, wahrscheinlich am meisterhaftesten, gelungene Verknüpfung von historischtreuer Geschichte mit einem eindrucksvollen Liebesroman, beweist der Film „America", daß inbezug auf seine Wirkung als Quelle von Unterhaltung, Lachen, Tränen und Aufregung die Wirklichkeit oft stärker ist als Fantasie. Obgleich das Wohl und Wehe des Liebespaares die Aufmerksamkeit der Zuschauer auf sich ziehen und trotzdem die Schicksalsschläge der hilflos verbliebenen Familie die Zuschauer zu Tränen rühren, waren es doch eigentlich erst der unsterblichen in der Geschichte verbliebene Ritt Paul Reveres, die Schlachten von Lexington und Concord, der Anblick der frierenden Soldaten George Washingtons zu Valley Forge, die das Publikum fast zur Hysterie bewegten. Noch nie ist ein größeres Drama dem menschlichen Auge vorgeführt worden, als diese Reihenfolge von Leiden, Schicksalsschlägen, Lebenskampf und sittlichen Sieg der amerikanischen Revolution. Hier handelte es sich nicht um einen persönlichen Kampf eines Einzelnen, um die Erfüllung ernstlicher Wünsche, sondern um das Ringen eines Volkes, um die Gründung, ernstlicher Wünsche, sondern um das Ringen eines Volkes, um die Gründung ...

Bunker Hill sind mit einer solchen historischtreuen Präcision wiedergegeben, daß sie die offene Bewunderung der bei der Eröffnung anwesenden anerkannten Geschichtskundigen erregten. Diejenigen, welche befürchteten, daß Griffith vielleicht begeisterter treuer Patriot in Geschichte zuviel werde, haben sich angesichts dieses, das ich Geschichte, eines besseren belehrt. Es ist lediglich sein ehrlicher, aufrichtiger Dichtung aber ein Kleiner Schatten begegnen ...

Unter den Darstellern haben sich gewiß ...

RAMON NAVARRO.
"Rosamunde"
Capitol.

LIGHT-FINGERED on the trigger is Lionel Barrymore as Walter Butler, in the center of the above scene from "America." The spectacle of savages and soldiers playing about a charming Colonial mansion was apparently a common one during our country's making, to judge from D. W. Griffith's master film, which is continuing this week at the Fortieth Street theatre.

"America"

Boston Sunday Post Feb 24 1924

My Review Feb 23 1924

In Griffith's "America" Is Inspiration for All Native and Foreign Born Citizens

The Spirit of '76 Lives Again in This Thrilling New Picture Now Being Shown at the 44th St. Theatre—Romance Mingled With History in a Photoplay That Comes Near Being an Epic and Should Be Seen by Every Man, Woman and Child in the Land

By KELCEY ALLEN

D. W. Griffith's new film production, "America" (series one, "The Sacrifice"), sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution, is now on view at the 44th Street. Since its first performance on Thursday night, it has been playing to crowded houses, and it looks as if it will be here for a good many months.

Mr. Griffith has directed and produced many massive films, but none quite as big or as fine as this one. The photography is exquisite, and the direction flawless.

It is a faithful pictorial story, not of the war, but of the sacrifices of our forefathers to win freedom from England, and a charming love story is interwoven, with many stirring events.

The most thrilling scene is the one showing the midnight ride of Paul Revere. Seldom have we heard such great applause in a theatre. The pictorial history of this immortal ride would alone "put this picture over," but there are, of course, other historical scenes which brought loud applause from its first audience, a particularly brilliant one.

Mr. Griffith shows us in Virginia, in Massachusetts, and in Philadelphia famous men and historical events. The audiences see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty in Boston, George Washington, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Jefferson, John Adams, pass before you, and you shift to England, the palace of King George III., or Parliament, with Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies.

There is Bunker Hill and Valley Forge. The first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

Briefly, Justice Montague of Virginia and his family are strong adherents of King George. His daughter, Nancy, and his son, Charles Edward, have been presented at court in London, and he has received honors from the British King. At the Williamsburg Statehouse she meets Nathan Holden, a messenger from Boston, who has been sent to tell the House of Delegates that the King has closed the port of Boston for refusal to pay taxes and place it under military rule. The messenger and the girl meet, and the love story is born. Her father, after a parting with Col. George Washington, his old friend, resolves to visit Massachusetts and Canada to aid the cause of the King.

Nancy meets Walter Butler in Boston, and the family is on the way when they stop in Lexington on the night of the 19th of "April in '75," which is a memorable date. She sees Nathan training with the Continentals and the love scene opens. She is a witness of the fight the next day and her brother showing his lot in with the Americans, fights unknown to his father. He fights again at the Battle of Bunker Hill and is killed. To deceive her father, who has been wounded in an attempt to disperse the Continentals, she wraps her brother's body in the British flag.

The Montagues go to northern New York to the home of Sir Ashley Montague, where Butler, who has mobilized Indians to massacre the Colonists, has his headquarters. Nathan is sent by Washington to capture him. There are some wonderfully thrilling scenes depicting Indian scouts and massacres.

It is at the attack on Fort Stanwix that Walter Butler, the British Indian captain, is killed, and Captain Montague is captured by the American scouts. The final scene shows Walter and Nancy, Nathan and Jane, and her father attending the inauguration of George Washington as first President of the United States.

Efforts have been made to have the Daughters of Colonial Dames and the Daughters of the American Revolution, the patriotic societies, participate in the premiere of "America" at the Majestic Theatre, Monday evening, March 3.

The family tree of Patrick Henry and other descendants of the signers of the Declaration of Independence will be shown in the prologue.

The story of Paul Revere's ride, the Battle of Lexington, and the Battle of Concord Bridge, the Battle of Bunker Hill and the Siege of Boston, the Battle of Valley Forge, Washington's retreat across the Delaware, the surrender of Cornwallis, the inauguration of Washington as first President of the United States, are all shown

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton As a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and entire bands, Revolutionary descendants and the related men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out quite satisfactorily, even though it seems almost sacrilegious to the reproduction of the battle scenes which Griffith stages at great expense in order to get them as exact replicas as can be made. A number of incidents have happened in such instances, which have caused the director and his company to shake their heads in despair, and have caused the director to wish that he had never thought of making the picture. For instance, in reproducing the Revolutionary battle at Lexington, when two cases containing 5,000 feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 150,000 feet of negative had been stolen and secretly sold.

So much exaggeration of this nature arises among the actors that the secures will be designed to impress them with the harm such gossip may cause the industry.

Pantages

CLIPPING FROM Johnstown (Pa) Democrat 2/15/24

Danbury (Conn) News Feb 15 1924

HASSON ORCHESTRA

Elaborate Musical Accompaniment for "America"

an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the cases and treasure chests of their museums, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, spurs, and drums to garments and costumes crumbling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this cooperation it has been possible to use as "props" in "America," historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

Griffith's aim to preserving historical accuracy has been achieved largely through the establishment of a special bureau of research. This innovation, which has proven so successful, that the motion picture industry is contemplating establishing a similar institution under the directorship of Will H. Hays, president of Hollywood, and whether she goes from the quaint cottage, the Mount Vernon, through the present public and private collections of relics, the colonial and period furniture is used.

Although it could seem that such great consulting work, a work which is of an kind, would be produced by the Hollywood Studios of the motion picture industry, it is the director of the motion picture, Griffith, who is the author of the story, and who is the director of the motion picture, Griffith, who is the author of the story, and who is the director of the motion picture, Griffith, who is the author of the story, and who

Aspen Mass Eagle Feb 15 1924

This Little World

In a movie studio with Artist Roland T. Scott.

By MAURICE HENLE
NEA Service Staff Writer

NEW YORK, Feb. 16.—Sometimes this entire little world seems to be tucked away within the four walls of a movie studio. Furniture and garb of every known period and place may be found. And certainly all the human emotions that send this old globe spinning around, from "ambition" down—are there!

We were standing off in a corner of the big Griffith studio, near here, watching D. W. himself tell Lionel Barrymore how to go "through the motions." Other actors of lesser caliber stood, listening.

* * *

Griffith gets up at 5 a. m. Often he skips breakfast. They tell a story that he suddenly remembered one night at 10 o'clock that "by George, I forgot to eat anything today."

Many scenes that take but 30 to 60 seconds to flash on the screen, consume an entire day in filming. This holds true in all studios.

* * *

One day I was visiting a certain movie studio, internationally famous. On the big floor, a busy scene indeed, were screen celebrities known in the most remote corner of the world.

One whole company, making a war film, was standing about doing nothing. The star, a temperamental young woman, who was arguing with the owner of the company. Her name had been in big electric lights on Broadway, advertising the film she was making. But the day before the sign had come down and the name of another star of the company, equally noted, went up.

That made the young woman in question very, very angry. And the following day the sign of her rival came down!

* * *

If there is one thing that amazes the visitor more than any other one thing at a movie studio, it is the carpentry work in preparation for a big set.

Before a scene is taken, the director's conception of what the garden or house, or street—or whatever it happ to be—is given to architects. The latter make blue-print drawings, and these drawings are turned over to carpenters who go ahead building the set according to specifications just exactly as they would build a skyscraper.

Usually one scene is being "shot" in one end of a studio while carpenters are working on another in the opposite corner.

* * *

Not one person in a thousand of the unknowns who yearn to break into pictures could stand the strain of the world's most trying industry. So don't envy the beautiful girls whose smiling faces you see on the screen. Behind that smile lie hours of mental torture.

AUTOMOBILES

Danbury (Conn) News Feb 16 1924

HUNDREDS SEE GRIFFITH FILM

"America," Latest Production of Great Director Makes Pronounced Hit.

Seeing a photoplay by David W. Griffith before it is shown in New York, or any other large city, is a rare experience for the people of Danbury and vicinity. Yesterday afternoon and evening hundreds thronged the Empress to attend the initial showing of "America," the latest film directed and produced by the man who has given to the screen some of the best that has ever been presented.

The principal theme of "America" is the sacrifices of the men and women of the days of the Revolutionary war. At times during its showing yesterday, the audience was roused to such enthusiasm and patriotic fervor that applause spontaneously broke forth. Again, the sufferings of the pioneers of America were so acutely portrayed that the crowd sat hushed and silent, absorbed in the pictorial recital of events.

The general opinion expressed at the conclusion of the picture is that it takes rank with other large photoplays to the credit of Mr. Griffith, although it is considered, as even the producer and his corps of assistants admit, some reduction in the length of the film will be necessary. It took a little more than three hours yesterday to run off the entire film. Cutting will take place, after the picture ends its engagement here tonight, until the time necessary for the showing will be about two and one-half hours. Mr. Griffith himself said after the matinee yesterday that he hardly knows where to start eliminating. The film is to be gone over thoroughly and arranged so as to be made ready for its presentation in New York.

Not only was Mr. Griffith here yesterday to see the photoplay but he was accompanied by a force of assistants, several of whom aided him when scenes were being filmed near Somers, N. Y., last fall. Miss Carol Dempster, the leading woman of the story, was in the audience, yesterday afternoon, and was the center of much interest, many people being desirous of obtaining a glimpse of the heroine of the romance which runs through the story.

The foreword of the film states that the purpose of the picture is to recall to the people of the United States to-day the sacrifices made for America's freedom, "lest we of to-day forget."

There is so much to the photoplay that is good, so many exciting events; such excellent character work on the part of many, that it is difficult to select any one outstanding event. The beginnings of the Revolutionary war are shown, with the agitation that taxation without representation aroused. Lexington and Concord, Mass., and Williamsburg, Va., are the locations where the opening scenes take place. These serve to bring out not only some of the causes that precipitated the struggle but to introduce the principal characters in the romantic story.

Among the large and spectacular scenes are the gathering of the Minute Men at Lexington and Concord; the repulse of the British at the Concord bridge and the retreat back to Boston; then comes the battle of Bunker Hill, and here some remarkable "shots" are shown—the British ascending the hill; the Americans defending their position from the redoubt and the rail fence with the final successful assault of the British.

The ride of Paul Revere, from the time he starts away after seeing the signal light gleam in the tower of the Old North church, Boston, until he has aroused the people, is a thrilling part of the story. The rider and his wonderful horse gallop across the country and are pursued by two British. Going at top speed, the man and horse manage to elude their pursuers by hurdling fences and fallen trees and finally jumping over a stream of water into which one of the pursuers falls.

The scene shifts then to Philadelphia, where the signing of the Declaration of Independence is shown, July 4, 1776. This ends part one of the story.

The locale of the story is changed to Fort Esperence, in northern New York, and serves to show the part that Indians, under command of the British, had in the conflict. Here also takes place much of the love story. The killing of American men and women by the redskins under the leadership of Walter Butler, "Scourge of the North," and James Brant, the Indian chief, is shown in this section of the film. The fort is stormed by the Indians and, in spite of its brave defenders, is captured. The timely arrival of American Rangers prevents the total destructing of the outpost and the slaughter of its occupants. The gathering of the rangers and the ride to the fort is exciting and thrilling.

Incidentally, as the film shifts back and forth to keep the threads of the historical events together, are shown the scenes at Valley Forge, when the soldiers suffered acutely, going without food, clothing or fire and walking about barefoot in the snow. Washington, assisted by Lafayette, marches against Cornwallis in the south, and the surrender of the British at Yorktown closes the struggle. The photoplay closes with the inauguration of Washington as president.

The romantic story with which the historical events are shown, tells of the love of Nathan Holden, a young express rider from Boston to Virginia, for Nancy Montague, daughter of a loyal British subject, Justice Montague. Traveling to Williamsburg, Va., with the news of the closing of the port of Boston, young Holden meets Nancy at the Virginia assembly. Events bring them together again at Lexington, where the young man declares his love. Not long afterward they are separated and Captain Butler, who has previously met Nancy, declares his passion for the girl. She favors the young colonist, but her father wishes to give her to the British officer. Nancy sees Butler directing the torture of [illegible] American and revolts against him, her story bringing her father over to her side. Young Holden leads the Rangers in the rescue of the fort, where Nancy and her father had sought shelter and this time her father accepts the youth as suitor for the girl.

Miss Dempster has the role of Nancy Montague, and Neil Hamilton, a young man developed by Mr. Griffith, is Holden. Some excellent work is done by both in the lengthy story. Lionel Barrymore portrays the role of Captain Butler and he makes it one of the best parts of the film.

Characters in American history are shown in different phases of the film. Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, Washington, Jefferson and many others. As a means of teaching American history "America will hold the attention of young and old and visualize for them events in the early days of America. Care was taken to have the scenes correct historically, costumes and settings and the scenic backgrounds were selected to accord with the places where the scenes of the actual battles took place.

Continued on Fifth Page.

Toledo (Ohio) News-Bee 2/16

BY EARL AIKEN.

WITH one of his most important scenes still unfilmed and less than 48 hours left to prepare it for its world premiere, D. W. Griffith finally was able to get the snow storm necessary to "shoot" the Valley Forge scenes in "America."

Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary War. These cabins were built in November, awaiting a day of snow.

* * *

Thru the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island had been waiting under instructions all that time.

The persistence of open weather forced Griffith to change his production schedule and he finally had to film everything else. Then came extreme anxiety for the picture was being held up in the face of tremendous advertising that it would open in New York at a stipulated time.

Finally everything was rosy—or rather white. It began snowing. The scenes were enacted and the films rushed to the developers and cutters. The giant production is now being assembled and edited and will open next Thursday night at the Forty-fourth Street Theater—the eve of Washington's birthday.

Danbury (Conn) News 2/16/24

In Praise of "America."

To the Editor of the News:

Danbury has been honored by D. W. Griffith's "America." Many of the loved early historical events are made to live and glow and fill us with patriotic thrills through the medium of the magic screen. Every man, woman and child should see this picture in order to realize the terrific early struggle of the young nation; and to further value the blessings of to-day.

D. W. Griffith has once more written his name on the roll of America's history. We are with all pride and warmest appreciation.

Very truly yours, [illegible]

Miami (Fla) News-Metropolis Feb 16 1924

A secret trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture "America" at the Rialto theater, South Norwalk, Conn., several days ago, indicates this may be his most successful production, possibly surpassing in popularity "The Birth of a Nation." It was presented in a three and three-fourths hours showing, with 18 reels, and the reception was extremely enthusiastic. The historic battles particularly aroused excitement.

The picture will have its premiere showing on Washington's birthday at the Fourty-fourth st. theater.

Cincinnati (O) Post Feb 16 1924

Griffith Changes Title

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary War picture, which is to open Feb. 21 at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York. It will be called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices."

This was done to avoid confusion as to the theme, he says, since the dramatic story Griffith has produced emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence.

Griffith hopes to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Brockton (Mass) Enterprise Feb 16 1924

Troy (N.Y.) Budget Feb 17 1924

Pontiac (Mich) Press Feb 16 1924

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary war picture. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices."

Charleston (W Va) Telegram 2/17/24

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary war picture which is to open February 21 at the Forty-fourth street theater. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." Mr. Griffith hopes to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Minneapolis (Minn) Journal Feb. 17 1924

In the cast of D. W. Griffith's forthcoming film, "America," will be found Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne, Riley Hatch, Arthur Donaldson, Erville Alderson, Sydney Deane, Edwin Holland, James Clarence Mc[illegible], Charles Bennett.

Changes Name of Movie.

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary war picture which is to open Feb. 21 at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre in New York. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." This is done to avoid confusion as to the theme, since the dramatic story Mr. Griffith has produced emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence. Mr. Griffith hopes to make this the first of a series of pictures portraying the dramatic history of America's development.

Captures a Barrymore.

D. W. GRIFFITH has captured a Barrymore—Lionel, no less—to play an important part in his production of "America." This is Lionel's first appearance with D. W. for 10 whole years—for he began his screen career in Griffith's stock company. The role for which he has been cast is an unpleasant one—to say the least. For he will play the part of Walter Butler, who, in the pre-revolutionary days (and, for that matter, during the revolution) led a band of Indians in a guerilla warfare against his own people.

Newburgh (N.Y.) News Feb 15 1924

Griffith Film of Revolutionary War

So far as can be learned, there is to be nothing in D. W. Griffith's film of the Revolutionary War, "America", suggesting, much less picturing, the part of the Hudson Highlands in the struggle for independence. The omission could be made up by inclusion of a "shot" of two of Washington's Headquarters. It would be a big advertisement for Newburgh.

Charleston (W Va) Gazette 2/17/24

BACKWARD WINTER GIVES PICTURES BAD MONEY BREAK

Companies Banking on Weather Conditions to Take Snow Scenes Are Disappointed in Mildness of Season.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" IS WAITING FOR SNOW

The backward winter has hit the movies hard. Companies planning to take snow and ice scenes during the cold weather have had their entire schedules upset by the warm weather and its lack of ice and snow. D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the war of independence, "America," perhaps the biggest of all the many pictures waiting on the weatherman, is reported to be one of the hardest hit of all. There is no sign of heavy ice on the historic Delaware River, and in consequence Griffith has been forced to eliminate the scene of Washington crossing that icy inland stream. He now comes to Canada in the hope of finding a moving stream there all frozen up ready for the camera. They found a stretch of frozen lake, but the river had not a fine coating of ice, and in many scenes Rocky of the Rocky Mountains [illegible] that boat there. Were [illegible] to submit to [illegible] for immediate use at Valley Forge.

Hartford (Conn) Times 2/16/24

Manchester (N.H.) Union 2/16/24

SNOWSTORM DIFFICULTY IN VALLEY FORGE SCENE

With a month of less than forty-eight hours to be of use to the photo[illegible], D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in the new picture "America" which opens at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York, the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of great importance in the dramatic sections. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary war. These were built in November, awaiting the day of snow.

Thru the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions all that time. In the first weeks of [illegible] the persistence of open weather forced Griffith to change his production schedule and he finally had to film everything else. Then came extreme anxiety for the picture was being held up in the face of tremendous advertising that it would open in New York at a stipulated time.

Finally everything was rosy—or rather white. It began snowing. The scenes were enacted and the films rushed to developers and cutters. The giant production is now being assembled and edited and will open next Thursday night at the Forty-fourth Street theater—the eve of Washington's birthday.

Richmond (Va) Times Dispatch Feb 17 1924

LECTURE IN TIME TO PLAY OF "AMERICA"

[illegible]

Chicago Gets Journal 2/16/24

Buffalo (N.Y.) Express Feb 17 1924

A MODERN CONCEPTION OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL HAS BEEN PUT ON FOR A SCENE IN THE PICTURE PLAY AMERICA, WHICH GRIFFITH IS NOW MAKING

Louisville Herald Feb 17 1924

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing.

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but—

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit —on the sly, of course— of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now.

Wicked beyond all redemption are supposed to be the Barbary coast dances and the South sea island hula-hula of today, but—

The first girls of the American republic were wont to originate and engage in dances founded on the Indian "scalp" dance.

Proud Miss America of 1924 thus bobbed her short locks and sports cosmetics as she is photographed in hat and hat, but—

The colonial flapper openly revelled against the catcher, some laughter and refused paint-black or powder her hair.

The modern girl, artistically inclined, the "Bluebeard," thus looking as much as a seat of the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but—

The hundred and fifty years ago the colonial belle flapped herself in walks alone and sallied forth with the beau to witness a great pigeon shoot.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent women.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every capitle and improperly practiced by feminality in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took D. W. Griffith, one of the best the motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statement, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to those conclusions.

"Annette"—a fine cool figure, friend of the days of the American revolution—was seeking inspiration at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director passed his part on long to give some interesting interviews on the real women of that period. The girls had been in the regime of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed to them and some of the period had been taken out of their dusty hiding to add romantic flavor-forward details to the film story, and women experts on the subject assisted in giving authenticity to the film. Hence the Griffith flapper of the Revolution is no flapper such there during the Revolutionary period, is not quite.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every capitle and improperly practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took D. W. Griffith, one of the best the motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statement, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to those conclusions.

"Annette"—a fine cool figure, friend of the days of the American revolution—was seeking inspiration at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director passed his part on long to give some interesting interviews on the real women of that period. The girls had been in the regime of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed to them and some of the period had been taken out of their dusty hiding to add romantic flavor-forward details to the film story, and women experts on the subject assisted in giving authenticity to the film. Hence the Griffith flapper of the Revolution is no flapper such there during the Revolutionary period, is not quite.

reference the following extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, a distinguished Massachusetts clergyman, in Boston, is taken:

"When I hear an inquisitive gentlemame inquire what dress the queen is in this week, what the modus operandi of the court, I look at her as the very ciscard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing, molded the dominie. "She is fitter to be kibbed, if she were of kibkable substance, than either to be honored or humored."

This excerpt was brought to Mr. Griffith's attention.

"Oh, yes, the ladies were wont to that while there's a perfect thing." He lifted his eyes to the master's canvas and let them rest there a moment. "I waited for that eighteen years. I first saw it when I was eighteen—in a private gallery where no money could buy it. By and by, I had a good man keep watch of it for me. When I built this house I hadn't any evidence, as you might say, that I'd get that picture. Yet I made this room for it."

THE AFFAIR AT OTHMAN'S

Continued From Page 5.

He turned to Barlow again, something unfathomable in his dark eyes. "You can get what you want if you want it hard enough. Finally, when Daphne could be bought, I would have paid as many millions for it as I did per hundred thousands. I had to have it. No other canvas would answer. It's perfect. I care a lot for my other paintings, but they're all optional. If I can't get one, another will do. This one wasn't optional. I had to have just it. That's as with Flora Marsden."

His glance fell to the rug and Barlow felt with something like a touch of awe that he was now, for once, looking behind the mask into a centre of emotion. When Othman spoke again it was with a strange tone, as though combatting opposition: "It will be a good thing for her to marry me. I can care too. Not only money, but money as I can give it to me means everything in the world. There for safe, and there's fun to do. But I can appreciate her—there was a little catch in his voice—I am to protect for every greatest love and time. She can do anything she likes with me. It will be a good thing for her to marry me."

And Barlow, with tact at an end, made no answer. "Marie is gone."

"Marie is gone," Othman echoed, and then leaning a moment over a smouldering cigarette. "Well, we parted again in war with an air of throwing down the gauntlet to a challenge. A young woman like that—she could paint. I'm sure I could do it if she would stand while I paint. Marie is gone, but I'm not sure that I'm not better off. Marie is made for single enjoyment of youth time and the single pleasure of a young man."

"Marie is gone." Othman echoed, and then leaning a moment over a smouldering cigarette. "Well, we parted again in war with an air of throwing down the gauntlet to a challenge. A young woman like that—she could paint. I'm sure I could do it if she would stand while I paint. Marie is gone, but I'm not sure that I'm not better off. Marie is made for single enjoyment of youth time and the single pleasure of a young man."

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff. As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal th her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of these overestimates from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding peculiarity to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took D. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute-and-a-half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a two-reel feature founded on the story of the American Revolution—was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director paused for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and customs of that period. The picture had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed to Griffith and teams of the period had been taken out of their cedar chests to add necessary human-interest details to the more prosaic and somewhat remote of the social documents of colonial periodicals.

"The one really fallacious idea that the girls of the flapper type place during the Revolutionary period," he was asked.

"Definitely," he directly answered. "The belles and flirts of that period, if it is fair to call them by such a modern appellation, were just as much in the minority as the flapper of today. The belle was the exception, not the rule. The average girl was a good sport, a good housekeeper, a good mother and a good wife. Her ideal was the man who was a gentleman, who was a good provider, who was a good husband and who was a good fellow. The girl who was a good sport was the girl who was a good sport in the true sense of the word. She was a good sport because she was a good sport in the true sense of the word. She was a good sport because she was a good sport in the true sense of the word. She was a good sport because she

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter,' likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a good pigeon shoot

The Colonial belle was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent women.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the infallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by femininity in 1924 there is a corresponding precedent to be found in the records of the social group of 1776.

"It took D. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"'America,' a big-cast feature founded on the story of the American Revolution, was being completed at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director found himself at his wits' end. It was the day before the first showing of the picture, and the last reel was still in the cutting room. Mr. Griffith was in a quandary. He had a reel of film that was not to his liking, but he had no time to make another to take its place.

"Mr. Griffith's attention was called to the fact that the ladies were used to that sort of thing, especially in Old England. But they had lots of fun on the day.

"How did they compare with the modern girl as described recently by Dr. Charles Smith, of Newark? Well, as it was stated in the Newark Ledger, the modern girl is a bit of a sport, and she likes to do the things that men do. She likes to box and she likes to see the prize fights. That is quite a modern innovation," it was argued. "You said the 1776 girl went fifty-fifty with the modern girl."

"The 1776 girl did worse," exclaimed the director, groaning. "She went pigeon shooting. It certainly was much more cruel than modern prize fighting.

"Of course, she wasn't supposed to go. But we found records where girls dressed up in boys' clothes and attended those affairs. It is recorded as the scandal of the social season in the annals of a Southern family that a prominent young lady had had attended a shoot and had fainted when she witnessed the cruelty practiced on innocent birds, and was thus discovered.

"Why, she was a sport of the 1776 brand, I tell you, and she was a good one, too. Dr. Charles Smith, of Newark, tells us that it was stated in the Newark Ledger that the modern girl is a bit of a sport, and she

NOTABLES TO SEE "AMERICA" FILM'S WORLD PREMIERE

Congressmen Treadway, Fenn and Moore are speeding here from Washington for the same purpose, special cars from Virginia and New England are bearing distinguished parties toward New York for the world premiere of D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Forty-fourth street theatre tomorrow night.

D. W. Griffith

G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; Mrs. James J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish and Miss Agnes Moyher of Richmond, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane of Westover are among the Virginians hastening here for the opening.

President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington, Mass., Historical Society; Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Hammill of Bristol, R. I.; George T. Hough of New Bedford, and Mrs. John L. E. Pell of Great Barrington are among the score of New Englanders on their way in a special car from Boston.

It is the first time on record that so many distinguished visitors have come to New York to attend the opening of a motion picture, and from all indications the audience will be one of the most remarkable ever assembled here.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" HAS PREMIERE TO-NIGHT

"America," D. W. Griffith's newest spectacle, will have its first showing at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre to-night. This picture, in which Robert W. Chambers has collaborated with the producer on the Revolutionary scenes, is said to have been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and those who have seen it declare that it is worthy of ranking among Griffith's greatest.

The first presentation to-night will partake largely of an assemblage of representatives of patriotic societies. A large delegation of Virginians, around whose homes some of the Revolutionary war scenes were shot, will be present, and an equally large delegation from New England is expected.

Some of those for whom reservations have been made are: G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; Mrs. James J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish, Miss Agnes Moyher of Richmond and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane of Westover, Colonial estate which was used in the picture. President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington (Mass.) Historical Society; Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Hammill of Bristol, R. I.; George T. Hough of New Bedford and Mrs. John L. E. Pell of Great Barrington are coming from New England.

In addition to the leaders of New York society, the Daughters of the American Revolution and the American army, which participated in the making of the film, will be strongly represented. Mrs. Charles White Nash and eighteen State regents of the D. A. R., as well as the members of several New York City chapters, will represent that organization. Major General Bullard, commander of the Department of the East, with his staff and officers from West Point, will represent the army.

So crowded has been the work on the picture that it was not until last night that the complete film was given a showing, and then Mr. Griffith took a party of friends to Upper Montclair for the purpose.

PATRIOTIC FILM PLAY OPENS TONIGHT

David Wark Griffith's "America" at the 44th St. Theatre.

"America," the photodrama of the War of American Independence, directed by D. W. Griffith, opens at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre this evening. It was written by Robert W. Chambers, and includes in its cast some of the most notable motion picture actors of the day.

"America" was filmed by Mr. Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the beginning of the sesquicentennial of the Revolutionary War by a motion picture which would reflect the ideals and aims of the men who freed America, as well as portray the major battles and principal characters of the struggle for freedom.

Carol Dempster heads the cast, with Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton. Among those in the supporting cast are Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Lucile La Verne, Erville Alderson, Louis Wolheim, Ruth Hatch and Arthur Maldson.

A Shot That Will Soon Be Seen 'Round the World. The Griffith Version of the Battle of Bunker Hill, One of the Many Thrilling Scenes from the Forthcoming Film, "America." Soldiers of the Regular Army Took the Part of Both the British Red Coats and the Embattled New England Farmers.
(By Wide World Photos)

NEW TOP-MONEY FILMS OPEN ON BROADWAY

New York, Feb. 18.—Two new films open at Broadway legitimate theaters this week at top admission prices of $1.50 and better. Marion Davies' latest, "Yolanda", opens at the Cosmopolitan Tuesday and D. W. Griffith's "America" comes to the Forty-fourth Street Theater Thursday. Metro's "Thy Name is Woman" opens at the Lyric March 3, for a run.

Arthur Dewey is the gentleman upon whom the distinction of playing George Washington in D. W. Griffith's production "America" has fallen. Careful comparison with measurements, portraits, and sculptures of the First President have proven Dewey to be as nearly like him as one mortal can be like another. Mr. Dewey's ancestry dates from revolutionary days, by the way.

Sir Percy Sykes, former Commander in Chief of the British forces in Persia, was able to give some advice to D. W. Griffith in staging scenes of America, the photodrama of the War of Independence.

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary War picture which is to open next week in New York. It will be officially called America, Series One—The Sacrifices.

The highest European waterfall is that of the Staubbach, in Switzerland. It is nearly 900 feet high.

ANTI-RUMOR CAMPAIGN TO BE LAUNCHED

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which despite their falsity gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $[illegible] in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the shirt was typical of a period other than the Colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press, it had swollen into a $[illegible] extravagance, all through idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in scenes at Lexington, when two taking the Revolutionary battle cause containing the thousand feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that [illegible] of negative had been stolen and [illegible]

So much exaggeration of this nature going among the scenes that the Hayes office is [illegible] to improve [illegible]

As Washington's birthday nears again this picture of Washington issuing orders to his tattered but faithful soldiers on a cold winter's morn, from D. W. Griffith's "America," is very interesting.

Foreword—6

—WALSH—Mach, No. 2—Feb. 26—DAY—

Great Griffith Film, "America"—A Masonic Cameo

THE triumph of Bro. D. W. Griffith with his tremendous film spectacle, "America," is much more than a personal achievement. This inspiring picturization reflects untold credit on the maker, who presents in brilliant form so much of the spirit of those sacrificial days in the early history of the New World when the nation of which we are so proud was gloriously born. The glory of the Revolution that burns in the heart of every true American burns a glowing fire in the action of this wonderful romance as it is depicted on the screen. The glory of those good men and Masons who rose to heights of undying fame by their acts of courage when called from the simpler life of the colonial days to the battlefields of freedom stands out as it has never been shown before to the eyes of the present generation.

The first half of the Series One is much the finest in its emotional richness, largely because it deals with the gentler aspects of mellow days before the shot was fired that was heard around the world. When the brutality of war comes in, the sordid, savage and ugly comes on the screen and it will require almost an infinite genius to mellow the harsh tones that prevail far too much in the last hour of the picture story.

The film as a whole is a scenic masterpiece, and not too crowded with the terrific events of those momentous times by the thread of a delightful love story of a young Yankee patriot and the daughter of an old Virginia aristocrat who clings to the side of the King and the Mother Country. It is of such stuff that life is made. That is why every man, woman and child in the world will take a delight in the picture. The Masonic portent throughout the whole film, should take every member of this great fraternity to the playhouse to see it at the first opportunity and as often thereafter as possible.

A mere description of the contents of the film it is not our intention to indulge here. We leave that to profane sources of information. The main things in the way of recall for us to impress here is the vivid portrayal therein of outstanding characters in the Masonic fraternity who were outstanding characters in the epoch-making events of the Revolutionary War. It is proper, too, to point out that this was by no means accidental. It was, rather, the placing of the half-mark on a piece of human during by our forefathers that brought us the grandeur that is our nation today. The names of Bro. John Hancock and the New England patriots are prominently depicted in the political scenes. So, likewise with Bro. and Gen. Joseph Warren. Then there are the brethren who were with Bro. Warren at Bunker Hill and those who fell at the first shots on Lexington Green. Bro. Paul Revere makes his famous ride. Another has already said that the patriots reaches its highest peak in the ride of Paul Revere. This is his capers celebrating occasions prepared by caterer with a capital K. There is, however, another capital K that is proper with the consecration of the impact Washington—that Man and those called Out to win, but to grace and find in the hearts of his countrymen. Bro. Washington giving of the impressive and moment at the Revolutionary Hall by the King and so picked out of the country, [illegible] Washington giving his hand to Franklin on the floor of the Continental Congress, [illegible] the creation of a nation [illegible] Washington—this Man and those called Out to win, but to grace and find in the hearts of his countrymen.

Bro. Washington giving of the impressive and moment at the Revolutionary Hall by the King and so picked out of the country, [illegible] Washington giving his hand to Franklin on the floor of the Continental Congress, [illegible] the creation of a nation [illegible]

PRODUCERS REGRET SPREAD OF FALSE STATEMENTS

In America Prominent Actors

Another Teapot Dome.

PICTURE ACTORS WARNED AGAINST SILLY TALKING

"The White Rose" Is On Gem Screen

INVITED TO SEE "AMERICA" SHOWN

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Resight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "extras."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out so ably, even though in many ways—notably in reproducing the battle scenes—with movie cameras, men stationed to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith stages at great expense, in order to sell them to other companies for use in motion pictures. A number of such accounts will depend for their success in New York, and in other centers and time consumed until the new Griffith picture has been completed.

The beginning of Griffith's undertaking in "America" was, perhaps, due in part to the fact that he is operating the motion picture of the War of Independence with about forty-five thousand dollars of his own money, and the rest of the money he has borrowed for the purpose from the banks. Griffith is now at Fort Monroe, Virginia, where he is making the scenes of the Revolutionary period, and the battles of the Civil War, which will be seen in the film. Thence the company will go to Washington, Philadelphia, Lexington, Concord, Boston, Bunker Hill, Saratoga, Yorktown, Fort Ticonderoga, Fort Niagara, Fort Mackinac, Fort Dearborn, Fort Sackville, Fort Pitt, Fort Schuyler, Fort Stanwix

Chicago (Ill) 2/16/24

NOTABLES TO SEE "AMERICA" FILM'S WORLD PREMIERE

Congressmen Treadway, Fenn and Moore are speeding here from Washington for the same purpose, special cars from Virginia and New England are bearing distinguished parties toward New York for the world premiere of D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Forty-fourth street theatre tomorrow night.

D. W. Griffith

G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; Mrs. James J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish and Miss Agnes Moyher of Richmond, and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane of Westover are among the Virginians hastening here for the opening.

President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington, Mass., Historical Society; Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Hammill of Bristol, R. I.; George T. Hough of New Bedford, and Mrs. John L. E. Pell of Great Barrington are among the score of New Englanders on their way in a special car from Boston.

It is the first time on record that so many distinguished visitors have come to New York to attend the opening of a motion picture, and from all indications the audience will be one of the most remarkable ever assembled here.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" HAS PREMIERE TO-NIGHT

"America," D. W. Griffith's newest spectacle, will have its first showing at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre to-night. This picture, in which Robert W. Chambers has collaborated with the producer on the Revolutionary scenes, is said to have been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and those who have seen it declare that it is worthy of ranking among Griffith's greatest.

The first presentation to-night will partake largely of an assemblage of representatives of patriotic societies. A large delegation of Virginians, around whose homes some of the Revolutionary war scenes were shot, will be present, and an equally large delegation from New England is expected.

Some of those for whom reservations have been made are: G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; Mrs. James J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish, Miss Agnes Moyher of Richmond and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane of Westover, Colonial estate which was used in the picture. President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington (Mass.) Historical Society; Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Hammill of Bristol, R. I.; George T. Hough of New Bedford and Mrs. John L. E. Pell of Great Barrington are coming from New England.

In addition to the leaders of New York society, the Daughters of the American Revolution and the American army, which participated in the making of the film, will be strongly represented. Mrs. Charles White Nash and eighteen State regents of the D. A. R., as well as the members of several New York City chapters, will represent that organization. Major General Bullard, commander of the Department of the East, with his staff and officers from West Point, will represent the army.

So crowded has been the work on the picture that it was not until last night that the complete film was given a showing, and then Mr. Griffith took a party of friends to Upper Montclair for the purpose.

PATRIOTIC FILM PLAY OPENS TONIGHT

David Wark Griffith's "America" at the 44th St. Theatre.

"America," the photodrama of the War of American Independence, directed by D. W. Griffith, opens at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre this evening. It was written by Robert W. Chambers, and includes in its cast some of the most notable motion picture actors of the day.

"America" was filmed by Mr. Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the beginning of the sesquicentennial of the Revolutionary War by a motion picture which would reflect the ideals and aims of the men who freed America, as well as portray the major battles and principal characters of the struggle for freedom.

Carol Dempster heads the cast, with Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton. Among those in the supporting cast are Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Lucile Le Verne, Erville Alderson, Louis Wolheim, Rhea Hatch and Arthur Donaldson.

A Shot That Will Soon Be Seen 'Round the World. The Griffith Version of the Battle of Bunker Hill, One of the Many Thrilling Scenes from the Forthcoming Film, "America." Soldiers of the Regular Army Took the Part of Both the British Red Coats and the Embattled New England Farmers.
(By Wide World Photos)

Cincinnati (O) Billboard 2/23/24

Movie Weekly (Nyc) Feb 23 1924

Asheville (NC) Citizen 2/17/24

NEW TOP-MONEY FILMS OPEN ON BROADWAY

New York, Feb. 18.—Two new films open at Broadway legitimate theaters this week at top admission prices of $1.50 and better. Marion Davies' latest, "Yolanda", opens at the Cosmopolitan Tuesday and D. W. Griffith's "America" comes to the Forty-fourth Street Theater Thursday. Metro's "Thy Name is Woman" opens at the Lyric March 3, for a run.

Arthur Dewey is the gentleman upon whom the distinction of playing George Washington in D. W. Griffith's production "America" has fallen. Careful comparison with measurements, portraits, and sculptures of the First President have proven Dewey to be as nearly like him as one mortal can be like another. Mr. Dewey's ancestry dates from revolutionary days, by the way.

Middletown (O) Signal 2-9-24

Santa Cruz (Cal) News 2/4/24

Buffalo (NY) Commercial Feb 16 1924

Sir Percy Sykes, former Commander-in-Chief of the British forces in Persia, was able to give some advice to D. W. Griffith in staging scenes of America, the photodrama of the War of Independence.

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his Revolutionary War picture which is to open next week in New York. It will be officially called America, Series One—The Sacrifices.

The highest European waterfall is that of the Staubbach, in Switzerland. It is nearly 900 feet high.

Charleston (SC) News & Courier Feb 10 1924

Chicago (Ill) News 2/16/24

ANTI-RUMOR CAMPAIGN TO BE LAUNCHED

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which despite their falsity gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $250,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the Colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press, it had swollen into a $250,000 catastrophe, all through idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in scenes at Lexington when the taking the Revolutionary militia scene containing six thousand feet of negatives were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 100,000 feet of negative had been stolen and demanded gold.

So much exaggeration of this nature prevails among the scribes that the Hays organization will be prepared to inaugurate their campaign of suppression immediately upon their return to Los Angeles.

Newsy Newsy Nuggets.

From gentle reader of these lines confesses that he is sick to death of letters from Egyptologists and wants to know why I don't publish a little live news for a change.

And so, being devoted to a life of service, I submit herewith the latest gossip as I have gleaned it from press agents and other unreliable sources:

D. W. Griffith's new picture, "America," opens in New York on February 21. . . . Anita Stewart, who is appearing in "The Great White Way," is very fond of flowers. "Sincerity will make or break a picture," says Finis Fox, who is now directing "A Woman Who Sinned." William Clifford has abandoned his career in the speaking stage and will return to the screen. . . . Mr. and Mrs. Pat O'Malley are planning a trip to Ireland soon. . . . Jackie Coogan is out on location for his next picture.

BY CARL SANDBURG.

America is racing through the minds of movie makers like one of filmdom's own forest fires. The big epic themes and national extravaganzas of adventure in America are tempting more and more producers into action.

D. W. Griffith is just completing his "America," a story of George Washington and the revolution. First National is winding up "Sundown," a tremendous production of the last "round-up" in the west, a story of the departure of the vast herds of cattle off the plains before the advance of the homesteaders.

And through Chicago the other day paraded Richard Walton Tully with a print of "Flowing Gold" under his arm. "Flowing Gold" is Tully's attempt to show the chaos, the boom-madness of Oklahoma and Texas in the recent oil furore.

"The Covered Wagon," showing the pioneering wagons and the gold rush to California in '49, has given the world an accurate and superbly thrilling idea of what life was like then," says Tully. "The Spoilers" has done something the same thing for the Klondike rush of twenty-five years ago. "Sundown" will teach the world what the great cattle ranges were before and up to the time the railroads cut through. I have tried to make 'Flowing Gold' move and live in the same strain. Lawlessness, fever-bit gambling, claim jumping, are stark evidence of the old western sort now been alive in the oil fields within the last five years, and added to that has been a new kind of violence, the violence that unscrupulous millionaires can practice in mahogany sanctuary. The excitement in the oil fields with great millionaires using all the tricks known to money manipulation and their hands on some of the wide war tactics of American history, made the Indian massacres of the Pioneers seem like the most primitive sort of war. Oil wells burning, oil rivers running, gusher and derrick, gusher and derrick, gusher and derrick

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Bought The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "extras."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even thoroughly in every way—notably in reproduction of the battle scenes. Four motion picture cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the same action which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in outlying districts. A number of such companies were flocked to Cape Ann, Massachusetts, and the photoplay cameras and film confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been completed.

The Daughters of Revolution are devoted to "America" too, and are undoubtedly the first to give to expressing the wide feeling of the War of Independence with more fidelity to historical accuracy than others of their sex have done in years, but some, than others perhaps, appeared in the house that Hamilton of Fame once occupied during the course of the war. Women, joined the Daughters of Revolution who had thought in Colonial days to be a lady was to be a patriot, and who had practiced the dances, and generally have that a Revolutionary dame.

Although it had long rankled the patriotic descendants of the American Revolution, of the Revolutionary dames, that the movies should be allowed to make a travesty of the Revolution, and that the movies should be allowed to make a travesty of the Revolution, and that the movies should be allowed to make a travesty of the Revolution, and

CENTRAL PRESS CLIPPING SERVICE
INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA

Mansfield (O) News Feb 8 1924

Chicago (Ill) News Feb 15 1924

Houston (Tex) Chronicle 2/19/24

St. Paul (Minn) Sun 2/15/24

WASHINGTON IND. DEMOCRAT
Tuesday, Feb. 12, 1924
SIX

Charles Bennett, who began his career with Edwin Booth, quit the boards to become a lawyer, and returned to portray an important role in "America."

...of Sacrifice.

D. W. Griffith has modified the name of his revolutionary war picture which is to open Feb. 21, at the Forty-Fourth Street theater, New York. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifices." This is done to avoid confusion as to the theme, since the dramatic story Mr. Griffith has produced, emphasizes the sacrifices which Americans made to establish their independence. Mr. Griffith hopes to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures portraying the dramatic history of America.

Carol Dempster, leading woman in D. W. Griffith's "America," now being filmed, had a narrow escape from death when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of one of the scenes. The spirited mare Miss Dempster was riding slipped in the mud and fell, throwing the actress. She suffered a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle. The scene had to be refilmed.

D. W. Griffith Makes "America" for D

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

The Minutemen Prepare To Fire From Historic Buckman Tavern

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the novel way in which Griffith is producing the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must appear in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their camera to the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and scenic backgrounds, Revolutionary documents, and the original men of the United States Army as "extras."

On the idea continent of "letting the public in" to view the actual taking of a motion picture is startling and admirable, even though in several cases—notably in representation of the battle scenes—extra men, women and children had to take "shots" of the same action again and again in order to get them in proper perspective for an artistic picture. A number of such scenes were taken recently in New York and vicinity, and the public was allowed to view the actual taking of the scenes.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the same and historic chests of their ancestors, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from stamps, spoons, and drums, to garments and costumes resembling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props" in "America" historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

Griffith aim in producing the present epoch has been achieved partly through the combination of a special corps of research experts. The theories, which has proven of paramount, that the public interest is comparatively unimportant if Griffith succeeds in producing a film which will be a faithful representation of the times and events of Revolutionary days, and the people who lived in those times, passing through the primary stage of being "extras" in the film, have proved groundless. The public has been given an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the same and historic chests of their ancestors, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from stamps, spoons, and drums, to garments and costumes resembling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props" in "America" historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

Griffith's aim in producing the present epoch has been achieved partly through the combination of a special corps of research experts. The theories, which has proven of paramount, that the public interest is comparatively unimportant if Griffith succeeds in producing a film which will be a faithful representation of the times and events of Revolutionary days, and the people who lived in those times, passing through the primary stage of being "extras" in the film, have proved groundless. The public has been given an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

...most widely known as an author of love stories, has written a number of historical novels, and is generally regarded as one of the best read men in the country on the Revolutionary period. He has made a specialty of Paul Revere, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chambers called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our western plains never had horses, but fought afoot. Chambers has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chambers called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our western plains never had horses, but fought afoot. Chambers with Lexington Common, the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

D. W. Griffith who made "America"

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very modern wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like mad, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians directed his players and United States Soldiers, fighting the battles of the War of Independence.

Thus the whole the entire action in some five hot been drilled in the pageant of arms, in the history and history of revolutionary times. Flying messengers then and called the master stage of operations of Nine Times the Thirty and by bugle and flag of Washington's Army.

Under the supervision of Army officers capable of leading step and flag in and formations, but including the battles of the Minutemen, the Battle of Lexington and Concord, the Battle of Bunker Hill, the Battle of Saratoga, the Battle of Yorktown, and the surrender of Cornwallis, the Revolutionary Army was drilled in the art of warfare

Buffalo (N.Y.) Times Feb 17 1924

The days of Washington recalled—D. W. Griffith's version of the Battle of Bunker Hill; a scene from the new photoplay "America."

Boston Post Feb 20 1924

Screen Gossip

Carol Dempster

D. W. Griffith's Revolutionary war film, "America," which will receive its world premiere tomorrow night in New York, comes to Boston Monday evening, March 10, at the Majestic Theatre.

Because Boston audiences were so very kind to Mr. Griffith's other big productions, "Hearts of the World," "Way Down East," and "Orphans of the Storm," he was most anxious that the picture be shown in Boston first, but theatrical contracts prevented.

The new Griffith film will be released as "America"—Series One—"The Sacrifices," so as to avoid confusion in regard to its real theme. Mr. Griffith is planning to make further films relating to the development of our country.

Carol Dempster is the heroine of "America," while Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton have the leading male parts.

Danbury (Conn) News Feb 20

"AMERICA'S" OPENING.

Parties from Washington and Elsewhere to See Film.

New York will have its first view to-morrow night of the D. W. Griffith motion picture, "America," which was given a preliminary showing in this city last week.

An announcement from the Griffith offices says that three congressmen are making a special trip from Washington to New York, and parties of prominent society folk are proceeding from Virginia, Pennsylvania and New England to the metropolis to attend the premiere of the picture at the Forty-fourth Street theatre, February 21. The congressmen being lured from troubles of state by a desire to attend the first performance of this photodrama of the Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, are Allen P. Treadway, E. H. Fenn and Charles M. Moore.

The Virginia party includes Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane, of Westover; G. Watson James, national historian, Sons of the Revolution, Mrs. James, J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish and Miss Agnes Moyher, of Richmond.

The United States Army, which had an important part in the making of the picture, will be represented by Maj.-General Bullard, commander of the department of the east, and a distinguished coterie of officers, while Mrs. Charles White Nash and eighteen regents of the D. A. R. will represent that organization.

Mansfield (Ohio) News Feb. 14. 192[redacted]

SECRET SHOWING HELD

A secret trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture [redacted] the Rialto Theatre, South Norwalk Saturday night indicates this may be his most successful production, even surpassing in popularity "The Birth of a Nation". It was presented in a three and four fourths hours showing, with eighteen reels, and the reception was the most enthusiastic any of his productions have ever received. Interest in the historic battles was particularly intense, and excitedly applauded.

Presiding Judge J. J. Walsh of Connecticut, acting as chairman of a delegation, informed Mr. Griffith the new picture "is the greatest you or anyone else has ever made, and is a national asset of incomparable value. It will have greater patriotic influence than any document ever published since The Declaration of Independence. We are radiant with its influence."

Miami (Fla) News Metropolis 2/18/24

[redacted] of less than 48 hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture "America," which opens at the Forty-fourth Street theatre, New York, the evening of Feb. 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary War. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the day of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States Army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions till that time for the first snow flakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north to the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

So the weather man and fate carried the suspense to within 48 hours of disaster before obliging with a real snow that will carry the bloody footprints of Valley Forge into "America."

Indianapolis Ind Star Feb 17 1924

To the left and above are scenes from the D. W. Griffith production of "America" the photodrama of the War of Independence filmed under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Arthur Dewey is George Washington and Carol Dempster is Nancy Montague.

New Bedford (Mass) Mercury Feb 20 1924

TO BE GUEST AT FIRST PRODUCTION OF "AMERICA"

Mrs. Elizabeth Musgrave, who is employed in the local office of the Whaling Film corporation, producers of "Down to the Sea in Ships" leaves the city Wednesday night for New York city where she will be the guest of D. W. Griffith at the premier presentation of his picture "America" on Thursday evening.

Northampton (Mass) Gazette 2/21/24

GREAT BARRINGTON MAN WROTE SCENARIO FOR THE MOVIE "AMERICA"

(Special to the Gazette)

Washington, Feb. 21.—The man who wrote the scenario for "America," Griffith's widely heralded moving picture which opened at the 44th Street Theatre in New York Thursday, is a product of Western Massachusetts. He is John L. E. Pell of Great Barrington, and, incidentally, is a friend of Congressman Treadway's. Mr. Pell also wrote "Down to the Sea in Ships," the movie in which New Bedford played such a colorful part.

D. S. Griffith

No Adams (Mass) Transcript 2/21/24

GREAT BARRINGTON MAN IS THE AUTHOR

Wrote Scenario for Widely Heralded Moving Picture

Pittsfield (Mass) Telegram 2/20/24

Prominent Actors Added to Among

THE FOREWORD

Great Griffith Film, "America" A Masonic Canvas

Mamaroneck (N.Y.) Paragraph Feb 14 1924

CAMERAS BUSY AT "VALLEY FORGE"

At last the Battle of Bunker Hill has been fought, the winter has come, and Washington is at Valley Forge!

Monday morning George Washington stepped about the end of Octoraro Point, which is its new resting of [illegible] was made of represent the winter encampment of the Continental troops near Philadelphia. It was the great chapter of [illegible] the old Continental army [illegible] waiting for all this time. Because of the lack of the elaborate money which has been set up on Octoraro Mr. Griffith did not want to go further north. And the snow at last proved the last about the south.

Because in the traffic [illegible] Boston early in the morning. The Continental soldiers suffered further again from the bitter cold. The [illegible] spirit of the "Valley of the Shadow" at Valley Forge is now [illegible] on the screen for posterity.

The snow fell early Tuesday morning. It was a great moment for Mamaroneck, N. Y., because that now [illegible] that the name of Mamaroneck and the Mamaroneck Paragraph is [illegible] in the United States [illegible] in the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of

CO-WORKERS ON "AMERICA"

Robert W. Chambers — John L. E. Pell

The new Griffith film, "America," which will have its premiere Thursday in New York, was produced from a story by Mr. Chambers. Mr. Pell, author of the scenario of "Down to the Sea in Ships," made the historic arrangement for the picture.

RICHMOND (VA.) TIMES-DISPATCH
FEBRUARY 21, 1924

This Little World

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK.—Sometimes this entire little world seems to be tucked away within the four walls of a movie studio. Furniture and garb of every known period and place may be found. And certainly all the human emotions that send this old globe spinning around, from "Ambition" down—are there!

We were standing off in a corner of the big Griffith studio, near here, watch D. W. himself tell Lionel Barrymore how to go "through the motions." Other actors of lesser caliber stood motionless, listening.

Griffith gets up at 5 a. m. Often he skips breakfast. They tell a story that he suddenly remembered one night at 10 o'clock that "by George, I forgot to eat anything today."

Many scenes that take but 30 or 60 seconds to flash on the screen, consume an entire day in filming. This holds true in all studios.

One day I was visiting a certain movie studio, internationally famous. On the big floor, a busy scene indeed, were screen celebrities known in the most remote corner of the world.

One whole company, making a war film, was standing about doing nothing. The star, a temperamental young woman, was arguing with the owner of the company. Her name had been in big electric lights on Broadway, advertising the film she was making. But the day before the sign had come down and the name of another star of the company, equally noted, went up.

That made the young woman in question very, very angry. And the following day the sign of her rival came down!

If there is one thing that amazes the visitor more than any other one thing at a movie studio, it is the elaborate work in preparation for a big set.

Before a scene is taken, the director's conception of what the garden, or house, or street—or whatever it happens to be—is given to architects. The latter make blue-print drawings, and these drawings are turned over to carpenters who go ahead building the set according to specifications just exactly as they would build a skyscraper.

Usually one scene is being shot in one part of a studio while carpenters are working on another in the opposite corner.

And one person in a thousand of the unknowing who goes to break into pictures could stand the shock of the sights with which confronts the newcomer. The director yelling, "Quiet, please!" the camera men, the lighting men, the actors and actresses, the extras, the people who are just there because they want to be there, the curious onlookers, the hangers-on, the people who are just there because they have no place else to go, the mechanics, the electricians, the property men, the carpenters, the painters, the plasterers, the scenic artists, the wardrobe women, the cameras, the lights, the microphones, the sets, the sets, the sets

Screen Mirror 2/23/24 (Ny Times Eve Daily Boston (Mass) 2/23/24 Denver (Colo) Traveler 2/23/24 Times 2/23/24 Syracuse (Ny) Telegram 2/23/24 Ny Telegraph Feb 24 1924 Ny Herald Feb 24 1924

The striking likeness of Arthur Dewey to the First President of the United States, and the perfection of the make-up, adds very materially to the success of the D. W. Griffith film depicting the early struggles for America's freedom from English rule. A considerable period of time, and the most exhaustive research, was lavished on the costuming of this production.

"America" Crowning Achievement for Griffith

Griffith and his horsemen have done it again over at the 44th Street with "America." The natural historic interest that the picture contains reaches its height in the depicting of Paul Revere's ride, midway in the first half, this being unquestionably due to the manner in which the director has presented it. Following a story from the pen of Robert W. Chambers, the theme is set in the Revolutionary period concluding with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

The picture seems to slow up towards the latter stages of the initial half and never again picks up the enthusiasm touched by that ride, although a second solo gallop is revealed in the after intermission period, as well as Griffith's well-known capabilities of picturing a body of horsemen on a rescue mission. Most of the later stanza is taken up with the story itself, and there is undeniably room for deletion. Running 164 minutes, the film is over long and suffers thereby.

Nevertheless it's a splendid production from whatever angle you take it and can not miss at the box office. The camera work is remarkable, even if Griffith has inserted a few of the same type of "phoney" background double exposure flashes that he used in the "Nation," besides projecting a uniform performance from the cast that is on a par with the qualifications the picture calls for.

Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Erville Alderson, Charles E. Mack, Arthur Dewey and Lionel Barrymore are the six principal players, with there being a wealth of lesser lights. Camera men are listed as Hendrik Startov, G. W. Bitzer, Marcel Le Picard and H. S. Sintzenich.

The underline on the title signalizes the picture as being of Series One with this first release of the unit, in turn, named as "The Sacrifice for Freedom."

It has been reported that this latest of Griffith specials about equals his "Way Down East" in cost, which would place the total in the neighborhood of $950,000. Besides which the effort gained its initial impulse through a request from the Society of Daughters of the Revolution.

The picture is there. Of that there can be no question, and it is simply further proof that Griffith not only has, but can still stage 'em and stage 'em right.

BARRYMORE HAS STRONG PRAISE FOR GRIFFITH

Because he believes Walter Butler, the villian of the American Revolution—the man of whom historians have written that he was "without a single redeeming trait of character,"—is the exception which proves the rule, Lionel Barrymore, who played the role of Butler in D. W. Griffith's "America," declares that the new Griffith picture will go far to cement the friendly relations between this country and Great Britain.

"America," was filmed by Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"The role of Walter Butler, the character made famous by Chambers in 'Cadigan,' is probably the most villainous one I have ever been called upon to play, and that despite the fact that I have enacted some pretty villainous roles," said Barrymore, recently between "shots" at the Griffith studios at Mamaroneck.

Barrymore made his debut in motion pictures under the direction of Griffith in the old Biograph days.

"Mr. Griffith is the only director in my knowledge who has a conception of acting," he declared.

"It is to him that the other directors and producers owe their knowledge and the tools of their trade. Take anyone of your big pictures of today and you will find that we did the same thing, and probably a good deal better, back in the old days, under Mr. Griffith.

"He originated the effects which the directors of today use, almost without exception. He paved the way and none of them have succeeded in bettering any of his methods.

"During my close assocfation with him in the filming of 'America,' I have failed to find any radical change in Mr. Griffith himself. He is still the calm, smiling, courteous gentleman he was in the old Biograph days, as affable with the lowliest "extra" as with the most highly paid principal.

Stage and Screen

Campaign to Check Gossip in Film Studios Started.

The motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst its studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which despite their falsity gain the dignity of facts thru wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting rather than accurate news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact during the taking of a scene Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press it had swollen into a $200,000 catastrophe, all thru idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in taking the Revolutionary battle scenes at Lexington, when two cases containing 6,000 feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 180,000 feet of negative had been stolen and secretly sold.

So much exaggeration of this nature arises among the actors that the lectures will be designed to impress them with the harm such looseness may cause the industry.

'D. W.' HIMSELF AGAIN WITH 'AMERICA'

New Historical Film Is His Best Since "Way Down East," Says Critic.

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS

NEW YORK, Feb. 23.—David Wark Griffith is himself again. After dabbling for months in inconsequential film tales, he returned to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre with "America," which is by far the best thing that he has made since "Way Down East."

There are those who may even say that it is better. Certainly the lighting effects, the photography and the dramatic action constitute competition that "Way Down East" fails to meet, or any other Griffith production, for that matter.

"America" is an improved and modernized edition of "The Birth of a Nation." In many ways they are very much alike—differing, of course, in the causes that led up to the rebellions. If Mr. Griffith had not used the title "The Birth of a Nation" in his first picture, it would be an admirable title for "America," which, in reality, tells of the causes that led up to the Revolution, with the colonists' demand for freedom and the real birth of a new nation.

* * *

IN the past I have taken issue with Mr. Griffith because he has not always supplied himself with a story worthy of his directorial efforts. In "America" he has taken no such chance, but with Robert W. Chambers as the author he has had a main theme, a romance in which two young people are a part of the happenings of those exciting days.

Of those two central figures, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton, honors go to Miss Dempster, who has been looked upon heretofore as merely a pretty young ingenue. She gave everyone a surprise with her performance of Nancy Montague by blossoming out as a full fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown, perhaps, even to Mr. Griffith. In the scene where her young brother dies she is especially good, matching her acting with her beauty.

Neil Hamilton gives a very fair account of himself, although he is outplayed both by Miss Dempster and Charles Mack, who is another protege of Mr. Griffith. Young Mack plays Charles Montague, son of the Virginia artistocrat who meets his death fighting with the Americans.

* * *

THERE is such a wealth of historical data associated with the period of 1776 that no one producer could possibly touch it all. Mr. Griffith has left unfilmed enough material to furnish at least three other productions. For example, he has not pictured Washington crossing the Delaware and he has only scratched the surface of the Winter at Valley Forge, showing only a few of the terrible privitiations suffered by the American troops.

The high light in the picture is the ride of Paul Revere, who rushes over fences and through ponds to warn the citizens in the villages of Lexington and Concord of the approach of the British. The Old North Church, with replicas of the Revere lanterns, were used to get this scene.

We have the Battle of Bunker Hill, the conflict at Lexington and Concord Bridge, all those things bringing back our history to us and making us realize something of the suffering that our ancestors endured to found our America.

I WANT to commend Mr. Griffith for his delineation of George Washington. In the past he has been pictured as a cold, austere man. In "America" he is made very human with some of the human qualities that have made Abraham Lincoln such a popular character. Arthur Dewey gives a great portrayal of George Washington, account is due to be given for his work in the part. Lionel Barrymore, as the British governor of Virginia, and that is his role in the picture, Walter Butler, the villain of the piece, and Charles Emmet Mack, who is another protege of Mr. Griffith, are the principal men in the picture.

Mr. Griffith returns to his old form in this picture. Mr. Hays, the motion picture czar, and other authorities have said that the film industry is in a rut, that the public is tired of the same old stuff, that the public is tired of the same old stuff, that the public is tired of the same old stuff. Mr. Griffith has given us a picture which will be a tonic to the jaded nerves of the public. It is a picture which will be a tonic to the jaded nerves of the public. It is a picture which will be a tonic to the jaded nerves of the public. It is

"America", New Griffith Film, Is Coming

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a photodrama of the War of Independence, made at the request of the Daughters of the Revolution, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre on Monday, March 3.

Griffith toured the principal shrines of American liberty to take "shots" on original sites as far as possible. Patriotic societies placed at his disposal every facility they possessed, turning over historic museums, and taking from their museum cases invaluable relics for use as "props." Even descendants of Revolutionary families besieged him for the opportunity to act as extra people.

Through Secretary of War Weeks detachments of infantry and cavalry were secured to impersonate British grenadiers and Continental soldiers, to refight the major battle of the Revolution. Army officers plotted the strategy of the Revolution.

The story of "America" was written by Robert W. Chambers, John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships," made the historical arrangement.

Carol Dempster heads the cast, with Neil Hamilton playing the hero and Lionel Barrymore the villain. Other principals are Lucille La Verne, Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim, Arthur Dewey and Erville Alderson.

Boston Morning Globe 2/24/24

"AMERICA" FILM COMING TO MAJESTIC

"America," D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the War of Independence, made for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the struggles of this country for freedom, will have its first Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre, Monday evening, March 3.

Practically every historical and patriotic organization in the country, including the Lexington Historical Society and the Massachusetts Historical Society cooperated in the making of this remarkable and thrilling drama, loaning invaluable relics for use as properties and valuable documents for research purposes.

Descendants of revolutionary families appear in the picture as extra people and large units of the American Regular Army, loaned for the purpose by Secretary of War Weeks, refought the major battles of the war.

Carol Dempster heads the cast with Neil Hamilton playing the hero and Lionel Barrymore the villain. Others of the 38 principals in the cast are: Lucille La Verne, Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim, Arthur Dewey and Erville Alderson.

Many of the scenes were taken on the original sites at the leading shrines of American history, including Lexington, Concord and the Old North Church.

Boston Post 2/24/24

America to Be Shown For Soldiers' Club

A special showing of "America," the new D. W. Griffith film, will be given tomorrow night at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre for the benefit of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Club of New York. The entire proceeds will be donated by Mr. Griffith to the club, which is located at 261 Madison avenue. Boxes and seats may be secured from Miss Mabel R. Beardsley at 30 West Forty-fourth street.

Major-Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, Major-Gen. Henry C. Hale, Rear Admiral Harry P. Huse, Major-Gen. John A. Lejeune, Rear Admiral Charles P. Plunkett and Rear Admiral William S. Sims are honorary presidents of the club, of which Mrs. Francis Rogers is president and Miss Beardsley vice-president.

The executive committee includes Mmes. George Barr Baker, Blaine Beale, Graham F. Blandy, William T. Blodgett, John W. Castles, Jr., Jay Coogan, John Corbin, Walter Damrosch and Charles D. Dickey; Miss Rosina Hoyt, Mrs. Edwin Jameson, Miss Elizabeth Lamont, Mrs. Herbert McBride, Mrs. Harold C. Mathews, Mrs. J. West Roosevelt, Mrs. William H. Sheldon, Mrs. Otis Skinner, Mrs. H. B. Steffanson, Mrs. Arthur Terry, Miss Amelia White, Mrs. Elliot B. Whiting, Mr. Francis R. Appleton, Jr., Mr. William R. Chadbourne.

N. Y. Herald 2/24/24

Kentucky Women Take Over Theater for Two Performances

The Society of Kentucky Women of New York will take over the Princess Theater for two performances of "Sun Up" on the nights of February 25 and 26 for the benefit of the Hindman School, Hindman, Knott County, Ky.

Miss S. S. Grigsby, 27 West Tenth Street, is chairman, and Miss Marion Williamson, personal representative of the school, has come up from the South to assist Miss Grigsby. A reception will be held in the lounge of the Princess Theater after the performances to meet Colonel D. W. Griffith, the picture producer, recently made a Kentucky colonel by Governor Morrow of that state; Miss Lula Vollmer, the author of "Sun Up", Miss Lucille La Verne, who plays the leading part; the rest of the cast and Miss May Stone, the head of the school since its foundation twenty-two years ago. There will also be an exhibition of the handicraft of the mountain boys and girls as taught by the school.

N. Y. Telegram 2/24/24

A special performance of "America," the new photo play at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, will be given tomorrow evening for the benefit of the Soldiers and Sailors' Club of New York. The committee in charge includes Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Mrs. George Barr Baker, Mrs. Blaine Beale, Mrs. Graham F. Blandy, Mrs. William T. Blodgett, Mrs. J. West Roosevelt, Mrs. Arthur Terry, Mrs. Harold C. Mathews, Mrs. Elliot B. Whiting, Mrs. William H. Sheldon, Mrs. Edwin Jameson, Mrs. Jay Coogan, Mrs. Francis R. Appleton, Jr., Mrs. Charles D. Dickey, Miss Rosina Hoyt, Miss Elizabeth Lamont, Mr. Howard Chayer Kingsbury and George W. Pickersham. Boxes and seats may be obtained from Miss Mabel R. Beardsley, 30 West Fortieth street.

St. Paul (Minn) News 2/24/24

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH has modified the name of his Revolutionary war picture which is now being presented in New York. It is to be called "America—Series One—The Sacrifices." This is said to have been done to avoid confusion as to the theme since the dramatic story is declared to emphasize the sacrifices Americans made to establish their independence. It is Mr. Griffith's intention to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures depicting the dramatic history of America's development.

N. Y. Tribune 2/24/24

Several prominent actors have just been added to the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photoplay of the War of Independence which is being made for the Daughters of the American Revolution. In addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore in the leading roles, will be seen Lucille La Verne, Louis Wolheim, well-known for his performance in "The Hairy Ape;" Rilla Hatch, singer and actor; Arthur Donaldson, musical comedy star; Erville Alderson; Sidney Deane, Edwin Holland and James Clarence Mulcahy. No word has come from the local chapter of the D. A. R. as to whether the picture will be shown here.

Providence (RI) Journal 2/24/24

Griffith Sends Out Challenge

NEW YORK, Feb. 23.—With the recent claim that a new record has been made for the longest run of a motion picture on Broadway the D. W. Griffith Company results that "The Birth of a Nation" ran at the Liberty theater for forty-four weeks. This theater has a seating capacity 15 per cent greater than the Criterion theater, in which the new record is claimed. In a full page newspaper, the Griffith Company says that "The Birth of a Nation" ran three weeks longer than "Way Down East" at the Criterion theater.

Griffith Changes Name of Revolutionary War Film

Newspaper Opinions

"America"—D. W. Griffith 44th St. Theater

AMERICAN—David Wark Griffith is himself again. After dabbling for months in inconsequential film tales, he returned * * * with "America," which is by far the best thing that he has made since "Way Down East." There is such a wealth of historical data associated with the period of 1776 that no one producer could possibly touch it all. Mr. Griffith has left unfilmed enough material to furnish at least three other productions.

DAILY NEWS—The first half of Mr. Griffith's "America" is all charm; the second half, all war. No one can outdo him in the films when it comes to charm, and he has a flair for battle scenes which serves him well in such a tale as this. * * * Mr. Griffith will do well to cut footage, especially in the latter half. And if he ripped out a certain grinding scene, showing a dead soldier carried in to his father's room, I should not mind. Outside of that—the ayes have it, for "America."

EVENING JOURNAL—" * * A living, breathing document of the sacrifice and ideals of the men who freed America. The production is intensely vivid, and historically accurate and fascinating. Mr. Griffith amassed a wealth of detail, and, with comprehensive vision, represented every actual occurrence of the period of the Revolutionary War, and wove into it, an appealingly romantic story. One is held tense through the innumerable thrilling incidents of the period—all of which Mr. Griffith has taken together, and, with a crescendo of dramatic intensity, combined into one, human, compelling whole.

EVENING WORLD—"America," in our estimation, is the greatest thrill-picture of the season; but when we say "thrill," * * * the thrill one gets out of "America" is one that brings every bit of patriotism to the boiling over point. * * * The writer has seen many big pictures, but we cannot recall one single instance since "The Birth of a Nation" when we so much desired to give voice to our enthusiasm. * * * By all means "See America First." Then go see it again to retrieve the parts slithered over during your first visit. Verily, verily—David Wark Griffith has done it again!

HERALD—" * * Perhaps the most thrilling episode that the silent drama has ever achieved. It is the midnight ride of Paul Revere. For spectacular dash, coupled with tremendous historic significance, the movies have never known its equal. * * * In this instance, the Griffith formula has been reversed. Revere's magnificent ride comes at the very start of the picture, instead of at the finish. * * * It is safe to assume that, if D. W. Griffith had staged the revolution, he would have forced Paul Revere to wait a few years. It's too bad he didn't. For, after the battles of Lexington and Concord, "America" resolves itself into a mammoth and thoroughly lamentable anti-climax. There are subsequent moments of greatness—notably in the scenes at Valley Forge—but the general trend of Mr. Griffith's spectacle is down-hill. The later reels are incoherent and wearisome and the finish extremely flat. * * * There are, however, plenty of scenes in "America" which reflect the erratic genius of D. W. Griffith. Many of them are beautiful and impressive.

MORNING TELEGRAPH—Viewed from any standpoint, this latest production of a great director must be called a masterpiece of exquisite photography, flawless direction and of blood-stirring, appealing force. * * * The only criticism that could be heard last night was that in working out his double theme there was at times a slowing down of the action. The drama was too much subordinated to the development of the spectacle.

SUN—The first half * * * represents by all odds the most thrilling and satisfying motion picture entertainment in the city. It is inspiring not only because its subject matter is inspiring, but because it has been produced with a bit of the sweep and fire and fine indignation that spurred our forefathers to the signing of their declaration of independence. * * * Thereafter, however, "America" seemed to become only an exceptionally thrilling, primarily directed movie. It seemed to have lost some of the revolutionary fire of the first half. A little of it was a bit cheap, in addition.

TELEGRAM—Not since the "Birth of a Nation" has he produced as noteworthy a film, although it may not be so orgiastic, in so far as numbers and sets are concerned. * * * By all means, you film fanatics who rave and rant about the wonderful pictures you have seen, see "America" next. Then you'll have a real good reel to talk about—something to brag about.

TIMES—" * * Because in the latter half of his production the artist got the better of the showman and insisted on length, which failing will undoubtedly be remedied by generous cutting. * * * But the first reels of this photodrama, which incidentally was sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution, are something to be remembered, something greater than even Griffith has ever done himself. Nobody who views this marvelous section of the production will ever forget his rendering of Paul Revere's historic ride. * * * Tears were drawn last night, and sighs and sobs came from trembling women. * * * The Battle of Bunker Hill and Paul Revere's ride make up for all the superfluous detail in the latter half of this picture, which is certainly one that will stir the patriotic hearts of the nation as probably no other picture ever has done.

TIMES SQUARE DAILY—Griffith and his horsemen have done it again * * * The picture seems to slow up towards the latter stages of the initial half and never again picks up the enthusiasm touched by that ride, although a second solo gallop is revealed in the after intermission period, as well as Griffith's well-known capabilities of picturing a body of horsemen on a rescue mission. Most of the later stanza is taken up with the story itself, and there is undeniably room for deletion. Running 164 minutes, the film is over long and suffers thereby. * * * The picture is there. Of that there can be no question, and it is simply further proof that Griffith not only has, but can still stage 'em and stage 'em right.

TRIBUNE—The second half of "America" cannot compare in anyway with the first, but its faults cannot impair the memory of that first great half when Paul Revere takes his famous ride. This to us was the greatest screen thrill of all our experience. * * * We are quite sure that we were not the only person in the theater who got nervous and cross and tired when the scenes of sensual revelry were dragged out interminably. * * * This, then, is our grievance; but in spite of it "America" is a great picture—one of the greatest.

WORLD—The mightiest thrill which we have ever met in the cinema is the ride of Paul Revere in "America." * * * Here is a motion picture which will set a new standard of achievement in this picture play fully as high and as commanding as Mr. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" set in its day. By virtue of this latest product of the man from Mamaroneck, Mr. Griffith, for our own part, passes definitely into the ranks of those whom we think of as being the immortals.

Fargo (ND) Tribune 2/24/24

"America" Opens Less Than 48 Hours After Last Scene Is Made

With a margin of less than 48 hours to spare of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture "America" which opened at the Forty Fourth Street theater, New York, the evening of February 21.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary war. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the day of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island have been waiting under instructions all that time for the first snow flakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north to the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

With the opening of the picture set for Thursday, it became necessary for all scenes to be finally arranged in the picture Tuesday night that the negative might be turned over to the cutters for final assembly of the finished print.

So the weather man and fate carried the suspense to within 48 hours of disaster before obliging with a real snow that will carry the bloody footprints of Valley Forge into "America".

Boston Mass Advertiser 2/26/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" AT MAJESTIC MARCH 3

D. W. Griffith's latest picture, "America," with story and titles by Robt. W. Chambers, is coming to the Majestic Theatre next Monday night. As the name suggests, it is a patriotic film, a spectacular depiction of the Revolution. It bears the subtitle of "The Sacrifice" and it presents "the great sacrifice made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation." All the historic Revolutionary events around Boston are featured.

Boston American Feb 26 1924

NERVOUS COLLAPSE

New York, Feb. 25.—David Wark Griffith is on the verge of a nervous collapse following his month's work on "America," the photodrama of the war of independence which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, which opens at the Majestic Theatre, Boston, next week. Mr. Griffith caught a severe cold during the last of the many strenuous all night rehearsals previous to the first public showing here of "America," and is barely able to speak above a whisper and his physicians have prescribed a complete rest for several days.

Boston Transcript 2/25/24

APPROACHING "AMERICA"

Listen, My Children

IN D. W. Griffith's new picture "America" (now at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre in New York and soon to be in Boston), is perhaps the most thrilling episode that the silent drama has ever achieved. It is the midnight ride of Paul Revere. For spectacular dash, coupled with tremendous historic significance, the movies have never known its equal. There have been notable instances of horsemanship on the screen before—but never one like this. Harry O'Neil, who impersonates Paul Revere, has outclassed Bill Hart, Tom Mix and all the rest in one wild ride. And there must be mention of his splendid mount, which seems to sense the epic importance of the occasion. In every beat of this horse's hoofs resounds the Battle Cry of Freedom. We have never heard such applause in a movie theatre as that which acclaims Paul Revere and his fiery steed. It is applause well earned.

In this instance, the Griffith formula has been reversed. Revere's magnificent ride comes at the very start of the picture, instead of at the finish. Usually, Mr. Griffith holds his horses for the climax, as he did in "The Birth of a Nation," "Intolerance" and "Orphans of the Storm." It is safe to assume that, if D. W. Griffith had staged the revolution, he would have forced Paul Revere to wait a few years. It's too bad he didn't. For, after the battles of Lexington and Concord, "America" resolves itself into a mammoth and thoroughly lamentable anti-climax. There are subsequent moments of greatness—notably in the scenes at Valley Forge—but the general trend of Mr. Griffith's spectacle is down-hill. The later reels are incoherent and wearisome and the finish extremely flat. [R. E. Sherwood in The Herald

Overture: Praise

The first reels of this photodrama, which incidentally was sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution, are something to be remembered, something greater than even Griffith has ever done himself. Nobody who views this marvellous section of the production will ever forget his rending of Paul Revere's historic ride. The audience was torn with suspense, as the man on horseback tore down the roads, dodged the British officers, sprang over stone walls and hedges, leaped clean of crashing ravines and chucked in and out among trees. There was subdued joy in the audience when he outwitted his pursuers, and then came clamorous applause when one of the Royalist riders was chucked off his horse, and quick as a flash Paul Revere was shown clearing a far more difficult jump. The chest and legs of the horse were pictured, and with the crashing music the audience possibly reached its highest pitch of enthusiasm over this marvelous sequence.

Pictures seem wonderful when you can obtain such effects as Griffith has in his depiction of the Battle of Bunker Hill. The uniforms are splendid, and the clockwork precision of the Royalists drilling is a splendid contrast to the efforts of the men in rough every-day clothes who have sped to the call of liberty. In these scenes Mr. Griffith has made wonderful shots. You have the medium shots, and others taken with a six-inch lens giving an idea of the whole battlefield with the apparent midgets in conflict. In all these scenes, and for that matter throughout the whole production, Mr. Griffith's photography is something to compel the admiration of all. He has softened his contours of the frame, as if partly vignetted, and through this means there appears something in the nature of relief in the exterior scenes. [F. W. Mordaunt Hall in The Times

Finale: Demur

During the course of "America," Mr. Griffith turns more and more from history to fiction. At the start he introduces a number of characters who are obviously destined to carry the story with its incidental love interest. For a while these romantic people do not intrude too heavily upon the vastly more important drama in which they are called upon to play a part. But their prominence becomes troublesome, and in the latter half of the picture George Washington has faded into the background to make way for Miss Carol Dempster. Which is unfortunate.

The story of "America" is credited to Robert W. Chambers, although "suggested" by Robert W. Chambers. Starting in not the happiest mood to us. Starting with the scenes which led to the Revolution, it goes through Lexington and Concord, on through Valley Forge, and ends with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. There are side excursions into the House of Commons and the Court of King George III. [The Herald

A Bee in Angelo!

There was undoubtedly a desire to give the dramatic selection of a song for the end of the action part of the drama, and it is not a prophetic metric. The music of the composers in the great Bowl of the New York Metropolitan Opera House and Nancy Malcolm, who is leading prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera House, the author of "King George III." Charles Bennett Mark, Samuel Adams, Lee Hogg, John Hancock, Jack Dalton, King George III, Arthur Donaldson, William Pitt, Charles Bennett, Lord Chamberlain, Dewitt Clark, Paul Revere, Jack Wise, Patrick Henry, Frank Wise, James Washington, Arthur Dewey, Charles Walter Burke, Lionel Barrymore, Paul Revere, Harry O'Neil, Captain Hare, Louis Wolheim, Joseph Brant, Riley Hatch, Children of the Revolution, Joseph Brant, Riley Hatch, Messers to Lafayette, H. Paul Dupuis, Richard Dalton, Lucile La Verne, & Friends Market, Lucile La Verne

By Kelcey Allen

D. W. Griffith's new film production, "America," sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution, is now on view at the 44th Street theatre for the first premiere performance in Thursday night. It has been playing for several weeks and it looks as if it will be here for a good many months.

Mr. Griffith has dropped and produced many memory films, and quite a lot of them are here in this one. The photography is excellent and the direction flawless.

It is a fictitious romantic story, and of the kind that Mr. Griffith has produced in Hollywood, and it is a Griffith production, sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Boston Globe 2/24/24

"America" Opening Postponed

NEW YORK, Feb 25—Owing to the illness of David Wark Griffith, who is suffering from exhaustion following his months of work on "America," the photo drama of the War of Independence, which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Boston premiere has been postponed to Wednesday evening, March 5, at the Majestic Theatre.

Mr Griffith wished, in accordance with his usual custom, to attend the Boston opening in person, so it was thought best to defer that event two days in order to be sure that he may be present.

N. Y. Evening World 2/24/24

moulding with a photo play by William De Mille. Richard Dix is playing the leading male role and Lois Wilson has the most feminine role.

Lionel Barrymore does one of the best death scenes we've ever seen in pictures in "America"—and so universally entertaining is Booth Tarkington's charming stage

Daily News Record 2/26/24

FIRST FILM OF "AMERICA" SERIES AT 44TH STREET

"The Sacrifice," Story of American Revolution, Declared Griffith's Greatest

The Cast.

Nathan Holden ..... Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague ..... Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague ..... Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Howard Montague
Charles Bennett Mark
Samuel Adams ..... Lee Hogg
John Hancock ..... Jack Dalton
King George III ..... Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt ..... Charles Bennett
Lord Chamberlain ..... Dewitt Clark
Patrick Henry ..... Frank Wise
Patrick Henry ..... Frank Wise
James Washington ..... Arthur Dewey
Charles Walter Burke ..... Lionel Barrymore
Paul Revere ..... Harry O'Neil
Captain Hare ..... Louis Wolheim
Child of the Revolution, Joseph Brant ..... Riley Hatch
Messers to Lafayette ..... H. Paul Dupuis
Richard Dalton
A Friends Market ..... Lucile La Verne

Boston Mass Advertiser 2/26/24

IRISH HORSE HIT OF "AMERICA."

The hit of Paul Revere's ride in D. W. Griffith's new picture, "America," at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, is a little horse ridden by the hero in that incident. The name of the horse is Faugh-A-Ballaugh and his owner is William A. Brady, Jr., who purchased him in Dublin during a recent visit to Ireland. The animal has won over a dozen ribbons in Irish horse shows, but this is his theatrical debut.

Boston (Mass) Globe Feb 26 1924

"America" Opening Postponed

NEW YORK, Feb 25—Owing to the illness of David Wark Griffith, who is suffering from exhaustion following his months of work on "America," the photo drama of the War of Independence, which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Boston premiere has been postponed to Wednesday evening, March 5, at the Majestic Theatre.

Mr Griffith wished, in accordance with his usual custom, to attend the Boston opening in person, so it was thought best to defer that event two days in order to be sure that he may be present.

Christian Science Monitor Boston (Mass) Feb 25 1924

D. W. Griffith's "America"

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, Feb. 22—Forty-Fourth Street Theater, Feb. 21, "America," a motion picture, written by Robert W. Chambers, historically arranged by John L. E. Pell, and directed by D. W. Griffith.

After many months of expectancy and coincident with the celebration of Washington's birthday, Series 1 in Mr. Griffith's photo-chronicle of the history of the American people reached the screen last night before a distinguished first-night audience, and for part of its course aroused such enthusiasm as has seldom, if ever, been equaled at a motion picture showing. The first half of the picture deals with the events preceding the opening hostilities of the Revolutionary War in Boston, Virginia and London, and culminates in the famous ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, and the signing of the Declaration of Independence. A superabundance of beautiful photography, historically accurate detail, and dramatic continuity, gives this part of "America" its powerful appeal. Revere's midnight dash through village and farm, over stone walls and ditches, bearing the word that was to call a nation into being, proved the real and somewhat premature climax of the picture.

In the second part Mr. Griffith chooses to follow his old-time tactics of long drawn out sentiment and suspense, with an imperiled heroine and a rescuing hero, galloping steeds and a nip-and-tuck rescue, instead of continuing his epic tale in the grand manner that he started with. Unfortunately the picture drops back from the truly heroic to rather commonplace melodrama and is often in danger of being swamped with a superfluity of complex counterplottings and personalities. It never reaches the heights again despite an artfully coaxed finale of the succoring of "Sacrifice Farm." With the expected elimination or reduction of certain scenes, "America" has the chance to rank among the best productions of recent years, although it would seem that Mr. Griffith has bartered what might so easily have been the greatest motion picture to date for a mess of temperamental pottage.

A charming love story is woven through the scenes of sacrifice and struggle, and when not too obtrusive adds a lively, humanizing touch to the picture. A Tory miss from Virginia and a young northern rebel are caught in the toils of romance and war and find themselves in Lexington at the outbreak of hostilities. A pseudo-balcony scene with the hero perilously tipping on his horse's back as he whispers sweet nothings to his sweetheart leaning from her casement into the gloom of the gathering storm of rebellion, the gallant stand at Lexington of the small band of patriots against superior numbers, and the later and decisive action at the Concord Bridge, when the British troops were routed are memorable pictures, as are the scenes of Washington and his troops in their winter headquarters at Valley Forge, and of his inauguration in New York City.

An unusual aspect of the war is shown in the incidents connected with Lord Walter Butler's raids of the gray lands of northern New York, one of the principal sources of supply for Washington's forces. The merciless treatment of the farmers by the combined British and Indian forces is dealt with at great length, and it is here that "America" falls back into the old melodramatic ways of the silent drama. The scenes in which the Indians are shown torturing the farmers are particularly revolting, and the scenes in which the Indian chief, Brant, and Lord Walter are shown in the act of torturing a young girl are hard to sit through. The Indian chief, Brant, is shown as a cowardly villain, and Lord Walter is made to appear a villain of the deepest dye. The Indian chief, Brant, is played by Riley Hatch, and Lord Walter by Lionel Barrymore.

Among the other characters in the cast are Lucile La Verne as Mme. Montague, Neil Hamilton as Nathan Holden, Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague, Erville Alderson as Justice Montague, Charles E. Mack as Patrick Henry, Frank McGlynn Jr. as King George III, Arthur Donaldson as George Washington, Lionel Barrymore as Captain Walter Butler, Harry O'Neil as Paul Revere, Louis Wolheim as Captain Hare, Riley Hatch as Joseph Brant.

Brooklyn Eagle Feb 25 1924

Music in America.

FORTY-FOURTH STREET THEATER—"America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice." Story and titles by Robert W. Chambers; directed by D. W. Griffith.

THE CAST.

Nathan Holden ..... Neil Hamilton
Miss Nancy Montague ..... Carol Dempster
Justice Montague ..... Erville Alderson
Charles P. E. Montague ..... Charles E. Mack
Patrick Henry ..... Frank McGlynn Jr.
King George III ..... Arthur Donaldson
George Washington ..... Arthur Dewey
Capt. Walter Butler ..... Lionel Barrymore
Paul Revere ..... Harry O'Neil
Captain Hare ..... Louis Wolheim
Joseph Brant ..... Riley Hatch

EGAD, Mr. Griffith, but what a picture you've made, sir!"

That's what we wanted to say to the peer of all the directors in filmdom last Thursday night at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, where "America" was given its metropolitan premiere. But there were so many other enthusiastic admirers of the great D. W. ahead of us that we never got the chance. However, as Sir Philip Gibbs says, now it can be told.

In "America"—the complete title is "America—Series One, The Sacrifice"—Mr. Griffith has borrowed high spots from the pages of our early American history and he has paid it back in romance. Not the romance common to the screen or the stage, but the romance of the foundation of these United States. He has given us something to remind us—after 150 years—of the debt we owe those Yankee rebels of 1776 who lied that we might live—Americans. He has created a new pride of country—rekindled the patriotism of a nation. Griffith has captured the spirit of America.

The new film at the 44th Street Theater is without a doubt the masterpiece of D. W. Griffith's directorial career. It is more thrilling than his "Way Down East," more stupendous than "The Birth of a Nation," which was produced more than 10 years ago and is still drawing capacity audiences wherever it is shown. The famous ride of Paul Revere, so masterfully reproduced in this latest and greatest Griffith achievement, rivals that of the Klansmen in "The Birth." Calloused first nighters and blase critics of the cinema stood up and cheered—really cheered—when Paul, astride his charger, thundered down a strip of moonlit road to warn the Minutemen of Lexington and Concord that the British were coming. "One if by land, two if by sea"—two lights had burned in the tower of Old North Church that night and Revere had ridden well. There are other scenes equally stirring, depicting the privation and hardships suffered by Washington's ragged and starved troops at Valley Forge, the brave stand against General Gage's redcoats at Fort Ticonderoga, the battle of Bunker Hill, at Concord where "the shot was fired that was heard around the world," and still others too numerous to mention.

There is a marked authenticity about each chapter of this picturization of the birth of our nation that adds educational as well as theatrical value to "America." All of the patriotic spirit, of course, that which has to do with the Revolutionary period that is definitely thrown at throughout, is based upon historical materials. Griffith has made use of no dramatic contrivance in the building up of these powerful photoplays.

The cast is one of the finest that has ever been assembled. Neil Hamilton and Carol Dempster, of Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, are the leading roles, and it is safe to say that Griffith has always selected the right people for the parts they have played in his productions. Lionel Barrymore, the actor of King George III, gives a masterly portrayal, and the direction throughout is perfection.

It is a romantic story, and of the kind that Mr. Griffith has produced in Hollywood, and it is a Griffith production, sponsored by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Hamilton (Ohio) News 2/18/24

HERE'S A NEW ONE: MOVIES BY RADIO

N. Y. Herald 2/26/24

GRIFFITH ILL; FILM OPENING IS POSTPONED

Providence Journal 2/24/24

AMERICA

By DANNY

The genius of Griffith. The return of the Master. A tremendously big picture in many ways. And yet, when the end came—abruptly, unexpectedly—something was missing. What was it?

Box office value "America" has. Griffith the showman saw to that. And fought Griffith the artist to a standstill. There is much of showmanship; of box office value in the picture. That the newspaper critics raved over the ride of Paul Revere is natural. That the crowd was thrilled with it quite in keeping with what DW intended. And got.

But where was the grandeur; the epic value of the theme—the greatest in American history? Left to the melodramatic touches of the villain Butler, and his renegade Indians? Is that all Robert Chambers could find?

Where was DW's showmanship in not showing the blood stained tracks of the soldiers at Valley Forge? Colored processes are numerous. A touch of crimson blood on the white snow would have been supremely effective. And where was that great possibility of the camera—Washington crossing the Delaware! And where the reproduction of that famous painting, "The Spirit of '76"? with the tattered trio with fife and drum?

Of course the theme is tremendous. Of course no one—even DW—could, in one night, show the real birth of this nation. And so much had, of necessity, to be thrown away or forgotten. But that so much footage should be wasted on Walter Butler and his villainous crew, seems a pity, when there was so much more important matter to be considered.

"America" is big, is important. It will not have the life and sustaining power of "The Birth of a Nation," but, when cut, it has big possibilities at the box office. The witchery of the Griffith photography is again enthralling. Some of the shots are superb. What effects; what results he gets! And he can be thanked also for finding Neil Hamilton, his leading man. Hamilton will be heard of further.

N. Y. Evening World 2/25/24

Reel Reviews

By Dan Allen

There is but one absolutely new film along Broadway for the present week, and of the other features none has been present quite long enough to number with the old timers.

Those two features are "America," D. W. Griffith's latest and best picture, now showing at the 44th Street, and "Friends," the first Hoot Gibson feature ever made at the Universal.

The last mentioned will shortly be "What a Man's Will," at the Capitol, "Rosemary" at the Criterion, "The Tiger Claws" at the Rialto, "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" at the Colony, "The Spanish Dancer" at the Rialto, "The Sea Wolf" at the Criterion, "The Life of Abraham Lincoln" at the Rialto, "The Blind Bird" at the Plaza, "Dante's Inferno" at the Rialto, "Lady Windermere's Fan" at the Rialto, "Lady Windermere's Fan" at the Rialto, "Lady Windermere's Fan" at the Rialto, "Lady Windermere's Fan" at the Rialto.

N. Y. Sun Feb 25 1924

N. Y. Herald

N. Y. World Feb 25 1924

Tocoma (Wash) Ledger Feb 17 1924

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding possibility to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took D. W. Griffith, one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a mi[illegible] make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a concert feature founded on the story of the American Revolution—was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director passed for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and customs at that period. The picture had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters signed by belles and beaux of the period that been taken out of their cedar trunks to add necessary human interest details to the more prosaic and private records of historical documents in current periodicals.

"Do you realize that the birth of the flapper took place during the Revolutionary period?" he was asked.

"Positively," the director answered emphatically. "The hoopes and farces we found prove it. It all started when the young belles listened to the men talk about the Colonial aristocrats, the men who had fought in the long and bitter conflict, and the prim and prudish aunts of today's flappers were of exactly that kind. Dancing was considered a sacrilege and taboo. Cards were considered the work of the devil. Dancing could not be indulged in except in the most formal manner, and even then it was considered a sacrilegious act. But the young people of an irksome subject of an irksome subject of an irksome subject

The Spokesman-Review Spokane (Wash) Feb 17 1924

The Spokesman-Review Spokane Wash. Sunday, Feb 17, 1924

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter,' likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

Dressed like America of 1924 than hobbled Sally, short skirts and sports costumes she is thought as bold and bad, but——

The Colonial flapper openly revolted against the petticoats, hoopskirt and corset petticoat to pave the way for her kin

Wicked hussy! Of colonial city company is in the theater road dance and the flapper has taken her place of honor [illegible]

The first girls of the American Revolution were [illegible] and [illegible] in the [illegible]

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent women.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of these sovereignties from the lips of their own folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caption and improperly practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding parallelity to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took [illegible], one of the leading [illegible] [illegible], but about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the facts which led to these conclusions.

"Amelia", a Colonial Flapper, founded on the story of the American Revolution, was nearing completion at the Griffith studio on Long Island when the director passed for half an hour to give some interesting highlights on life and customs of that period. The story had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed by kaffee and tonea of the period had been taken out of their safe vaults to add necessary human interest details to the more prosaic and serious aspects of the usual documents of current periodicals.

"As you really know that to bring up the flapper talk about being the first flapper, you are wrong, of course.

"Typically, the flapper personal characteristics. The letters and diaries are dated proof. It is of record that the women folks flocked to the city halls throughout the colonial territory, the state to protest the strict Puritan regulations. The men were powerless to stop the movement. The men were powerless to stop the movement. The men were powerless to stop the movement

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Seeks a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought, and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers are traveling from place to place in special trains and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and safety bulbs, Revolutionary descendants, and the colonial men of the United States Army as "extras."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" is over the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases quality is sacrificed in the battle scenes—some extra people were compelled to take "shots" of the scene which Griffith wanted at most inopportune times in order to get them in good condition for use in subsequent scenes. A number of such scenes took place in New York City and the people concerned did not know until the film actually was being made.

The cameraman of Griffith's organization is "known" on each page, and he is expected to be on the job at the Battle of Lexington, the Battle of Bunker Hill, the Battle of Saratoga, the Battle of Yorktown, the Battle of Valley Forge, the Battle of Cowpens, the Battle of Kings Mountain, the Battle of Cowpens, the Battle of Kings Mountain, the Battle of Cowpens, the Battle of Kings Mountain

D. W. GRIFFITH MAKES "AMERICA" FOR D. A. R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Exp erts And The U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture

When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth of a Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases — notably in reproduction of big battle scenes — pirate movie camera men attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in mediocre pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the pirates' cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America," can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the war of independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy; that 250,000 feet of film has been used already, and more than 50,000 persons have appeared in the scenes; that thousands of regular army soldiers drafted for the purpose through the courtesy of Secretary of War Weeks, camped more than a fortnight in Putnam county to appear in a few scenes; and that when completed the picture will actually have cost more than a million dollars.

D. W. Griffith who made "America"

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the cast from the lands and treasures chests of their ancestors the arms from family vaults, intimate relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, swords, and drums to accounts and diaries giving the day and exact place to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this assistance, the best results to be so far gained by American historical film have been obtained.

Griffith has been photographing scenes for "America" for several months. Thousands of dollars have been spent in building camps, erecting tents, providing camp equipment and uniforms, and in transporting the actors and technicians to the scene of the battles.

Among the actors who have been selected for the principal parts in the picture are Lionel Barrymore, who has been cast for the part of Walter Butler, the villain of the piece; Carol Dempster, who has been cast for the part of Nancy Montague, the heroine; Neil Hamilton, who has been cast for the part of Nathan Hale, the hero; Arthur Donaldson, who has been cast for the part of King George III; Arthur Dewey, who has been cast for the part of Washington; Erville Alderson, who has been cast for the part of Sir William Howe; Frank Morgan, who has been cast for the part of Arnold; Lionel Adams, who has been cast for the part of Samuel Adams; Frank Campeau, who has been cast for the part of Major Pitcairn; Charles Emmett Mack, who has been cast for the part of Paul Revere; Joseph Swickard, who has been cast for the part of Jonathan Hancock; Ralph Lewis, who has been cast for the part of Ethan Allen; Jerry Devine, who has been cast for the part of Israel Putnam; Ralph Emerson, who has been cast for the part of Dr. Joseph Warren; Jack Ackroyd, who has been cast for the part of Major Andre; Jack Mulhall, who has been cast for the part of Major Tallmadge; Ben Hendricks, who has been cast for the part of Major Sullivan; Frank Puglia, who has been cast for the part of Count Pulaski; Ben Deeley, who has been cast for the part of Lord Cornwallis; Ben Lyon, who has been cast for the part of Major Andre

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nacy Montague. (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene.

—o—

(Center) United States Regulars In Homespun, Refight the Battle of Bunker Hill.

The Minutemen Prepare to Protect Historic Buckman Tavern.

Samuel Adams Greets a Visiter to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

When the Daughters of the American revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, musicians and advisers are travelling from place to place in special trains and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even the so several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—crowds motion cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense in order to get back to small companies, for use in motion pictures. A number of such attempts were made by state troopers in New York and the picture cameras and film confiscated after the new movies picture has been released.

The magnitude of the work undertaking in "America" can perhaps best be understood by the fact that the time of the Revolutionary War with other events, and many than the list of film has been used already, and many more will be placed with scenery in the process, the cemetery of Concord Bridge, Lexington and Concord, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Mount Vernon, Washington, Philadelphia, Trenton, Princeton, Yorktown, Saratoga, Boston, Charleston, Savannah, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Annapolis, Philadelphia, Washington, Philadelphia, Washington, Philadelphia, Washington

Steubenville (Ohio) Gazette Feb 23 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this expedtment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie camera men attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in mediocre pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the pirate cameras and film confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can, perhaps, best be appreciated by the fact that he aims to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy, that [illegible] of the War Department, and more than a million dollars.

Although it had long [illegible] the patriotic institution of the American Revolution as the basis for a photoplay, Griffith has been preparing for work at the actual scenes which he plans to have present. His New York office and his studios at Mamaroneck, New York, have been [illegible] with research from historical societies, with [illegible] and with practical data as to [illegible] in the service with [illegible] information from [illegible] of the Revolutionary period, and pictures from [illegible] vaults, which, as he drew at Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Yorktown and other Revolutionary battlefields in their [illegible] and [illegible].

[illegible] production of "America" is a national one, and Griffith has called upon the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Sons of the American Revolution, the Society of Colonial Dames, the Society of Colonial Wars, the Society of the Cincinnati, the Society of the War of 1812, the Sons of the War of 1812, the Daughters of the War of 1812, the Sons of the Revolution, the Daughters of the Revolution, the Sons of the Revolution, the Daughters of the Revolution, the Sons of the Revolution, the Daughters of the Revolution

Picture Play Magazine (Supp) Apr 1924

Griffith's "America"

A few advance glimpses of the gigantic historical film on which D. W. Griffith has been working for several months give a hint of its scope and power.

One of the most terrific battle scenes Mr. Griffith has ever staged is his representation of the Battle of Bunker Hill. Every care was taken to make this scene historically correct, and eminent historians coöperated with Mr. Griffith in achieving this result.

A simple but impressive ceremony marked the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, and this Mr. Griffith has endeavored to reproduce in staging the scene before the camera.

The simple, drowsy little town of Lexington in peace time had a quiet charm all its own. Its air was languid, and the townsfolk idly gathered at the tavern to swap stories of the countryside and pass the time away. The picture at the left shows how Mr. Griffith has visualized this.

Exhibitors Trade Review March 15 1924

LEADERS ALL

David Wark Griffith, Portraver of Life

Leaders All—David Wark Griffith

(Continued from page 21)

of the Iroquois tribe, one of the powerful elements of that combination of redmen.

To this lake port come the vessels laden with iron ore. Here the future maker of "America" labored with his shovel many hours in a day.

From Jamestown Griffith went to Lynchburg, where after undergoing a searching physical examination he went to work as a puddler in the mills.

After accumulating what in those days the young man considered a bank roll he proceeded to New York.

A Life-Saving Poem

While waiting stage employment he produced considerable writing, verses, essays, and short stories, as well as a serious poem entitled "The Wild Duck." For this latter effort Leslie's weekly paid $25. It was at the moment. Nevertheless the rank of the publication stamps the quality that must have resulted in the fund.

Although his success encouraged him to complete further and perhaps considered work along similar lines he continued work on a play which was produced by Elliot Dangerfield and Percy Ward in the fall of 1907.

Another play was submitted [illegible] "When the Whole Year Blooms" [illegible] Gilpin and this [illegible] was produced the latter.

This is the most significant play [illegible] to date by an American dramatist.

Henry Miller, on behalf of Liebler & Hackett, acquired the play and gave it [illegible] in the early months of 1908.

Because of happenings which will not be forgotten by those who were in the theatrical world at the time, the production of "When the Whole Year Blooms" was not made in Washington, but in Atlantic City, where it was produced on the night of the Democratic convention which nominated Bryan for President.

Miss Marie Henry Wattersson of the Louisville Courier-Journal

The youngster was given a place as reporter and filled the assignments that fell to a rookie in that field. But the theatre interested him.

When David confided to the manager of the Louisville stock company that he aspired to become a dramatist he was told the way to achieve that end was first to become an actor and a place was offered him.

The offer was accepted. His first part was in the Dance in The Village School. The letter was disappointing but not discouraging. He recalled through the years, but as the pay was not adequate he enlarged his income by working in a dry goods shop.

Being tired because he successfully was placed on two successive matinees, Mary Pickford succeeded another [illegible] greatest cavalry officer, introduced a bad in his scene by [illegible]

Marie Henry Wattersson of the Louisville Courier-Journal

The youngster was given a place as reporter and filled the assignments that fell to a rookie in that field. But the theatre interested him.

When David confided to the manager of the Louisville stock company that he aspired to become a dramatist he was told the way to achieve that end was first to become an actor and a place was offered him.

The offer was accepted. His first part was in the Dance in The Village School. The letter was disappointing but not discouraging. He recalled through the years, but as the pay was not adequate he enlarged his income by working in a dry goods shop.

Being tired because he successfully was placed on two successive matinees, Mary Pickford succeeded another [illegible] greatest cavalry officer, introduced a bad in his scene by [illegible]

of the Iroquois tribe, one of the powerful elements of that combination of redmen.

To this lake port come the vessels laden with iron ore. Here the future maker of "America" labored with his shovel many hours in a day.

From Jamestown Griffith went to Lynchburg, where after undergoing a searching physical examination he went to work as a puddler in the mills.

After accumulating what in those days the young man considered a bank roll he proceeded to New York.

A Life-Saving Poem

While waiting stage employment he produced considerable writing, verses, essays, and short stories, as well as a serious poem entitled "The Wild Duck." For this latter effort Leslie's weekly paid $25. It was at the moment. Nevertheless the rank of the publication stamps the quality that must have resulted in the fund.

Although his success encouraged him to complete further and perhaps considered work along similar lines he continued work on a play which was produced by Elliot Dangerfield and Percy Ward in the fall of 1907.

Another play was submitted [illegible] "When the Whole Year Blooms" [illegible] Gilpin and this [illegible] was produced the latter.

This is the most significant play [illegible] to date by an American dramatist.

Henry Miller, on behalf of Liebler & Hackett, acquired the play and gave it [illegible] in the early months of 1908.

Because of happenings which will not be forgotten by those who were in the theatrical world at the time, the production of "When the Whole Year Blooms" was not made in Washington, but in Atlantic City, where it was produced on the night of the Democratic convention which nominated Bryan for President.

Miss Marie Henry Wattersson of the Louisville Courier-Journal

The youngster was given a place as reporter and filled the assignments that fell to a rookie in that field. But the theatre interested him.

When David confided to the manager of the Louisville stock company that he aspired to become a dramatist he was told the way to achieve that end was first to become an actor and a place was offered him.

The offer was accepted. His first part was in the Dance in The Village School. The letter was disappointing but not discouraging. He recalled through the years, but as the pay was not adequate he enlarged his income by working in a dry goods shop.

Being tired because he successfully was placed on two successive matinees, Mary Pickford succeeded another [illegible] greatest cavalry officer, introduced a bad in his scene by [illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) Cinema Art March 1924

New Star in the Firmament

Carol Dempster Has Become Luminary Under the Direction of David Wark Griffith

By FREDERICK ROCHE

WHEN a girl elects a career in the business or professional world, she usually does so with the knowledge that the training necessary to provide her with the fundamentals will take a certain period of years. But for those who pursue the arts there is no such defined period of training. The artist, the sculptor, the musician, the writer, the actress, unless they be fortunate enough to become pupils of a master, may spend years of study before actually embarking upon a career.

To those interested in motion pictures, therefore, the career of Carol Dempster is of extraordinary interest, for it shows that under proper tuition, with an absolute devotion to the art, to the exclusion of everything else, it takes five years for the motion-picture aspirant to "arrive."

There are several reasons why Miss Dempster is a particularly good example upon which to base a theory in the matter. First of all, she was (and remains today), a perfect example of a normal, healthy girl. Second, unlike the typical "movie fan," who believes fame and fortune await her in the screen world, she admits that in the beginning motion pictures did not appeal to her, and even today she is far indeed from being a film "fan." And third, her career to date has proven a ceaseless, untiring devotion to learning the art she has chosen, and to keep her mind and body in condition to pursue that art.

Already well known to motion-picture patrons throughout the country, through her fine work in several other Griffith productions, in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which the master of screen art produced at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, she may be said to achieve stardom. The most exacting critics who view her as Nancy Montague in this, Griffith's greatest effort since "The Birth of a Nation," agree that her period of training is over.

Carol Dempster has "arrived."

And D. W. Griffith has given yet another star to the silver sheet. Which brings to mind the fact that Mary Pickford, who had spent four years with Griffith in the old Biograph studios, and then left to become a star, voluntarily returned and placed herself under the master's tuition for another year, feeling that her screen training had not been completed until she had been five years under his guiding influence.

And the Gish girls, among the other present-day stars who owe their knowledge of the technique of screen acting, and their success to association with David Wark Griffith, spent five years of intensive study in the Griffith fold.

Miss Pickford and the Misses Lillian and Dorothy Gish, however, had not only screen experience, but a predilection for careers on the silver sheet. Miss Dempster had neither. A pupil in the Denishawn school of dancing, she had looked forward to a terpsichorean career, and she took little interest in screen productions.

IT was as a dancer that she first entered the Griffith fold—as a dancer that she made her first appearance before a motion-picture camera. And it was only after familiarizing herself with Griffith methods and Griffith productions that she realized that the motion-picture camera could be an instrument of art, and a motion-picture production a thing of truth and beauty.

She came to Griffith with no preconceived ideas in regard to acting, with no theories to discard, with no methods to unlearn. In knowledge of screen art, as in years, she was a child. During the years of her training, Griffith had been her only teacher. Her skill today is an undiluted product of Griffith's genius in creating stars of filmdom.

And no greater tribute could be paid to that genius than to chronicle the fact that today Carol Dempster remains the same simple, sweet, unaffected girl that she was five years ago. There is nothing of the "movie" star about her, save her acting. In person she is just a happy, normal and very busy young woman in her teens, who becomes very earnest and "grown-up" only when it is a question of her work before the camera.

To her one looks in vain for any display of affectation, one listens in vain for any hint of an inflated ego. She is modest to a degree, and markedly reticent about herself and her work. She will discuss athletics, or current events, but she dislikes shop talk. And while she is spontaneously affectionate towards her own sex, the arduous task of relentlessly pursuing her career has left her, she avers, no time to give thought to love affairs.

MISS DEMPSTER was born in Michigan, but moved to Los Angeles, Calif., at the age of three, her father having purchased a large ranch just outside the California city. During her early childhood she practically lived outdoors, learning to ride and to swim almost as soon as she learned to walk.

An interest in athletics is therefore inborn in this dainty star, and to it may be ascribed her success in withstanding the terrific mental and physical pressure which her training has brought upon her. Riding, swimming, walking and other outdoor athletic exercises and games are still her favorite diversions, and to them and the healthy mental habits they breed in a large measure also can be traced her success in maintaining an unaffected, genuine personality. Her training as a dancer—a training which lasted from her tenth to her fifteenth year, during which she rose to be Denishawn's greatest solo dancer—also taught her invaluable lessons in proper living.

"Early to bed and early to rise," was a maxim which has never ceased to be her guide, while from her training she has become habituated to eating sparingly and regularly, and to safeguard her health in every possible way. Slender almost to the point of fragility, Miss Dempster possesses perfectly developed muscles, and a vitality which is surprising.

The many social events given, especially that lights of the stage and screen may shine, have known her not. Comparative solitude, giving her concentrated, undivided attention to reaching the heights of her chosen art by the solid but difficult path of real effort rather than by the pleasant but insidious road lined with the adulations of society, has been her selected lot.

While the average girl of her age was dissipating her health in an endless round of dances, teas, and other social functions; and spoiling her ability to concentrate her mind by stimulating a surface interest in a variety of more or less frivolous events, Carol Dempster was serving the severe apprenticeship essential to success in the motion-picture world.

In this single-minded devotion to her art, Miss Dempster was fortunate in having a model in the person of her tutor, David Wark Griffith.

To Griffith's example, too, may be ascribed Miss Dempster's piquant sense of humor, her unfailing good humor, and her appreciation of the beautiful—qualities rare indeed to those who achieve real success in this Twentieth Century world of futile haste, deadly solemnity, and pecuniary practicality.

At the end of five years Miss Dempster stands, a finely polished artist, a charming, healthy, young girl at the pinnacle of achieved success. The lighter joys of life, which have long ceased to be sweet to the majority of girls of her age, because they have long since lost their novelty, lie before her. And before her, too, is a vista of a long and pleasant highway of success, and not, perchance, a success in the screen world alone.

For Miss Dempster has a remarkable voice, which she has been carefully cultivating under the best teachers, and her ambition to become a grand opera singer may bring her new laurels.

And looking back over the five years she has spent to reach the realms of the stars, Miss Dempster's mind's eye visions a picture of a peaceful solitude spent in absorbing the rudiments of her art in association with a genius who is also one of the kindliest, most sympathetic, cultured, courtly gentlemen that ever lived.

Just a little incident to show what manner of girl is she. Not long ago she went in company of a chaperon to Philadelphia to have a "personal appearance" in connection with the showing of a picture. She was thrilled at the prospect of speaking to an audience—but when she faced the crowds there was nothing of self-adulation. Rather she paid tribute to the genius of her mentor, Griffith. She spoke of his new picture, "America," which she heralded as his best and she was gratified just to have the opportunity to sound his praises. Over the radio she spoke also of her director and of his merits and the only time for diversion was an hour between her radio address and her next appearance on the stage of one of the city's leading picture theatres. On the way to the theatre there was passed a distinctly Philadelphia institution—Welch's Minstrels—the oldest permanent minstrel organization in the country. She declared that she had never seen a minstrel show—just think of that for an actress! Of course the entire party descended upon the minstrel house and it would have done your heart good to see her beaming face as the minstrel men told their jokes or sang their songs. No wonder she is so charming—she is an unspoiled child of nature.

Carol Dempster

It is predicted that she will be a real sensation in D. W. Griffith's most important picture, "America"

Exhibitors Trade Review

BOX OFFICE REVIEWS

MAY BE THE GREAT AMERICAN PICTURE

'America' Is Notable in Dramatic, Historic, Patriotic and Pictorial Qualities

John F. Cummins, president; Alfred J. Chalmers, vice-president; James P. Chalmers, Jr., vice-president; Ellis J. Chalmers, secretary and treasurer, and Orville L. Hull, business manager.

Branch Offices: 8 East Jackson Boulevard, Chicago; W. F. Kerr, 1341 Chestnut Street, Los Angeles, Cal.

Editorial Staff: Roy S. Green, Managing Editor; Fred E. Crabb, Managing Editor.

Moving Picture WORLD

ROBERT C. WELSH—EDITOR

Published Weekly by CHALMERS PUBLISHING COMPANY 516 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Entered April 5, 1913, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879.

Manager of Advertising: James A. Milligan. Manager of Circulation: Donald J. Cline.

Subscription price: United States and its possessions, Mexico and Cuba, $3.00 a year; Canada, $3.50; foreign countries generally, $4.00 a year. Chicago, 166, Chalmers Publishing Co. Copyright, Moving Picture World and Exhibitors Trade Review under the provisions of the Copyright Act of 1909. (All rights reserved.)

Other publications: Film Booklet (Spanish). Technical Books.

This Week

This week "AMERICA." And nothing else. Food for conversation wherever you go and as many varieties of arguments as you care to have.

Every man who signs checks out with the flat promise that "AMERICA" will make a lot of money, that no spectator who sees it will come away without having enjoyed himself, that it abounds in real GRIFFITH touches.

From that point the argument starts. On the points of what might have been done, on the relative importance of many things that were done.

Opinions are equally the privileges of film men and books. So here's one:

"AMERICA" is the first half of a whole. "AMERICA" is the prologue and half is GRIFFITH. It is a prologue and, as a GRIFFITH who, feeling his subject deeply, has expressed and overwhelmed by it, said: "Let's finish the story."

Not speaking about credits, bookings and photos. No sir! Emphatically yes! Saying emphatically that the independent field is in fine good shape, that by and large the independent exchange man of today is a good man to do business with.

Summing it up, it is the conclusion that for the distributor, the producer and the exchange man who are in the independent field TO STAY, for Tomorrow, not alone Today, things are in ship-shape condition.

That's the talk, boys! Let's have more of it. Boost!

"Scaramouche" passes $61,000 at the Capitol. Whew! And that after an extended run at a Broadway house. Every day we learn a little more about the possibilities of this well known motion picture industry.

Another encouraging phase. The reports drifting in from middle-sized cities, small cities and even small towns on "The Hunchback" engagements at advanced prices. There were a lot of us who thought it couldn't be done; a few more who thought it might be done but doubted the advisability; a few who reserved the exhibitors who so often repeated, "Packed my house at advance prices, but patrons were sore and business was ruined for a week after."

If we do, it is being done. "The Hunchback" is doing it. The exhibitors are doing the business and reaping over the results.

Great Book in "America." We read that Fort Johnson has unearthed the right to the Liberty Bell—if it is not in its 10 All Saints Day Special in "America" as could look at parts of the film from Philadelphia. "Tell the world" cries the proprietor, and the world listens to the Bell—Special Edition.

A few cities, Cities Mother and Independence Hall, Chicago, Ill., Philadelphia, Pa., Boston, Mass., Lexington, Mass., Concord, Mass., Lexington, Ky

Canton (O) News 2/4/24 Cleveland (Ohio) Press 2/27/24 Saginaw Mich News Courier 2/28/24

GRIFFITH'S DRAMA ONE OF SERIES

Filmed History of Revolutionary War Will be Followed by Others.

TEAM DRAWS $3,000

Gallagher & Shean Contract is Bought For $20,000 Stage Daily Says.

BY DENNIS R. SMITH

David Wark Griffith's pictorial history of the revolutionary war, filmed under commission from the Daughters of the American Revolution, probably will be the first of a series of spectacles depicting the entire history of America, according to announcement from the Griffith headquarters.

Accordingly the picture, which has thus far borne merely the title of "America" will be officially known as "America, Series One—Sacrifices" to distinguish it from the others which will follow.

This first picture, dealing entirely with Washington's days, will have its first showing in New York Thursday evening, Feb. 22. It was displayed this week at a private showing but a number of changes will be made. The picture as given its first screening was 18 reels in length and nearly four hours were consumed in showing it. More cutting will be done, however, and Griffith expects to bring the film down to the length of the usual special feature, probably not exceeding 12 reels.

With the completion of "America" two filmed histories of the country will be running simultaneously as the first of the "Chronicles of America," made by Yale University Press, are now being shown.

Both pictures have been stamped by authorities as historically correct.

* * *

The team of Gallagher & Shean which joined the Greenwich Village Follies this week and played Canton as the second engagement, draws $3000 a week for the act, according to The Times Square Daily, a New York theatrical newspaper. The pair works from 10 to 15 minutes at each performance, depending on the amount of encouragement from the audience, and sings only the one song for which it is famed.

The story says:

"Green & Jones settle with Shuberts for Gallagher and Shean. The two Misters, Ed Gallagher and Al Shean, will join Jones & Green's "Greenwich Village Follies" at Akron, Ohio, Monday. The team will start at $3000 weekly, under a three-years' agreement, guaranteeing $3500 weekly for the second year and $4000 the third year. The management binds itself to star the singing comedians in a new production during the second season.

"While a little doubt is expressed about the graduated salary guarantee, it appears to have been accepted that Jones & Green have purchased Gallagher and Shean's release from the Shuberts.

"The amount paid is believed to have been $20,000 with Gallagher and Shean consenting that one-half of their weekly salary shall be withheld by Jones & Green until the firm is in receipt of the amount paid to the Shuberts to secure the contract the latter have been holding the Misters to.

"The amount demanded by the Shuberts is about what they thought would be awarded them under a referee's decision, through the court's decision the Shuberts were entitled to the surplus of salary received by the couple while with Ziegfeld's "Follies," at $1500 weekly at first, later raised to $2500, while the Shuberts held Gallagher and Shean under a $1000 weekly contract.

"An adjustment had been proposed by Lee Shubert in view of the legal decision which declared Gallagher and Shean must play out their Shubert contract or lay off, to the effect that the team work in another Shubert show at $2500 weekly, with the difference between that and the original $1000 salary to apply upon the amount the Shuberts claimed as damages under the contract. No agreement was reached upon this.

"The Shuberts, while they felt secure in their ultimate recovery against Gallagher and Shean, were not so certain they could collect any judgment awarded them."

Press Agents Say

Denver (Colo) Delaware Feb 22 1924

NEW GRIFFITH FILM "BIG" IN SIMPLICITY

Probably the most delightful artistic and by far the greatest heart-appealing story yet to come from that master of the motion picture, D. W. Griffith, is his newest offering, "The White Rose," a United Artists Corporation release coming to the Opera House, next Wednesday and Thursday.

It tells a story old in theme, simple and direct, but in such a manner as to make it possibly the one "big" outstanding picture production of the present season. Mr. Griffith has forsaken mobs and huge ensembles for direct and careful characterization in this new screen offering and has succeeded to such a degree that experts predict he again has shown the way for better pictures in the future.

The tale has to do with an orphan girl and a young divinity student who meet when the latter is making a walking tour to learn of the world and its ways. What transpires results in a denouement of compelling power and tender beauty.

Griffith journey with his company to the famous Bayou Teche country of western Louisiana for his scenes and they are recognized as the most strikingly charming yet shown on any screen.

Mae Marsh, after a long absence from the screen, returns with the most notable effort of her remarkable career. Her characterization of the orphan girl will long stand as one of the great things in the way of screen acting. Ivor Novello, a handsome young English actor, has won immediate recognition as the young preacher in this new story. Carol Dempster, so popular in several previous Griffith successes, essays the part of a girl of high southern family and as only one of her distinguished refinement and intelligence might. Critical reviewers declare it the finest thing she has yet done. Neil Hamilton, a newcomer to the screen, is now heralded as a "Griffith find" as a result of his characterization of the lusty aristocrat who makes a name for himself. Porter Strong and Lucille La Verne, without equals in the portrayal of delightful crabby types, are heavily cast as the dusky lovers and afford no end of amusement for the audiences. Others in the cast of principals are Kate Bruce, Jane Thomas, Charles Emmett Mack, Erville Alderson, Herbert Sutch, Joseph Burke and the rest Southern features and other [illegible] a positive delight.

Dallas (Tex) Journal 2/24/24

Richmond (Va) Times Dispatch

New Movie Girls Prominent Place In Local Scenes

[illegible]

Chicago (Ill) Journal Feb 27 1924

The Author's Clipping Bureau William M. Stuart [illegible]

Clipping from The Palm Beach Post Feb. 27, 1924

By "VIS"

"AMERICA," D. W. Griffith's new movie history of the American revolution, is high, emotional, as are other historical novels by Griffith, starting with "The Birth of a Nation."

People have been scolded lately for neglecting some other movies of American history, recently exhibited in New York. Apparently there is no reason to complain of lack of interest in Griffith's "America."

* * *

REVIEWERS testify that the movies offer no scene more thrilling than the ride of Paul Revere in Griffith's "America."

Much of the film is historically informative, and probably educational.

But one may well regard with doubt the patriotic interpretation of history by which the motives of one's own side are presented as pure and noble and the motives of opponents are presented as wicked.

* * *

MAURICE HENLE, reviewing the picture for this page, writes, "The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice."

Other reviewers testify to the power of this movie to arouse the emotion of anger. It is difficult to find fault with any picture on that account. For such anger is called a patriotic emotion, and this particular movie is indorsed by the D. A. R.

The war spirit, otherwise the emotion of anger, easily overrides the frail obstruction offered by intellectual arguments against war, when the anger is on behalf of America.

* * *

Commerce

A New England history which recently came to this desk for review said the motives on each side were much the same in the American Revolution. It was a war for commercial advantage, says this historian. But recognition of any such possibility seems to have no place in D. W. Griffith's emotional movie, "America."

Des Moines (Iowa) Capital 2/27/24

A secret trial showing of D. W. Griffith's picture, "America," at the Rialto theater, South Norwalk, Saturday night, indicates this may be his most successful production even surpassing in popularity "The Birth of a Nation." It was presented in a three and four-fourths hours showing, with eighteen reels, and the recepton was the most enthusiastic any of his productions have ever received. Interest in the historic battles was particularly intense, and excitedly applauded. Presiding Judge J. J. Walsh of Connecticut, acting as chairman of a delegation, informed Mr. Griffith the new picture "is the greatest you or anyone else has ever made, and is a national asset of incomparable value. It will have greater patriotic influence than any document ever published since the Declaartion of Independence. We are radiant with its influence."

Washington (D C) News 2/28/24

NEWS OF AI

FROM WIRE TO YOU

D. W. GRIFFITH, broken by the strain of rushing his new "America" to the screen, is seriously ill in New York.

Physicians have closed the doors to visitors. Griff has such a severe cold that he cannot speak, and he is worn to a frazzle. He will be all right with a bit of rest, the doctors say.

Mt Commercial Feb 28 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH ILL AFTER PICTURE TRIUMPH

[illegible]

Chicago (Ill) Journal Feb 27 1924

Dodge City (Kan) Daily Globe

THEATRES

D. W. GRIFFITH'S LATEST PICTURE, "AMERICA" OUT

Mt Vernon Daily Journal Feb 28 1924

Boston Evening Transcript Feb. 28 1924

Latest News and Gossip from Filmland

D. W. Griffith Comes Forth With Realistic Film of "America"

BY MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, Feb. 28.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help if needed met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horseflesh, tearing along a lonely moonbathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck.

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neal Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffth pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photoplay was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

ADMITS RECEIVING

Nights (Kansas) Beacon 2/28/24

This Little World

New York, Feb. 28.—Sometimes this entire little world seems to be tucked away within the four walls of a movie studio. Furniture and garb of every known period and place may be found. And certainly all the human emotions that send this old globe spinning around from "Ambition" down—are there!

We were standing off in a corner of the big Griffith studio, near here, watching D. W. himself tell Lionel Barrymore how to go "thru the motions." Other actors of lesser caliber stood motionless, listening.

* * *

Griffith gets up at 5 a. m. Often he skips breakfast. They tell a story that he suddenly remembered one night at 10 o'clock that "by George, I forgot to eat anything today."

Many scenes that take but 30 or 60 seconds to flash on the screen, consume an entire day in filming. This holds true in all studios.

* * *

One day I was visiting a certain movie studio, internationally famous. On the big floor, a busy scene indeed, were screen celebrities known in the most remote corner of the world.

One whole company, making a war film, was standing about doing nothing. The star, a temperamental young woman, was arguing with the owner of the company. Her name had been in big electric lights on Broadway, advertising the film she was making. But the day before the sign had come down and the name of another star of the company, equally noted, went up.

That made the young woman in question very, very angry. And the following day the sign of her rival came down!

* * *

If there is one thing that amazes the visitor more than any other one thing at a movie studio, it is the carpentry work in preparation for a big set.

Before a scene is taken, the director's conception of what the garden, or house, or street—or whatever it happens to be—is given to architects. The latter make blue-print drawings and these drawings are turned over to carpenters who go ahead building the set according to specifications just exactly as they would build a skyscraper!

Usually one scene is being "shot" in one end of a studio while carpenters are working on another in the opposite corner.

* * *

Not one person in a thousand of the unknown who yearn to break into pictures could stand the strain of the world's most trying industry. So don't envy the beautiful girls whose smiling faces you see on the screen. Behind that smile lie hours of mental torture.

Dayton (O) News 2/28/24

BY JAMES MUIR

David Wark Griffith, dreamy screen director, who may be depended upon to gird himself for the task which he considers worthy of his best efforts and to produce a masterpiece, has finally disclosed Series One of his long awaited picture, "America." Series One is entitled "The Sacrifice." It was exhibited for the first time in any theater at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York, on Washington's birthday eve before an audience which was tremendously stirred, according to all reports.

Maurice Henle, N. V. A. Service correspondent for the Daily Movie Service, who can be relied upon to be more conservative than the public, expressed the opinion after attending the premiere of "The Sacrifice:" "It is an accurate faithful reproduction of events that led to the birth of the country. The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is the most complimentary thing one can say about the whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director."

Apparently the picture is too long. There is much superfluous material relating to the devilish activities of Capt. Walter Butler, portrayed by Lionel Barrymore, whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror during the Revolutionary War. Generous cuts will probably be made if they haven't already been made.

Mr. Griffith planned the production of "America" at the suggestion of the Daughters of the American Revolution. Once having determined to reproduce the beginning of American history upon the screen he stopped at nothing that might transmit its dramatic and immortal events to us with all the evidence of reality, which is but another way of saying that his first release is steeped in the atmosphere of the colonial times.

The most dramatic scene of "The Sacrifice" reproduces the ride of Paul Revere. This episode is striking because it conforms to the historical account of the midnight ride. There is no mob scene, no band of marauding Indians, crowding to Boston. Only the rider, the horse, the road and the moon.

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neal Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffth pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photoplay was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Niagara Falls (Ont) Gazette 2/28/24

18 DAILY MOVIE SERVICE

Dreamy D. W. Griffith Comes Forth with Realistic Film of "America."

David Wark Griffith.

By MAURICE HENLE
NEA Service Writer.

New York, Feb. 28.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help if needed met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horseflesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck.

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neal Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffth pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photoplay was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

(My Film Daily 2/27/24)

Poughkeepsie (N Y) Star Feb 28 1924

WHAT'S DOING IN MOVIELAND

BY MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, Feb. 28.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help if needed met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horseflesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck.

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neal Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffth pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photoplay was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Variety (Weekly) Feb 28 1924

ABBIE

AMERICA

San Francisco (Cal) Chronicle Feb 24 1924

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter," likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

Because Miss America of 1924 likes bobbed hair, short skirts and sports costumes she is denounced as bold and bad, but——

The cultured flapper openly revolted against the cumbersome headdress and refused point-blank to powder her hair

Ancient legend, old tradition are adapted to by the flapper from Venus and the Greek the blood red lids of today, but——

The first girls of the fourteen twenties were trying to practice the dances of ancient Greece on the native "redskin" dance

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of these sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivol women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 150 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding parallelism to be found in the records of the social season of 1774."

It took [illegible], one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a second feature founded on the story of the American Revolution—was causing suspicion at the Griffith studio so long ago when the director passed for half an hour to give some interesting delights on life and customs of that period. The picture had been made at the request of the daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed to author and home of the period had been taken out of their cedar trunks to add necessary human interest details to the more prosaic and pseudo reports of the Daughters of Revolution in current periodicals.

"Do you really believe that the young of the flapper type were going to be the mothers of the Revolution?" I asked Griffith.

"Certainly, the Revolution produced the flapper type of girl. There was a little difference between the flapper of 1774 and the flapper of today. The flapper of today is a product of the post-war period, and is the result of a reaction from the war years. The girl of today is a product of the post-war period, and is the result of a reaction from the war years. The girl of today is a product of the post-war period, and is the result of a reaction from the war years. The girl

Jewish Freiheit Feb 29 1924 Review

„אמעריקא"

ערשטע סערע — די קרבנות
אין 1914 טסרים פעשטער

מיט א מאדנעם געפיל בין איך גע־
גאנגען זעהען די בילד. ה. וו. גריפיט
אין דער גרעסטער מואזיי־מייסטער
וואס אמעריקא פארמאגט, ער אין דער
בעסטער און גלייכצייטיק דער ערגס־
טער. ווער עס האט געזען גריפיט'ס
„די בורדט אוו די ניישאן" וועט איינ־
שטימען מיט מיר. גריפיט איז דער
איינציגער אמעריקאנער, וואס האט
ארייגגעטראגן קונסט אין די מוא־
זיים; ער איז דער איינציגער אמערי־
קאנער ביי וועמען מאסן־סצענען
המון א געבעריקע מאסע מענשן וואס
באוועגן זיך ווי געבעריקע העיוות
מאכן ניט קיין משונה'דיקע העיוות
און פלאנטערן זיך ניט אונטער די פיס
ווי אין דער דורכשניטליכער „גריפיטער"
מואזיי.

גריפיט האט נאך א גרויסע מעלה.
אין דער מאסן־טראגעדיע ברענגט ער
ארויס די טראגעדיע פון איינצעלנע
מענשן. אין זיינע מלחמה־בילדער זעט
מען ניט נאר א סך געהר'עטע און
פארוואונדעטע, נאר דעם אומגיל,
אלעמאל דעם אונזיניג, אומכוויטיקן
אומגיל פון דעם איינעם. ער כאפט
ארויס איין טראגעדיע און רוקט זי
ארויס אין איר זשט א דאפלטן
אומגיל, דעם איינעם אין שייכות מיט
אומגיל, דעם איינעם אין מיער.
א ווענן וואס אין נאהענט אין מיער.
גריפיט איז אבער אויך דער בעס־
טער אין די מואזיים. ער וויל ניט
שאפן סתם בילדער. זיין אמבציצע
איז ארויסצרעגנען אמעריקא, פארהער־
ליכן אלץ וואס אמעריקא פארמאגט,
נאטירליך די אמעריקא פון די ווייטע
הערשער — אין געבוים פון א נאר
ציאן — די אמעריקא פון די רויטע,
פון די אדרנגע און געזעלשליכקייט, אין
זיינע איבעריקע בילדער. גריפיט איז
דער פראפאגאנדיסט אויפ'ן לייוועגס.
דאס מאכט אים געפערליך. דער לויר
ווענט פארמאגט א גוואלדיגן כח צו
באאינפלוסן די מוחות פון מענשן.

גריפיט האט זיך פארמאסט צו
איבערגעבן די געשיכטע פון אמעריקא
אויפ'ן לייוועגס. די ערשטע סעריע
שילדערט דעם רעוואלוציאנערן קריג
נעגן ענגלאנד. איר האט דארט אלע
באראמטע פיגורן וועלכע האבן גע־
שפילט א ראל ערב דעם קריג און אין
פארלויף פון קריג. יעדע שטיקל געד
שיכטע וואס האט א באדייטונג אין
דורכגעפירט געוואר געגן און פינקט־
ליך. גריפיט האט געלעזן בויגן דעם
היסטאריש דארף לעקסינגטאן אין
וועלכן עס אין פארגעקומען די ערשטע
שלאכט צווישן די ענגלישע סאלדאטן
און די אמעריקאנער פארטער. אויפ'ן
די צאל דער'היל'געט אין היסטאריש
ריכטיק. די באריטמט שלאכט אויפ'ן
בריק צווישן לעקסינגטאן און קאנקארד
אין פינקטליך. פאול רעוויר טראגט
זיך אויף זיין עיר און זאגט מ אלץ
פארטיר מ די ענגלענדער נייען. יעד
נע נאכט איז ארויסגעבראכט פיס אלע
איינצלהייטן. „ווייטער קומען די זי
אנגען פון ענגלישן אפיציערס פון
די רעבאלטן וועגן די אמעריקאנער פע־
לאנעס. איר זעט די ענגלישע שטאב
פיס ווייטאס פיס. עדפטער קריגס אין
רעגן ארויסרופט דער דרייטער.

איר דער זייט יס דאס מען וואס
הערן, הערן אויפ'ן אויפ'ן אויפ'ן
אויפ'ן אויפ'

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—private movie cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to movie companies, for use in newsreel pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by Mars troopers in New York, and the stolen cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The knowledge of Griffith's undertaking in "America" has, perhaps, led to understand to the fact that he stops to reproduce the major battles of the War of Independence with price equity in historical accuracy that records of war has been used as ready, and more than these scenes have appeared in the press that thousands of curious have gathered for the last year through the course of the filming of the "Birth of a Nation." Griffith spent more than a fortnight in Cuba trying to secure a film showing a battle between the Cuban and Spanish forces, but failed to get the film he desired.

Although he had only various locations in the Boston territory to film his production of his Revolutionary drama, he spent a fortnight in Boston, and a fortnight in Lexington, Concord, Cambridge, Charlestown, Lexington, Concord, Cambridge, Charlestown, Lexington, Concord, Cambridge, Charlestown,

Bridgeport (Conn) Graphic Feb 29 1924

Portland (Me) Press-Herald Feb 29 1924

Boston (Mass) Advertiser 2/29/24

Boston (Mass) Telegram March 1 1924

AMERICA IN FILM

Are Our Schools Lax in Teaching American History?

Having the good fortune to number among our friends, David Wark Griffith, the greatest of all motion picture directors, it has been our privilege to be present, from time to time, during the actual filming of a large part of some of his greatest pictures, and to witness, as his guests, the first public showing of his latest great picture at the 44th Street Theater on the evening of February 21.

We have watched the "shooting" of many scenes of this great production "America."

To watch Griffith work is to see a master of the art of direction. He is never noisy; never rages up and down, tearing his hair and by action and word making his actors feel like Russian rubles. Even during the taking of immense outdoor scenes employing thousands of "extras," he is unexcited. His performers are engaged because they are actors and as such are presumed to know their business and to have a real conception of the parts they are to play.

During the filming of the interior of a stockade under attack by Indians, there was one two-years-old boy whose film mother was shot down while valiantly re-loading and passing them up to the men on the firing platform. Much noise and confusion of settlers rushing about so frightened and upset the child that he was unable to do his little bit. Thereupon Mr. Griffith stopped all action and getting down on his knees, comforted the child until he was over his scare. Returning to his position he ordered the scene to be shot again without the actual firing, assuring the boy that there would be "no shootee, no shootee." Thus the scene was made.

While taking the Inauguration of Washington, the crowd, gathered before Federal Hall, was instructed to cheer for George Washington. The cheers were given with a fairly good will, but not in a manner satisfactory to the assistant director who, finally, pointing to Mr. Griffith, who was standing on a balcony overlooking the crowd, called "now how about a cheer for Mr. Griffith?" The result was that the assistant director got exactly what he wanted in the way of action as the cheers fairly lifted the roof off the studio.

Griffith is most thoughtful for everybody in the studio and on the lot.

While filming Valley Forge, he wanted to get the human interest across by showing the soldiers making bloody tracks in the snow with their bare feet. It was very cold and Mr. Griffith, with the welfare of his people at heart, would not ask nor permit any one of his assistants to ask, the soldiers to go barefoot under such conditions. But he wanted that picture. So he made a little speech to the crowd, telling them what he had in mind and concluded by saying that if only a few cared to volunteer the film could be worked up so that it would look like a crowd. Even before he had finished speaking every one of the one hundred-odd men, already frozen to the marrow in their ragged uniforms, was peeling the remnants of boots and other wrappings from his feet prepared to wade through oceans of snow and ice for D. W. G.! And a very large percentage of those actors playing the parts of American soldiers suffering icy tortures for their country, were English men! Such is the spirit of the Griffith studio.

One never was anything unphoney at The ... complex is decidedly chaste. When large numbers of "extras" are employed the women and girls are thoroughly chaperoned. If it is cold there is always hot coffee or tea. In summer cooling drinks.

The making of the patriotic film, "America" has been a source of profound satisfaction to Mr. Griffith because of his own intense patriotism and is, without a shadow of doubt, the greatest propaganda picture ever produced. A picture which will revive a spirit in the American people which has disappeared ever since the Great War. It will awaken the people to the sacrifices and privations of the early settlers which have given them the great country in which they are now privileged to live, dedicated to all things which make for progress and comfort and should intensify a renewed interest in early American history.

The showing of D. W. Griffith's photo-play, which is playing at Majestic, N. Y. for a short stay, left the audience, after the battle scenes were filmed, tingling with the surrounds of Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Washington's headquarters, and Washington's famous crossing the Delaware. The acting throughout was of the highest order, the photography was perfect, the scenes were laid in the most beautiful surroundings, and the story was told in a way that will be a revelation to those who have never seen a Griffith production. The story is the story of the Revolution, and Washington's famous crossing the Delaware, the battle of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, the winter at Valley Forge, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and Washington's farewell address, are among the most striking.

Many of the scenes were taken on original sites, with descendants of Revolutionary patriots as actors.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore head the big cast, which includes Erville Alderson, Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne and Harry O'Neill.

The story of "America," was written by Robert W. Chambers and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

A large cast headed by Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore and Erville Alderson portrays the characters. Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary history appears in the action, and the major battles of the war are fought out with accuracy and profusion. Hundreds of descendants of revolutionary heroes appear as extra people in the numerous scenes, which purport to show the true drama of the states should see "America." The ride of Paul Revere is one of the most thrilling performances ever seen on the screen.

Mr. Griffith has succeeded in reproducing the actual struggles of those early colonists against fearful odds in their efforts to found a Nation which today stands first among the Nations of the world. It will stimulate aliens to become citizens; inspire the more recent citizens and enkindle in the younger generation of all Americans a keen desire for a greater knowledge of the inception and development of the country they all love.

D. W. Griffith's own patriotism is immense and he has succeeded in putting into this wonderful picture much of the feeling which animates him. He has done a great work for his country.

E. PAYSON HATCH.

Portland (Me) Press-Herald Feb 29 1924

D. W. G[illegible], suffering from [illegible]tion and a severe cold, lies ill in a room in the Astor Hotel as a reward for rushing the opening of his latest picture, "America". He is in the care of physicians who report his condition due to complete exhaustion and severe inflammation of the throat and lungs. He is unable to talk. While his picture was being received with applause in the theater, Mr. Griffith and his staff sat in a draughty dressing room cutting the final reels of the film for the audience to see a few minutes later. With the audience and critics declaring it one of the real triumphs of his active career, a doctor was swathing his throat and chest with cold compresses in the dressing room, and demanding that he go to the hospital at once. His voice was completely gone. In making the picture, Griffith has worked seven days weekly, from sixteen to eighteen hours daily. Although spare in build he has lost seven pounds. The doctors say he must take a [illegible]

Paul Revere's Ride Realistic In Griffith's New Film, "America"

MAURICE HENLE
Correspondence of The PRESS HERALD

New York, Feb. 26.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall, and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Hetten (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts keep the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

In "America" (Majestic, next week), George Washington leads his revolutionists against the stylish British troops, who wore lovely uniforms which George's men mussed up considerably.

Star 2/29/24 Feb 29 1924

"America," a Course in Patriotism

Every American of any age from five years to ninety, shou'd see "America." And every one who wants to become an American should be compelled to see it. "America" and "The Covered Wagon" are a complete course in patriotism.

Carol Dempster was painfully hurt and very nearly missed more serious consequences when she was thrown from her horse during the filming of "America." She sustained a badly wrenched shoulder and a sprained ankle.

Stoughton (Mass) Sentinel 2/29/24

"AMERICA"

Opens at Majestic Theatre.

D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo-dramatic of the War of Independence made as a contribution to the sequicentennial celebration of this country's struggles for freedom for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre, Wednesday evening, March 5.

Many of the scenes were taken on original site, with descendants of Revolutionary patriots as actors.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, head the big cast, which includes Erville Alderson, Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne and Harry O'Neill.

The story of "America," was written by Robert W. Chambers and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

Watertown (Mass) Enterprise 2/29/24

"AMERICA"

D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo-dramatic of the War of Independence made as a contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of this country's struggles for freedom for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre, Wednesday evening, March 5.

Made through the co-operation of the leading historical and patriotic organizations of the country, the United States War Department, and prominent historians, with scenes laid at Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, and in Boston in the stirring days of 1775, "America" has been hailed by New York critics as the greatest patriotic film ever made.

The ride of Paul Revere is one of the big thrills, with the battles of Lexington Concord Bridge and Bunker Hill refought by United States regulars parked as British grenadiers and as minutemen not far behind. Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary fame figures in the picture and the scenes showing Washington and his officers at Valley Forge, the signing of the Declaration of Independence and Washington's immortal address among the most striking.

Many of the scenes were taken on original sites, with descendants of Revolutionary patriots as actors.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore head the big cast, which includes Erville Alderson, Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne and Harry O'Neill.

The story of "America" was written by Robert W. Chambers and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

The performances will be strung daily after the opening night with matinee prices 50c, 75c and one dollar and evening prices from 50c cents to one dollar and one half according to seat.

Springfield (Mass) Union 2/29/24

GRIFFITH'S FILM COMING TO MAJESTIC

"America" Opening Planned for Thursday Evening

"A roaring echo of the shot heard around the world," D. W. Griffith's photodrama of the revolutionary war, "America," comes to the Majestic Theatre next Thursday evening for its Boston premiere.

A blending of historical fact with romance, "America" was hailed by New York critics as a new Griffith masterpiece. It should hold an unusual fascination for Boston audiences because practically half is laid in this vicinity, with Paul Revere's ride, the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill occupying places of prominence.

"America" was made by Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution to celebrate the 150th anniversary of America's struggle for liberty.

The story and titles were written by Robert W. Chambers, who is considered one of the best authorities on the revolutionary period, and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, who wrote "Down To The Sea in Ships."

A large cast headed by Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore and Erville Alderson portrays the characters. Practically every outstanding figure of revolutionary history appears in the action, and the major battles of the war are fought out with accuracy and profusion. Hundreds of descendants of revolutionary heroes appear as extra people in the numerous scenes, which purport to show the true drama of the

Springfield (Mass) Union 2/29/24

GRIFFITH, THE MASTER DIRECTOR, IS SICK

Springfield (Mass) Republican 2/29/24

MAJESTIC THEATRE

D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo dramatic [illegible] independence made as a contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of this country's struggles for freedom for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre, on Wednesday evening, March 5.

Made through the cooperation of the leading historical and patriotic organizations of the country, the United States War Department, and prominent historians, with scenes laid at Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, and in Boston in the stirring days of 1775, "America" has been hailed by New York critics as the greatest patriotic film ever made.

The ride of Paul Revere is one of the big thrills, with the battles of Lexington, Concord Bridge, and Bunker Hill, refought by United States regulars parked as British grenadiers and as minutemen not far behind. Practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary fame figures in the picture, and the scenes showing Washington and his officers at Valley Forge, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and Washington's famous address, are among the most striking.

Many of the scenes were taken on original sites, with descendants of Revolutionary patriots as actors.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore head the big cast, which includes Erville Alderson, Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne and Harry O'Neill.

The story of "America" was written by Robert W. Chambers and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

New Haven (Conn) Times-Leader March 1 1924

DREAMY D. W. GRIFFITH COMES FORTH WITH REALISTIC FILM OF "AMERICA"

New York—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America" — Series One: "The Sacrifice" — to the Forty-fourth Street Theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-'o-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Hetten (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts keep the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

LEXINGTON THANKS D. W. GRIFFITH FOR FAITHFUL FILMS

It is one thing to take a battle scene for a motion picture. It is quite another thing to take a scene of the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill and make those scenes absolutely historically correct to the smallest detail. But according to Edwin B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical society, is what D. W. Griffith has done in "America," which will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic theatre next Thursday evening.

Following this Mr. Worthen said to Mr. Griffith: "I am at a loss for words to express how deeply impressed I am with the picture. I had seen you and your company at work in Lexington. I expected much, but nothing so stupendous or stirring as your finished product. Yet ever in the magnitude of your task you have held to historic accuracy with remarkable fidelity. You cannot imagine the trembling and the thrills that grasped me as the little village of Lexington, the birthplace of American Liberty came before my eye.

"Scenes taken on the spot where Hancock and Adams (sought the hospitality of Parson Clarke,—the Hancock-Clarke House where those two men strengthened in their immortal task by the sound counsel of the parson, and from which that patriot witnessed the massacre on Lexington common—the same drum that summoned those humble farmers to immortality—the guns, the powderhorns they wore, sacred relics kept for all time as an inspiration to future Americans—here was real drama to thrill me.

"Mr. Griffith, Lexington salutes you and to your handiwork, 'America', I say God speed you in your glorious work of telling the story of the sacrifices of our forefathers and in your patriotic mission of reaching a higher and a finer Americanism."

Boston Morning Globe 3/1/24

Boston (Mass) Transcript March 1 1924

Numb and Dumb: The Silence of the Cold

Winter at Valley Forge

From a photo-dramatic film of the National Revolution, the Transcript is the Sunday magazine

Boston (Mass) American March 1 1924

LEXINGTON IN GRIFFITH'S FILM

Boston Traveler 3/1/24

Carroll Dempster in D.W. Griffith's "America" Majestic

Boston American March 1 1924

THE RIDE OF PAUL REVERE from D. W. Griffith's spectacular success, "America," at the Forty fourth Street Theatre.

My Exhibitors Trade Review March 1 1924

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY EVE FOR OPENING

'America,' New Griffith Production, Has New York Premiere

WHEN "America," D. W. Griffith's photo-drama of the War of Independence, has its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre in New York on Washington's Birthday eve, first nighters will find that in addition to the names of Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, and Neil Hamilton there will be a host of other stage favorites in the cast, including Lucille La Verne who is attracting a great deal of attention just now by her splendid performance in "Sun Up," a prominent stage production, and Louis Wolheim who made his mark in his portrayal of "The Hairy Ape," another stage success of two seasons ago.

Besides these there are several others whose work heretofore has been not with the movies but with the spoken drama. Of these probably the best known are Riley Hatch, Arthur Donaldson, Erville Anderson, Sidney Deans, Edwin Holland, James Malaidy and Charles Bennett. It is reasonable to suppose that with such a cast the picture will be one well worth seeing.

Boston American 3/1/24

MAJESTIC (opening Thursday)—D. W. Griffith's "America." Photo-dramatic story of the War of American Independence, with a cast headed by Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore and Erville Alderson. Made by Mr. Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, with story and titles by Robert W. Chambers. A picture story of the Revolutionary War, with many scenes taken at Lexington and Concord and in Boston.

Boston Telegram 3/1/24

CAROL DEMPSTER + NEIL HAMILTON in D.W.GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" at MAJESTIC

Chicago (Ill) Post 3/1/24

Master Director Ill.

D. W. Griffith, suffering from exhaustion and a severe cold, lies ill in his room in the Astor hotel as a reward for rushing the opening of his latest picture "America."

He is in the care of physicians, who report his condition due to complete exhaustion and severe inflammation of the throat and lungs. He is unable to talk.

Boston (Mass) Traveler March 1 1924

Buffalo (NY) Commercial 3/1/24

Cincinnati (Ohio) Post March 1 1924

Toledo (Ohio) News Bee 3/1/24

GRIFFITH STICKS TO FACTS IN FILMING "AMERICA"

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, March 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * * *

SOME months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

When Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from the North Church the tools he never sense as patriots in dirty coast troublers.

* * * *

[illegible] and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Then two burning lanterns glow from the top of Old Darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer has seen on a screen. He took Revere, the best of Hoodlums, Indians, for a long rider parade a beautiful spectacle of horseback riding along a quiet, moonlighted road.

The impetuous Revere of the screen offered his actual incident so exciting to history, was enough to send the first-night audience to the floor.

That and unmistakable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the Paul Revere rode looked like almost modern highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

The midnight ride not the only incident Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are woven into work of a lot of [illegible] Revere's [illegible] the battle [illegible] Revere [illegible] Hancock [illegible] Revere [illegible] Hancock [illegible] Revere [illegible] Hancock

Dayton (Ohio) Journal March 2 1924

GRIFFITH IS MAKING "AMERICA" FOR D. A. R.

NEW YORK:—When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America," as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth of a Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belle, Revolutionary descendants and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in moving pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the pirated cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can perhaps best be understood by the fact that he plans to reproduce the battles of the War of Independence with such fidelity that the actual scenes of the battles will be duplicated, even down to the last detail, and more than 50,000 men will be employed in the battle scenes, as compared to the 20,000 men employed for the great battle scene in "The Birth of a Nation."

Hundreds of letters have been received by Griffith from patriotic societies, women's clubs, and individuals, offering to place at his disposal all manner of relics of the Revolutionary days. Whole towns have turned out to watch the rehearsing and the taking of scenes, and thousands who never saw a motion picture camera, and who had forgotten there ever was a War of Independence, have had an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Revolutionists were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes are being taken, brought forth the cast from the cases and treasure chests of their museums the other from family vaults, valuable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, guns and drums, to corsets and petticoats resembling rags, and offered them to Griffith for use in his scenes. Scores of this author have gone to have possibly to use as relics, some of which have actually been used in scenes for the picture.

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Many of the historical societies are actually flooded with requests from historical organizations which wish to aid with historical data or to appear in the picture; with valuable historical information from students of the Revolutionary period; with requests from municipalities which figured as the sites of Revolutionary incidents for him to bring his company and take pictures in their cities, towns and hamlets.

Indeed the production of "America" may be said to have taken on the aspect of a national revival of patriotism, and particularly of a renaissance of interest in the ideals and traditions of Revolutionary days. Whole townships have turned out to watch the rehearsing and the taking of scenes, and thousands who never saw a motion picture camera, and who had forgotten there ever was a War of Independence, have had an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Revolutionists were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes are being taken, brought forth the cast from the cases and treasure chests of their museums the other from family vaults, valuable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, guns and drums, to corsets and petticoats resembling rags, and offered them to Griffith for use in his scenes. Scores of this author have gone to have possibly to use as relics, some of which have actually been used in scenes for the picture.

Although it would seem that every detail regarding such a well known incident as Paul Revere's ride through Middlesex to warn the Minutemen of the coming of the British forces in command of Major Pitcairn, would be public property and the knowledge of every school child, the research workers found that such was not the case. Despite the fact that Revere's ride has been ably told in prose and verse, even eye-witness historians had neglected to mention what to Griffith was a very important item—the color of the nameless yet famous steed he rode.

Paintings of Revere generally show the horse as white, which the research workers, after weeks of seeking through yellowed documents, found to be incorrect. They were finally able to solve the problem. And this was but a minor incident, a petty puzzle among the many disputed points they were called upon to settle.

Even with his research bureau Griffith would have found the solution of many disputed points impossible had it not been for the voluntary aid of local historians and patriotic societies, including such prominent personages as Mrs. Anthony Wayne Cook, president of the Daughters of the American Revolution; E. Wyman James, president of the Sons of the American Revolution; Mrs. E. Worthen, president of the Long Historical society.

The actual filming was also begun in having the personal aid of Robert W. Bonner, the author, who not only wrote the Revolutionary story which was the basis for the scenario, but also aided Griffith in securing the authentic data and documents for the scenario. Although perhaps not widely known as an author, Bonner is a well known historian in his own right, and the author of many articles and documents which have been published in various magazines and periodicals.

Bonner has been assigned to aid in the work of the research bureau, and has gone to the city of Lexington, Mass., where he is now at work. Bonner is a well known historian in his own right, and the author of many articles and documents which have been published in various magazines and periodicals.

Special trains carried the 18th Infantry from Forts Schuyler and Hamilton, and the 16th Infantry from Governor's Island, together with a 33-piece band from Fort Slocum, a commissary corps in command of Lieut. De Witt, and a medical unit under Capt. N. T. Davis into the camp at Somers.

Reserve cavalry units assembled under command of Capt. Love of the reserve forces, formed the largest such unit ever brought together outside of war maneuvers.

Other special cars and automobiles brought Griffith, his players, technicians and advisers—a company of more than a thousand.

And another scene has been added to "America."

Although, because the march of years and events, bringing modern surroundings to the battlefields of the Revolution, forced Griffith to take many of his larger scenes in this manner, he and his company have traveled through the country in special cars, taking the less massive scenes on the actual sites.

Thus he and his company visited Lexington and Concord, where members of the Minutemen, descendants of the original heroes, clad in their picturesque costumes were used as extra people. Paul Revere's ride was recharged on the road over which Revere actually made his famous midnight journey. The hanging of the lanterns in the Old North church was redone in its original settings, and John Adams and Hancock revisited the Hancock-Clarke home.

Thence Griffith and his players, and by special train, southward through New York to the principal points of historic interest in New York and New Jersey, and on to Washington and into Virginia.

The scenes of Revere around the national capital were used as backgrounds for numerous scenes. One morning, for example, Griffith called upon the famous Paul Revere, who assumed the role of the same.

Through the same good service Griffith secured the services of Mr. Bonner, who is now at work on the scenario, and who is now at work on the scenario.

Baltimore (Md) Sun March 2 1924

Says Griffith's "America" Is A Fine Play

Our New York Critic Waxes Enthusiastic Over Producing Latest Effort And Says Even Real Antiques Are Shown

NEW YORK, March 1.

YEARS ago the film productions of that directorial genius, David Wark Griffith, began to form in his memory an imperishable monument.

"The Birth of a Nation" was the cornerstone, "Intolerance" was a creation which formed the base and the exquisite beauty of "Broken Blossoms" and "Dream Street" builded to the structure. Then came "Hearts of the World," forming the beginning of a shaft that was destined to grow in height and impressiveness with "Orphans of the Storm." Now, for the time being, that monument is finished and "America" stands as a crowning achievement, a worthy picture to follow such distinguished predecessors. It is now playing here at the Forty-fourth Street Theater.

HAS YOUTHFUL LOVERS.

GRIFFITH, in everything he has done, has always adhered to one thing—a pair of youthful lovers.

He knows probably that there is nothing in the world so fragile and so appealing as a loving heart. This knowledge has always been applied, for in "The Birth of a Nation" one has only to recall Mae Marsh and Lillian Gish as the Southern sisters in love with two Northern boys.

Now comes "America" and the love theme is again dominant, a son of the Revolutionary period in love with the daughter of a Tory.

It is the old Romeo and Juliet story, the lovers on the opposite side of the fence, and, in no matter what form it is used, it stands to the fore always. He makes of it an almost irresistible force, for his is no introspective love—it is the pure, probably unreasoning, affection of a plain boy and a plain girl.

WASHINGTON IS SHOWN.

THE story begins with the rumblings of war. Samuel Adams and John Hancock are depicted as the leaders in the North. George Washington is shown with his friends in Virginia. Clearly the atmosphere of these two diverse sections is depicted and just as clearly is shown that common bond which repelled them from the King of England and led them into the one cause.

Then comes the speeches against taxation—William Pitt arguing in England and Patrick Henry uttering his famous defi in the Virginia House of Burgesses. Next comes the actual start of the war in Massachusetts—first Lexington, then Concord and the fight over the historic bridge—then Bunker Hill.

The action shifts. Captain Butler and his ravages in the valley of New York are brought into the story as being important because the food supplies for Washington's army were being secured from the very valley which Butler and his Indian allies were laying waste.

Then the historical part of the story works around to the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown and finally the inauguration of George Washington as the first President of this country.

THE LOVE INTERMIXED.

Nancy Montague and Nathan Holden. [illegible] and share their first meeting in Virginia and subsequent meetings where the fortunes of war have thrown them together.

Paul Pomeroy is the girl—and quite one too. In Griffith's hands she does some great acting in "America." He has an uncanny way of making his heroines sweet, yet human. He and the other executives responsible for staging a love-making scene are able to make the embrace violent or gentle—with the movements, it is always a thing of reverence, the kiss, the caress, the embrace and the kiss intensely in view of the manner in which proper appreciation of the passion and fidelity underlying the love of the hero and heroine is shown.

Paul Revere's ride was the story as it was brought to the people of Boston by Paul Revere, which resulted in the rising of the area.

[illegible]

Lexington (Ky) Herald March 2 1924

CRITICS PRAISE 'AMERICA' FILM

First Half of Picture Is Better Than Last Part, Is Claim of New York Reviewers

PICTURE IS TOO LENGTHY

"America," D. W. Griffith's latest film, a story of the war of Independence, opened at the Forty-fourth Street theater, New York city, on February 21. All the metropolitan dailies highly praised Griffith's latest effort, but the consensus of opinion is that although the picture has a powerful theme and is one of the greatest films ever made, it is melodramatic, far too long and "not as good as it might have been."

Following are extracts from the reviews of the New York newspapers:

America—By far the best thing he (Griffith) has made since "Way Down East." There is such a wealth of historical data associated with the period of 1776 that no one produce could possibly touch it all. Mr. Griffith has left untried enough material to furnish at least three other productions.

Daily News—The first half of Mr. Griffith's "America" is all charm; the second half, all war. No one can guide him in the drama when it comes to [illegible] and he has a free hand. [illegible] such a tale as this, Mr. Griffith, will do well to cut fifteen, especially in the latter half.

Evening Journal—A lifting, breathing document of the emotions and aspirations of the men who fought America. The production is remarkably vivid and naturally an [illegible] and heartstirring one to hold [illegible] through the [illegible] thrilling incidents of the period.

Times—In the latter half of this production the actor and the [illegible] of the drama and [illegible] hearts, which [illegible] will [illegible] be [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Boston Traveler 3/1/24 — Boston American — M.P.W. Trade Review — Film Daily March 2 1924 — Flint (Mich) Journal 3/2/24 — Detroit Mich News 3/2/24 — Milwaukee (Wis) Journal March 2 192x

D. W.'s America!

What between the Daughters of the Revolution; the Colonial Dames; at least 3,423 historians and every descendant of the Revolution who lives in New England, Griffith must have had his troubles in deciding just what to do with "America." The chances are that if the truth were known DW added grey hairs to his collection; and the chances are in addition that "America" as made is far different from what DW would like to have had it. And incidentally, no matter how he made it. Or what he did with it. Someone would like to see something else. You cannot tackle a job as big as the one DW did with any idea of pleasing all of the people all of the time. It simply cannot be done.

Personally I would like to have seen much that isn't in "America" instead of a lot that is. And this isn't highbrowism, either. In my very humble opinion—and not setting up against DW as a showman—because he is the daddy of them all when it comes to that—if the crossing of the Delaware had been shown I believe it would have been one of the greatest box office kicks ever put into a picture. It would have cost much to do it—much in money, energy and ability. But what a kick it would have been! Compared with the thrill that arrives with the ride of Paul Revere, the Delaware crossing would have been a riot.

(Continued from Page 1)

But you can't have everything. And you sure have a lot in "America" as it stands.

SMALL TOWN STUFF.

N.Y. Tribune March 2 1924

Equine Star Believes Pictures Just in Infancy

Makes Debut in "America"—Claims To Be Descendant of Famous Mare That Carried Paul Revere That Night

By Harriette Underhill

"Do you remember that old one about 'Did you ever see a horse fly?' Well, I guess I answered that satisfactorily in 'America,' didn't I? The next time I hear any one spring that old '49er I shall take him over to the Forty-fourth Street Theater and tell him to laugh that off if he can." We were seated on a bale of hay in front of the box stall occupied by Faugh-a-Ballagh, or Leaping Danger, as he is called in the screen world. His masseur calls him Jack, and we shall call him that, too.

Of course, Jack is the gorgeous black and white equine that carries Paul Revere on his famous ride in D. W. Griffith's new picture. His performance is the most thrilling one of the evening, and we, having a congenital interest in horses, went to interview Jack before he could give his story to other interviewers. As it is, we have a beat. Jack confided to us that he is a direct descendant of the mare that accompanied Paul Revere on his original ride. "Of course, I do not remember the old lady," said Jack, "but they do say she was pretty good for her time. I shouldn't say this, I know, and I wouldn't have you print it for the world; but those who remember Aunt Emma's performance have assured me that mine is much better than the original. That old classical ballad, 'Whoa, Emma! Whoa, Emma! What made you put me in such a dilemma?' was written about my own aunt. But, of course, at that time such things were in their infancy. Why, the surface had hardly been scratched. It is my ambition to do bigger and better things, and Mr. Griffith is the man to be with, don't you think?"

We nodded and were about to speak when Jack interrupted us with a coarse laugh. "I wish you could have seen those shates who tried to follow me! I do wish you could. I wouldn't want you to put this in, either, but they had a great time finding two gee-gees who could keep close enough to me to make it look like a chase. I tried to slow down, but one has one's pride, and there was my Aunt Emma's reputation at stake. I just stood every minute. [illegible] that Jack was ready to [illegible] feet, but, pshaw! I cleared it by six feet! One really can have only a vague idea of my ability in 'America.' Don't put this in the interview, but they cut my part down to nothing. I can't say I blame them. Every one has himself to look out for, and people who saw the picture before it was cut said that I was the only thing in it. Neil Hamilton is an awfully nice boy, but he's young yet. He'll learn."

"Then this is not your first picture?"

"I'm so glad you asked me! Mercy, yes. In Europe I never went in for this cinema thing at all. It's my first picture, but I've been in many shows abroad. Always myself—in person—never on the screen."

"Do you find that the make-up hurts your skin?"

"Tell you a secret. I never use any. I'm fortunate, you see, in having black, glossy hair and a pure white face. Wonderful photographic values!"

"It is true that Tom Mix's Tony is a relative of yours?"

"None in the world. That is," he hesitated, "none that I know of." Again that hoarse laugh. "It's a wise colt that knows his own father's children. No, I'm not going to try Shakespeare on my own. I may do a version of 'Lady Godiva' later on, and I've been offered that part in 'Richard.' It's a written-in part, but I could use a neat little kingdom all right, all right. Yes, I like the style of the part I've been playing, and I revere Mr. Griffith. Did you get that—revere! But the devil of it is I've no competition."

"There was the cow which jumped over the moon," we suggested sarcastically. "Why not try to give her the air?" But Jack ran true to form. He took us seriously.

"I've read up all the literature on that subject, and there's absolutely no proof that she ever really lived. I think I'll stick with Griffith. You know what Will Hays says: 'It isn't the length of the step you take, but the direction in which you take it.'"

"Do you like Hays?" we asked innocently. "No yourself," resolutely. "Do I like Hays? Yes, I don't like him a bit—right back at you! In the future I shall endeavor Hays [illegible] good. [illegible]

Brooklyn Eagle March 2 1924

Long Shots and Closeups

Lecture of American Photoplays—Griffith's "America" Latest and Greatest—How About a Little Theater Movement in the Films?

[illegible]

DREAMY GRIFFITH COMES OUT WITH REALISTIC FILM

Sticks to Facts in His Long Awaited Picture, "America."

By NEA Service.

NEW YORK, March 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

SOME months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location.)

* * *

IT is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Paul Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

THE midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. Griffith has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith throw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, rendering a softened, warm effect.

"AMERICA" HAS DEBUT IN EAST

Paul Revere's Ride the Big Thrill Event in New Griffith Film.

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, March 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America" — Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth Century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

* * *

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. Griffith has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle West in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith throw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, rendering a softened, warm effect.

A STILL taken during the filming of "America," showing the old Buckman Tavern at Lexington.

Springfield (Mass) Republican 3/2/24 — New Orleans (La) Item 3/2/24

Celebrities Go To New York to See Griffith's Films

Three congressmen made a special trip from Washington to New York, and parties of prominent society folk went from Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New England to the metropolis to attend the world premiere of D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Forty-Fourth street theatre, last week.

[illegible] lured from troubles of state by a desire to attend the first performance of this photodrama of the Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, were Allen P. Treadway, [illegible] M. Fenn and Charles M. Moore.

The Virginia party included Mr. and Mrs. Richard Crane of Westover; G. Watson James, national historian, Sons of the Revolution, Mrs. James J. Scott Parrish, Miss Eleanor Parrish and Miss Agnes Mayher of Richmond.

Among those in the New England party were: President Edwin R. Worthen of the Lexington Historical society, Mrs. Worthen, Judge and Mrs. Frank H. Hammill of Bristol, R. I., Mrs. A. Martin Pierce, Miss Alice Pierce, Curtis Pierce, George T. Hough [illegible] Mrs. R. M. Whitman of [illegible] Mass.; Mrs. John L. S. Pell, Everett Hamilton Pell, Mr. and Mrs. George M. Taylor, Robert Wheeler and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Goodridge of Great Barrington.

The United States army, which had an important part in the making of the picture was represented by Major Thomas Holland, commander of the Department of the East, and a dozen prominent members of officers, while Mrs. Charles Wolfe York and 15 members of the D. A. R. represented that organization.

Washington Star 3/2/24

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH'S latest creation, "America," has been shown in New York. It was made under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution, according to the announcements, and the purpose behind it unquestionably is the stimulation of patriotism. Judged by the reviews of the long list of newspapers and periodicals in New York, Griffith has achieved real greatness—and he has not. Nearly all the reviews become ecstatic up to a point and then there follows a BUT. It will be interesting to watch the career of this new Griffith masterpiece, for, like the great picture which preceded it, "The Dramatic Life of Abraham Lincoln," which received wonderful critical indorsement, its purpose is to direct attention to the things which should make America dear to Americans. Already the pessimistic note is being sounded. More than one writer has declared it his belief that the people are tired of patriotic work and thought. They want to play now, and to play all the time. Perhaps these fine and truly American historic masterpieces are to be a test, not of their audiences. It would be sad if those audiences were not as great and as enthusiastic as they should be; sad if their producers should suffer loss for want of something more than artistic appreciation in return.

Springfield (Mass) Republican 3/2/24 — Newark (N.J.) Ledger 3/2/24

"AMERICA" TAXES ITS DIRECTOR'S STRENGTH

D. W. Griffith Gets Chill Reward for Rushing Film Into Exhibition

[illegible]

The chief discussion at the present time is the high salaries of the movie stars. No one can hear from the producers in complaint, that the stars get all the money, and therefore they must charge more for their pictures. Really the thing is such ridiculous talk that one should not take notice of it, but while every one else is having their "fling" at it, we thought this would be an item for us to follow the rest.

The general opinion of the public is that it takes from three to six months to make a picture. [illegible] five, save the pictures [illegible] whole year that has to [illegible] attention to the things which should make America dear to Americans. [illegible] make such pictures when it is a big [illegible] and practical man to put such [illegible] and practical man to put such [illegible] and if the star is getting too high [illegible] and a good [illegible] the high salary demand for film [illegible] There are [illegible] Pictures are made in four weeks [illegible] the Mona Maria [illegible] the pictures are [illegible] [illegible] Mary Pickford [illegible] [illegible] Charlie Chaplin [illegible] [illegible] Douglas Fairbanks [illegible] [illegible] Wallace Reid [illegible] [illegible] Lillian Gish [illegible] [illegible] Richard Barthelmess [illegible] [illegible] Bebe Daniels [illegible] [illegible] Lois Wilson [illegible] [illegible] Agnes Ayres [illegible] [illegible] Gloria Swanson [illegible] [illegible] Pola Negri [illegible] [illegible] Norma Talmadge [illegible] [illegible] Constance Talmadge [illegible] [illegible] Mae Murray [illegible] [illegible] Bebe Daniels [illegible] [illegible] Lois Wilson [illegible] [illegible] Agnes Ayres [illegible] [illegible] Gloria Swanson [illegible] [illegible] Pola Negri [illegible] [illegible] Norma Talmadge [illegible] [illegible] Constance Talmadge [illegible] [illegible] Mae Murray [illegible]

Oakland (Cal) Tribune March 1924 — Grand Rapids (Mich) Herald March 2 1924

BOOSTS, BOAS of Theaters and [illegible]

Film Daily 3/2/24

"America"

D. W. Griffith

As a whole, ONCE AGAIN THE CHARGING HORSEMEN GIVE US THRILLS. ONCE AGAIN GRIFFITH TRIUMPHS EVEN THO A GREAT EPIC SUBJECT HAS BEEN ALLOWED TO DWINDLE AT TIMES TO SHEER MELODRAMA. BUT THE CHEESE WILL PROBABLY SAY IT UP.

[illegible]

Topeka (Kansas) Capital 3/2/24

NEW BROADWAY RECORDS

[illegible]

My Telegram 3/1/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" AT 44TH ST. THEATRE

[illegible]

SCENE FROM THE NEW D.W. GRIFFITH PRODUCTION "AMERICA"

My Telegraph 3/2/24

Springfield (Mass) Republican 3/2/24

During the course of "America," Mr Griffith turns more [illegible] history to fiction. At the start he introduces a number of characters who are obviously destined to carry the story with its incidental love interest. For awhile these romantic people do not intrude too heavily upon the vastly more important drama in which they are called upon to play a part. But their prominence increases steadily and in the latter half of the picture George Washington has faded into the background to make way for Miss Carol Dempster, which is unfortunate.

Miss Dempster has never seemed to us to be worthy of the Griffith tradition, which has produced such actresses as Lillian Gish and Mae Marsh. She has all the requisite tricks at her fingertips and she is liberal in her use of them. But she lacks the inward fire without which these tricks cannot seem credible. In "America" Miss Dempster gives a very uneven performance. There are times, particularly in her more sorrowful moments, when she seems to grasp the point for which she is so obviously reaching. There are other times when she doesn't come within hailing distance of it.

Neil Hamilton, to whom is intrusted the hero's share of the story, is excellent throughout. He is serious, manly and straightforward, and he is utterly simple and unaffected. Here, it would seem, are the makings of a better and somewhat more formidable Richard Barthelmess.

Plenty of Good Acting

There is plenty of good acting in

Boston Post 3/2/24

[illegible] is true, and it may be said that this park is not so very different from what it was in 1775, on that memorable April morning. There are monuments marking the line of battle, the sites of the old belfry and the church and some of the houses which witnessed the fight are still standing, among them the Buckman Tavern, which is now owned by the Lexington Historical Society. So there is enough left of the original to give verisimilitude to the picture.

I wonder if Mr. Griffith has [illegible] in the episode of the first gun and prisoner taken in the War of the Revolution? I hope so, for it was quite a dramatic incident. In the church on Lexington Common was stored a quantity of powder. As the British marched up what is now Massachusetts avenue two of the Minute Men went to the church to get the ammunition. They were Joshua Simonds and Jonathan Harrington. The latter rushed out when he heard the firing and was shot, from the effects of which he died. Mr. Simonds waited. British soldiers entered the church but suspected nothing, and the squad joined their companions and pushed on toward Concord. Simonds came out of the church when all was quiet. He saw a Hessian straggler coming up the road, commanded him to throw down his weapon and Simonds took him prisoner. The gun today hangs in the Senate Chamber of the State Capitol. I don't know where the prisoner is.

We are soon to have an influx of motion pictures of the drama nature. The first will come to the Majestic Wednesday evening, and subsequently, will be given twice daily. It is called "America," and is the latest work of the famous producer, David Wark Griffith. As nearly as I can glean it is the pictorial history of the United States which have come to be called "America," although it constitutes but a very small part of it.

It is a sort of introduction to the sesquicentennial of the Battle of Lexington, which was really the beginning of the republic. Just how far back from this stirring event the picture goes, I am not informed; but, in all probability, many of the events which led up to the clash at arms on Lexington Common will be thrown on the screen by way of explanation. I am told and have no reason to doubt the statement, that some of the scenes were photographed on Lexington Common, and that descendants of the Minute Men took part.

Boston Advertiser March 2 1924

Griffith's Film 'America,' Opens Thursday

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," picturing scenes relating to the American Revolution, as their contribution to the sesquicentennial of this country's struggles for freedom, "America," combines historical fact and enthralling romance.

Scenes of the picture were taken at Lexington, Concord, the Old North Church and Bunker Hill. Practically all the entire first part of the drama unfolds itself in Greater Boston.

The major battles of the great war were enacted for "America" by United States regulars.

The story of "America" was written by Robert W. Chambers and the historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Bell. Practically everyone of the leading figures of Revolutionary days appears in the picture.

Carol Dempster plays the heroine and Neil Hamilton the hero. Lionel Barrymore impersonates Walter Butler, arch-villain of the Revolution. Erville Alderson, Charles Mack, Arthur Dewey, Arthus Donaldson and Louis Wolheim are other prominent players.

My Herald 3/2/24

The success of "America" recalls that the last time a man made a similar picture he was put in jail. About seven years ago a Mr. Robert Goldstein, a Los Angeles theatrical costumer, decided to make a film called "The Spirit of '76." Although his motion picture experience was limited to furnishing costumes to producers, Mr. Goldstein thought himself able to do all the writing and directing necessary. So he went to work and made a version of what happened in America around 1776.

When the picture was shown during wartime Mr. Goldstein was charged with circulating propaganda detrimental to the cause of the Allies, particularly England, and was subsequently sentenced to spend ten years in San Quentin prison. He is probably still there unless he has had considerable time off for good behavior.

Boston Post March 2 1924

[illegible] postponed because of the illness of David Wark Griffith, "America," the photodrama of the war of American independence he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution sesqui-centennial celebration of this country's struggles for freedom, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre next Thursday evening. Mr. Griffith will attend the Boston premiere in person, in spite of his run-down condition caused by a severe cold which he contracted during the last orchestra rehearsals.

Washington Post March 2, 1924

On behalf of my moving picture friends I take pleasure in spreading the report that David Wark Griffith has gone and done it again. His "America," a story of the country's upheaval through the Revolutionary war, is spoken of as a second "Birth of a Nation," with the ride of Paul Revere the most excitingly dramatic incident the screen has offered its Mae Tinees in seasons and seasons. It fair knocked 'em here the opening night, and as the crowd of cinema celebrities poured into the lobby there were as many crushed shirt bosoms and heaving necklaces as ever the drama has stirred to excitement. We have seen but a short half reel so far, but when we see the rest of it more shall be told about it in this column.

Wichita (Kan) Eagle March 2 1924

D. W. Griffith's "America," his big historical production made through request from the Daughters of the American Revolution, has dropped into running pace on Broadway, where it opened last week. The picture reaches a pinnacle with the famous midnight ride of Paul Revere. Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Erville Alderson, Charles H. Mack, Arthur Dewey and Lionel Barrymore are its six principal characters.

Charleston (SC) News & Cour 3/2/24

Boston (Mass) Adventure March 2 1924

YEARS PREPARING FOR "AMERICA" FILM

D. W. Griffith's "America," picturing the War of American Independence, which will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre next Thursday evening, represents several years' work. The film has amassed a wealth of data and has been prepared a year ago that the matter of Revolutionary days, relating to the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is the sesquicentennial of the [illegible] Revolution, began this year.

Philadelphia Inq March 2 1924

N.Y.—D. W. Griffith, suffering from exhaustion and a severe cold, lies ill in his room in the Astor Hotel as a reward for rushing the opening of his latest picture, "America." He is in the care of physicians who report his condition due to complete exhaustion and severe inflammation of the throat and lungs. He is unable to talk. While his picture was being received with applause in the theatre, Griffith and his staff sat [illegible] in a few [illegible]

Boston Traveler March 2 1924

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" OPENS THURSDAY NIGHT

D. W. Griffith's "America," picturing the Revolution, will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre next Thursday night. The story is by Robert W. Chambers. Many of the scenes in the picture show stirring events that made Boston one of the centers of American affairs. General Washington and John Hancock are among the historic figures in the picture. Carol Dempster plays the role of the heroine.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times March 2 1924

Griffith Is Made Ill By Work on 'America'

Portland Ore Telegram March 2 1924

AMERICA, GRIFFITH'S BIGGEST PRODUCTION

Premiere Bow at Majestic And Way Down East

Brooklyn Eagle March 2 1924

My World 3/2/24

Boston (Mass) Globe 3/2/24

Boston Post March 2 1924

NEIL HAMILTON

My Times March 2 1924

Portland Ore Sunday Oregonian March 2 1924

Nashville (Tenn) Tennessean March 2 1924

NOTED BRITISH ARMY MAN AIDS GRIFFITH

Sir Percy Sykes Helps U. S. Movie Director With His "America."

Sir Percy Sykes, of London, Eng., former commanded-in-chief of the British forces in Persia, and authority in royal court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, being filmed for the Daughters of the American Revolution, which is scheduled to have its world premiere at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York, February 21.

Until Sir Percy, who has been thrice presented at the Court of St. James, as well as at the royal courts of India, Persia and other Eastern countries, volunteered, Griffith and his research workers were at a loss to learn the details of court ceremonies in 1775, for despite the columnous writings of the diarists of that period, none of them described formal court etiquette in detail.

Just prior to Sir Percy's arrival, Griffith, after months of search, had engaged a foreign actor who bore an uncanny resemblance to the best authenticated pictures of King George Third, for that role.

So much did this actor look the part and play it that Sir Percy, a deep student of George's reign, [illegible] to forget that he was dealing with a modern actor, and when [illegible] the latter always did so [illegible] a deep bow, and with the [illegible] "If his Majesty will [illegible]."

Polish Telegram March 2 1924

Milton

Radzimy wszystkim zobaczyć wspaniały obraz p. t. „America", wyprodukowany przez słynną wytwórnię filmową „Griffith" obraz ten wyświetlany jest obecnie w teatrze 44 st Theatre, dwa razy dziennie.

Krytyka amerykańska pisze o tym obrazie w samych superlatywach. Jest to coś niebywałego. Obraz pod względem technicznym, jak również treści, niema sobie równego. Zresztą wytwórnia D. W. Griffitha znana jest, że produkuje najwspanialsze obrazy.

New York Russian Paper Narodny Mir March 2 1924

АМЕРИКА.

44th St. Theatre, West of Broadway

[illegible] картина, когда [illegible] Театр. Картина [illegible] Гриффита.

Milton

Boston (Mass) Morning Globe March 3 1924

Boston (Mass) Post 3/3/24

My Russian Mirl Feb 19 1924

„אמעריקא" — דאס בילד פון דער גריסער עפאכע

גריפיטס בילד „אמעריקא", וואס ווערט איצט געוויזן אין 44טן סטריט טעאטער, שטעלט מיט זיך פאר דעם וויכטיקסטן מאמענט אין דער געשיכטע פון אונזער לאנד. עס שטעלט פאר די גרויסע אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע, די רעוואלוציע וואס האט אונזער לאנד געמאכט אומאפהענגיג.

עס איז א טריי היסטאריש בילד, אין „אמעריקא" זיינען איבערגעגעבן מיט די קלענסטע איינצעלהייטן אלע שלאכטן, וואס אונזער ארמיי אונטער דער פירערשאפט פון דזשארדזש וואשינגטאן האט געפירט גגען די ענגלענדער.

די גאנצע פרעסע איז ארויס מיט לויב ווערטער פאר דעם בילד, לויט דער מיינונג פון דער פרעסע איז עס דאס וויכטיקסטע בילד וואס ווערט איצט געוויכטיקסטע, נאר אויך דאס אינטערעסאנטסטע. ניט ביי איין סעענע הויבט אייער בלוט אן קלאפן שטארקער. איר זעט די גרויסע שלאכטן, איר זעהט די גרויסע העלדנטאטן פון דער ארמיי.

ווען איר גייט זען „אמעריקא" פארגעסט ניט מיטצונעמען אייערע קינדער, זיי וועלן אויך דאנקבאר זיין דערפאר.

Boston (Mass) Traveler March 3 1924

GRIFFITH COMES TO STAGE "AMERICA" FILM

D. W. Griffith, who made the photodrama, "America," which will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre next Thursday night, will arrive in Boston tonight, to prepare for the local opening of the film which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr Griffith will be accompanied by Mr and Mrs Albert Grey and by Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the leading female role of "America." Neil Hamilton and Charles Emmett Mack, who play two important roles in the big patriotic love story, will arrive here later in the week to attend the opening.

GRIFFITH COMING TO SEE "AMERICA"

David Wark Griffith, who filmed "America," the photodrama of the war of American independence for the Daughters of the American Revolution, will arrive in Boston tonight to prepare for the Boston premiere of the picture at the Majestic Theatre, Thursday evening, March 6.

Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the leading woman's role in "America," will be among those who accompany Griffith. Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack and other of the players in the film will come here later in the week to attend the premiere.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert L. Grey, the former the general manager for D. W. Griffith, Inc., and James Ashcroft, private secretary to Griffith, are among the others in the party due tonight.

Boston (Mass) Telegram March 3 1924

GRIFFITH HERE FOR "AMERICA"

David Wark Griffith, who made the photodrama of the war of independence, "America," which will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic theatre next Thursday night, will arrive in Boston tonight, to prepare for the local opening of the film, which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. Griffith will be accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Albert Grey, and Carol Dempster, who plays the leading female role of "America." The party will remain in Boston till after the opening Thursday night, which they will attend in person.

Neil Hamilton and Charles Emmett Mack, who play two important roles in the big patriotic love story, will arrive here later in the week to attend the opening.

Boston (Mass) Advertiser March 3 1924

Griffith Comes for "America" Premiere

David Wark Griffith, whose photodrama of the War of Independence, "America," will have its Boston premiere at the Majestic Theatre next Thursday night, is due here tonight to prepare for the local opening of the film, which he made for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Carol Dempster

Mr. Griffith will be accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Albert Grey, and by Carol Dempster, who plays the leading role in "America." Neil Hamilton, and Charles Emmett Mack, who play important roles in the new Griffith picture will also arrive in time to attend the opening.

Boston (Mass) Post 3/3/24

Schenectady (NY) Gazette 3/4/24

Griffith Breaks Down After "America" Opens

Producer Gives Way Under Strain Other News of the Picture World

At last the long awaited "America" has been released and all of the expectations around seem to have been fulfilled. The New York critics, with practically no exception, have hailed it as the biggest production of the year and its producer, D. W. Griffith, seems to be carrying on the tradition he established when he produced the first great motion picture ever made, "The Birth of a Nation." Immediately after the public had actually started to see it in New York Mr. Griffith suffered from exhaustion and a [illegible]

Erie (Penn) Times March 2 1924

Herald March 2 1924

New Bedford (Mass) Mercury March 3 1924

There are innumerable sequences in David Wark Griffith's "America" which reveal the artist even better than did "Orphans of the Storm," says the New York Times. It is just as natural to Mr. Griffith to get the most of a scene as it is for the master of the palate and the brush to put on to his canvas the most effective mixtures of colors. It seems almost a pity that the moving scenes can't be framed. For such photo-dramas there ought to be some invention whereby one could push a button for a particular portion of the film and it would appear in its frame; and then one ought to be able to stop it so that one could study details of the interesting scenes.

Mr. Griffith has some splendid group-ings in this film, and the shooting of many scenes compels fervent admiration; they seem to come and go all too quickly.

A curious feature of this production, and one which causes one to wonder considering the film knowledge back of this picture, is the attempt Griffith makes to thrill his audience with a duplication of the idea contained in the first part of the film. There is a dashing, reckless rider, pictured in master-ly fashion, in Paul Revere's ride, and then later on there is shown a similar effort with horseback riding which possesses nothing like the stirring effect of the Revere ride. Apparently Griffith realized the power of the first effort, and thought it would do well to have the hero doing something of the sort when Walter Butler is in the val-ley. Fortunately the silversmith's ride is so fine that it can't be obliterated from one's mind. So one leaves the Forty-fourth Street theatre still filled with admiration for this marvelous series of scenes. The second attempt at a dashing ride, which is done quite well, cannot stand comparison with all the dramatic impetus injected into the first effort. It is like an inspired piece of work being imitated later because of its success.

When one ponders over the task of making this production in which scene after scene reveals the master mind back of it, one naturally feels humble in approaching detailed critic-ism. Nevertheless it is apparent that there is a continual loss of time in overdoing some excellent dramatic points. Where the effect would have been all that could be desired, it is al-most lost in the prolonging of certain scenes.

Soon after the picture opens one be-holds the back of Washington's head. Twice would have been enough of this flash of the first president of the United States, and possibly three times would have left one with its full dramatic touch. But it is shown five or six times, after cutting to Justice Montague, Miss Nancy Montague and Charles Mon-tague, and the sequence is therefore much too long. It is quite true that the elimination of part of this sequence would not shorten the film to any great extent, but there is no doubt that the subtlety of the idea is lost, and then the same prolonging of scenes or cut-ting back occurs time and again throughout this picture, and the com-bined footage that could be saved is enough to count for something if it were eliminated; and the curtailing of these sequences would certainly add considerably to the drama of this out-standing film achievement.

There is too much play given to the incident where Nathan Holden is seen standing on his horse saying good-bye to Nancy Montague. Half of this would be enough to impress on the minds of the audience that the couple are in love with each other. The comedy touch where he falls from his horse brings out a chuckle, and as there is none too much comedy in this film, this could be kept in, while a few feet of the other could be cut.

The cart where young Montague's body is brought into the room where old Montague is in bed is effective and dramatic up to a certain point, but this, like many of the other scenes, becomes a little tedious through its length. The scene could have been carried straight through with half the footage in this scene with more telling pathos and power.

Again in the second half of the pro-duction the Fort Ticonderoga struggle, undoubtedly a work of art, could be cut considerably without losing any of the force, and it would be all the more effective by the retention of scenes that are only unnecessary reminders of what had been some before. There is a fine sequence where through a group of people coming around, dance practically the same thing, and which is virtual monotony by the throw of dices and the shaking of dices in the underdog. It is a concerto, if Monaghan composes it. But there is too much of it, and anything in a picture that has interest can, then make use of long and unnecessary things. Such a bit is another.

Walter Huston played the Vicomte de Marigny, the French genius, in a fashion and that of the Red Coat officer, was the hope to find his young son, Nathan Hale, in prison. The story of the Revolution is woven into the story of Nancy Montague, Nathan Hale, Walter Butler, Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, Yorktown, Paul Revere's ride, Fort Ticonderoga, Oriskany, Saratoga, Stony Point, Cowpens, Kings Mountain, Eutaw Springs, Guilford Court House, Hobkirk's Hill, Ninety Six, Yorktown, Bennington, Monmouth, Brandywine, Germantown, Princeton, Trenton, Saratoga, Bunker Hill, Lexington, Concord

Boston (Mass) Post March 6 1924

GRIFFITH TALKS OF BIG SURPRISE

Maker of Screen Stars Says They Get More Out of It Than He Does ---Eight Years on "America"

D. W. GRIFFITH ESCORTED BY MINUTE MEN

The movie producer, who arrived in Boston yesterday to attend the opening of the great picture, "America," which he claims is better than his "Birth of a Nation." He was met at South Station by the Lexington Minute Men who escorted him to Hotel Touraine.

"I produced 'America' for the purpose of teaching boys and girls that history is a thrilling romance, especially their own history. I hope they will remember the story, and not the 'stars.'"

David Wark Griffith, the great movie producer of "The Birth of a Nation" fame, made this statement yesterday on arriving in Boston to attend the opening of "his latest and greatest national screen epic, 'America,'" which will be presented at the Majestic Theatre tonight.

HAS A NEW "FIND"

He declared that "America" promises a surprise and a pleasant one to all film lovers. Once again he says he has discovered a new find, a man who is to out "Valentino" the owner of that name. An Rodolph Valentino was developed by Mr. Griffith he said he feels safe in saying that "Neil Hamilton" is going to be the most popular man in the movies in a short time. This young actor plays the leading male part in the new picture.

"Well," said the man who doesn't believe in the present system of high-priced stars, "this is a great welcome, but really, the stars I have made are much more impressive than I am. Any one of them makes 10 times as much money as I am able to earn. Every thing I make in one picture I put in the next to help finance it.

"There isn't any money in being a moving picture director and producer of the type I am. I put all the money into the picture itself," he added, saying that accounts for the fact that no longer are such names as "Mary Pickford" his first and great find, and the groups of other well known stars associated with being with Griffith.

Leave Stars After Making Them

[illegible]

Boston Morning Globe 3/6/24

GRIFFITH ARRIVES TO GIVE "AMERICA"

His Best Photoplay Yet, Says Famous Producer

Met by Minute Men Who Took Part In Lexington Film

David W. Griffith, famous motion picture producer, arrived in Boston yesterday afternoon to attend to final details for the opening of his new picture, "America," at the Majestic Theatre tonight. Accompanying him were Miss Carol Dempster, heroine of the photoplay, and Mrs Albert Grey, Mr Griffith's sister-in-law. Mr Grey, Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack, the last two members of the "America" cast, arrived on a later train.

DAVID W. GRIFFITH

Mr Griffith was escorted to the Hotel Touraine by a detail of 12 members of the Lexington Minute Men's organization in their historical Continental uniforms. Capt E. F. Bread was in charge of the detail. The Minute Men lined up in South Station and saluted Mr Griffith on his arrival, and Mr Griffith shook hands with all and urged them to be his guests at the opening of the film play tonight. Many of the men who greeted him had taken part in the film when scenes were shot in Lexington last Fall.

Works Hard for Perfection

At the hotel Mr Griffith said he did not know when he should return to New York, but planned to remain in Boston long enough to see that the picture is shown properly.

Mr Griffith is the one producer who edits his films after their first New York showing. Sometimes a photoplay is not perfected by him until after it has been shown to the public for weeks. He is always seeing something that should be cut, or edited, and he is never satisfied until a film is as nearly perfect as he can make it. The musical score is as important as the film in his eyes, and he plans to spend all day going over the music for tonight's opening.

"I never eat or sleep more than four or five hours a day during the filming of a picture," said Mr Griffith, whose unusual energy is a source of wonder to the rest of the motion picture profession.

"The less I eat during the making of a film the better the picture and the more time I can spend on it," he said.

"Almost Starves Himself"

Miss Carol Dempster told of Mr Griffith's frugal meals during his work on "America." "It is perfectly true," she told the Globe reporter. "In the morning all he takes at the studio is a cup of black coffee. At noon he orders a couple of boiled eggs, and at night he orders a small dinner and then never eats more than a few bites.

"When the studio chef cooks something that Mr Griffith actually eats he feels as proud as a peacock over his achievement. But often it doesn't happen more than once a week. The rest of the time Mr Griffith practically starves himself."

Mr Griffith's eyes glowed as he discussed his film. "It is the best picture I ever made," he said, "and that is the first time you have ever heard me say that, and you've interviewed me a lot.

"I consider that this is even more important than "The Birth of a Nation." I wish that I had not used that title before, because it is more expressive of this photoplay than the one which I made first. It would have been better if 'The Birth of a Nation' had been saved for 'America,' and the original picture been called 'The Preservation of a Nation.'

She Made All Audience Weep

"I have not attempted to tell the story of the Revolution in my new film, but I have tried to show the spirit of sacrifice which made America possible. I have portrayed the causes of the Revolution but I have been very careful not to offend or show the horrible side of the war. Do you know that the English Government paid $20 to the Indians for every American scalp they turned in? That is only one of the things that might have been used in the picture, but which I left out."

Speaking of Miss Dempster, Mr Griffith said: "At last she has learned to act. In her former pictures Miss Dempster photographed beautifully but did not do any really fine acting. But when I heard a whole New York audience weep audibly when the scene showing her grief at her brother's death was shown on the screen I realized that at last she had become an actress."

The producer refused to discuss his future plans. "I eat, dream and think of 'America' constantly and I have no desire to think of the future until this latest and favorite child of mine is fully matured," he said.

Mr Griffith made "America" at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution. He began actual work on the film last June, although he had done research work for some years on the project.

Boston Herald March 6 1924

"BEST BRAINS" TO PRODUCE PICTURES

Griffith, in Boston, Sees Rosy Future for Screen

David Wark Griffith, the modern Goliath of motion-picturedom, sees great things ahead for the silver screen.

An instrument for making people think and see, and yet with entertaining qualities, the product of the best brains in the land and forming part and parcel of the larger cities, expressing their individuality, culture and soul—that is what Mr. Griffith sees for the motion picture 10 or 15 years hence.

Mr. Griffith, who is in Boston for the opening of his newest production, "America," at the Majestic tonight, visited this city before during an informal review at the Hotel Touraine yesterday afternoon.

"Ten or 15 years from now," said Mr. Griffith, "moving pictures will be quite different from what they are now, both in their substance and their production.

"They will be the product of the best minds of the country and, being conceived with thought, they will give occasion for something to think about, something to make them want to improve society. There will be some of these pictures. 'Way Down East Home,' or 'The Barrier Wall,' which we are trying to get away from now and have succeeded in doing to a certain extent. Of course there will always have to be a few light, frivolous pictures for amusement only.

"Then, too, the studios will not be as apart to themselves as they have been, but because the land and weather conditions are best for photography. There will be travel scenes to the Arctic circle and another part of the character film will be made up of the communities and the wide open spaces and the individuality of a community.

"Pictures would go back of the [illegible] and show the daily [illegible] of the people, showing the [illegible] of the people, showing the [illegible] of the people, showing the

New Bedford (Mass) Mercury March 3 1924

There are innumerable sequences in David Wark Griffith's "America" which reveal the artist even better than did "Orphans of the Storm," says the New York Times. It is just as natural to Mr. Griffith to get the most of a scene as it is for the master of the palate and the brush to put on to his canvas the most effective mixtures of colors. It seems almost a pity that the moving scenes can't be framed. For such photo-dramas there ought to be some invention whereby one could push a button for a particular portion of the film and it would appear in its frame; and then one ought to be able to stop it so that one could study details of the interesting scenes.

Mr. Griffith has some splendid groupings in this film, and the shooting of many scenes compels fervent admiration; they seem to come and go all too quickly.

A curious feature of this production, and one which causes one to wonder, considering the film knowledge back of this picture, is the attempt Griffith makes to thrill his audience with a duplication of the idea contained in the first part of the film. There is a dashing, reckless rider, pictured in masterly fashion, in Paul Revere's ride, and later on there is shown a similar effort with horseback riding which possesses nothing like the stirring effect of the Revere ride. Apparently Griffith realized the power of the first effort, and thought it would do well to have the hero doing something of the sort when Walter Butler is in the valley. Fortunately the silversmith's ride is so fine that it can't be obliterated from one's mind. So one leaves the Forty-fourth Street theatre still filled with admiration for this marvelous series of scenes. The second attempt at a dashing ride, which is done quite well, cannot stand comparison with all the dramatic impetus injected into the first effort. It is like an inspired piece of work being imitated later because of its success.

When one ponders over the task of making this production in which scene after scene reveals the master mind back of it, one naturally feels hesitate in approaching detailed criticism. Nevertheless it is apparent that there is a continual loss of time in overdoing some excellent dramatic points. Where the effect would have been all that could be desired, it is almost lost in the prolonging of certain scenes.

Soon after the picture opens one beholds the back of Washington's head. Twice would have been enough of this flash of the first president of the United States, and possibly three times would have left one with its full dramatic touch. But it is shown five or six times, after cutting to Justice Montague, Miss Nancy Montague and Charles Montague, and the sequence is therefore much too long. It is quite true that the elimination of part of this sequence would not shorten the film to any great extent, but there is no doubt that the subtlety of the idea is lost, and then the same prolonging of scenes or cutting back occurs time and again throughout this picture, and the combined footage that could be saved is enough to count for something if it were eliminated; and the curtailing of these sequences would certainly add considerably to the drama of this outstanding film achievement.

There is too much play given to the incident where Nathan Holden is seen standing on his horse saying good-bye to Nancy Montague. Half of this would be enough to impress on the minds of the audience that the couple are in love with each other. The comedy touch where he falls from his horse brings out a chuckle, and as there is none too much comedy in this film, this could be kept in, while a few feet of the other could be cut.

The cart whose young Montague's body is brought into the room where old Montague is in bed is effective and dramatic up to a certain point, but this, like many of the other scenes, becomes a little tedious through its length. The action could have been carried straight through with half the footage in this scene with more telling effect and drama.

Again in the second half of the production the Paul Revere struggle, so finely a work of art, could be cut somewhere without taking any of the power, and it would be all the more interesting to the exclusion of scenes that are only unnecessary repetitions of what has just gone before. There is a long sequence where throngs of people are running around doing practically the same thing, and there is never considerably to the thrill of some and the feeling of desire in the producing man. It is a moment of unequaled interest, but there is too much of it and nothing is gained by the fact that it is prolonged. It is a pity that this sequence, which is perhaps the most dramatic bit in the picture, should be marred by being made to last too long.

The film should be cut from a thousand feet of its length. It is a masterpiece of film art, and it would be a pity if it should be marred by the fact that it is too long. It is a pity that it should be marred by the fact that it is too long. It is a pity that it should be marred by the fact that it is too long. It is a pity that

Boston (Mass) Post March 6 1924 — Boston Morning Globe 3/6/24 — Boston (Mass) Telegram March 6 1924

GRIFFITH TALKS OF BIG SURPRISE

Maker of Screen Stars Says They Get More Out of It Than He Does ---Eight Years on "America"

D. W. GRIFFITH ESCORTED BY MINUTE MEN

The movie producer, who arrived in Boston yesterday to attend the opening of the great picture, "America," which he claims is better than his "Birth of a Nation." He was met at South Station by the Lexington Minute Men who escorted him to Hotel Touraine.

"I produced 'America' for the purpose of teaching boys and girls that history is a thrilling romance, especially their own history. I hope they will remember the story, and not the 'stars.'"

David Wark Griffith, the great movie producer of "The Birth of a Nation" fame, made this statement yesterday on arriving in Boston to attend the opening of "his latest and greatest national screen epic, 'America,'" which will be presented at the Majestic Theatre tonight.

HAS A NEW "FIND"

He declared that "America" promises a surprise and a pleasant one to all film lovers. Once again he says he has discovered a new find, a man who is to out "Valentino" the owner of that name. As Rodolph Valentino was developed by Mr. Griffith he said he feels safe in saying that "Neil Hamilton" is going to be the most popular man in the movies in a short time. This young actor plays the leading male part in the new picture.

"Well," said the man who doesn't believe in the present system of high-priced stars, "this is a great welcome, but really, the stars I have made are much more impressive than I am. Any one of them makes 10 times as much money as I am able to earn. Everything I make in one picture I put in the vaults to help finance it.

"There isn't any money in being a moving picture director and producer of the type I am. I put all the money into the picture itself." He added, saying that accounts for the fact that no longer are such names as "Mary Pickford," his first and great find, and the galaxy of other well-known stars associated with David Wark Griffith.

Loses Stars After Making Them

This is one he has lost upon his hands to some other great moving picture company. After Mary Pickford came such stars established as Douglas Fairbanks, the late Wallie Reid, Bessie Love, Douglas McLean, the late Robert Harron, Richard Barthelmess and Lillian Moore. Each succeeding is his last product and just how long her name will be featured under his is something he refuses to answer.

"No, I don't know how long Miss Pickford will stay with us now that she is married," he said rather sadly of his loss of Mary, whom he had helped to make a star years ago, and who, he said, was the greatest of all his stars.

Goldwyn Hamilton Will Win

There are, I am proud to say, hundreds of people who have written me, and I think, you know, I am a very good judge of character, I have a very good feeling for people, and I know that Neil Hamilton will be a great star. He is a great actor, and he has the right kind of personality. He is a fine, clean, wholesome young man, and he will be a great star.

No Chance for Valentino

I should say not. Valentino is a great actor, and I think he is a great personality, and I think he is a great actor, and I think he is a great personality. But Valentino is not a star of the type I am looking for. I want a star who will be a great star, who will be a great actor, who will be a great personality, who will be a great actor, who will be a great personality. Valentino is not a star of the type I am looking for. I want a star who will be a great star, who will be a great actor, who will be a great personality, who will be a great actor, who will be a great personality.

First Time at "America"

[illegible]

GRIFFITH ARRIVES TO GIVE "AMERICA"

His Best Photoplay Yet, Says Famous Producer

Met by Minute Men Who Took Part In Lexington Film

David W. Griffith, famous motion picture producer, arrived in Boston yesterday afternoon to attend to final details for the opening of his new picture, "America," at the Majestic Theatre tonight. Accompanying him were Miss Carol Dempster, heroine of the photoplay, and Mrs Albert Grey, Mr Griffith's sister-in-law. Mr Grey, Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack, the last two members of the "America" cast, arrived on a later train.

DAVID W. GRIFFITH

Mr Griffith was escorted to the Hotel Touraine by a detail of 12 members of the Lexington Minute Men's organization in their historical Continental uniforms. Capt E. F. Breed was in charge of the detail. The Minute Men lined up in South Station and saluted Mr Griffith on his arrival, and Mr Griffith shook hands with all and urged them to be his guests at the opening of the film play tonight. Many of the men who greeted him had taken part in the film when scenes were shot in Lexington last Fall.

Works Hard for Perfection

At the hotel Mr Griffith said he did not know when he should return to New York, but planned to remain in Boston long enough to see that the picture is shown properly.

Mr Griffith is the one producer who edits his films after their first New York showing. Sometimes a photoplay is not perfected by him until after it has been shown to the public for weeks. He is always seeing something that should be cut, or edited, and he is never satisfied until a film is as nearly perfect as he can make it. The musical score is as important as the film in his eyes, and he plans to spend all day going over the music for tonight's opening.

"I never eat or sleep more than four or five hours a day during the filming of a picture," said Mr Griffith, whose unusual energy is a source of wonder to the rest of the motion picture profession.

"The less I eat during the making of a film the better the picture and the more time I can spend on it," he said.

"Almost Starves Himself"

Miss Carol Dempster told of Mr Griffith's frugal meals during his work on "America." "It is perfectly true," she told the Globe reporter. "In the morning all he takes at the studio is a cup of black coffee. At noon he orders a couple of boiled eggs, and at night he orders a small dinner and then never eats more than a few bites.

"When the studio chef cooks something that Mr Griffith actually eats he feels as proud as a peacock over his achievement. But often it doesn't happen more than once a week. The rest of the time Mr Griffith practically starves himself."

Mr Griffith's eyes glowed as he discussed his film. "It is the best picture I ever made," he said, "and that is the first time you have ever heard me say that, and you've interviewed me a lot.

"I consider that this is even more important than "The Birth of a Nation." I wish that I had not used that title before, because it is more expressive of this photoplay than the one which I made first. It would have been better if 'The Birth of a Nation' had been saved for 'America,' and the original picture been called 'The Preservation of a Nation.'

She Made All Audience Weep

"I have not attempted to tell the story of the Revolution in my new film, but I have tried to show the spirit of sacrifice which made America possible. I have portrayed the causes of the Revolution but I have been very careful not to offend or show the horrible side of the war. Do you know that the English Government paid £20 to the Indians for every American scalp they turned in? That is only one of the things that might have been used in the picture, but which I left out."

Speaking of Miss Dempster, Mr Griffith said: "At last she has learned to act. In her former pictures Miss Dempster photographed beautifully but did not do any really fine acting. But when I heard a whole New York audience weep audibly when the scene showing her grief at her brother's death was shown on the screen I realized that at last she had become an actress."

The producer refused to discuss his future plans. "I eat, dream and think of 'America' constantly and I have no desire to think of the future until this latest and favorite child of mine is fully matured," he said.

Mr Griffith made "America" at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution. He began actual work on the film last June, although he had done research work for some years on the project.

Griffith Backs All on New Picture

"I'm ready to stand or fall with 'America,' David W. Griffith told a Telegram reporter today. He arrived here late yesterday with his party from New York for the opening performance of his screen masterpiece. The premiere it tonight at the Majestic theatre and a large number of prominent officials and persons of social importance have promised to be in attendance.

"'America' is the best thing I have ever done for the pictures," he said. "It has cost me over a million dollars and if it doesn't go—well I'm through, that's all. It is the best work I can do. It has taken months of time and the labor of a huge cast of star actors. It is historically correct to the last shoestring—almost literally. It has involved the building of enormous sets and the handling of big mobs. We have worked very hard on 'America' and I hope it goes well in Boston."

DAVID W. GRIFFITH

With Mr. Griffith are Mrs. Albert Gray, Miss Carol Dempster and Albert Pell. Mr. Griffith will be in Boston over the week-end.

"My pictures have gone well in Boston," he continued, "and Boston has been very kind to me. Boston people will like the picture, I'm sure, because so much of it is intimately connected with the city's history."

"I have tried," he said, "not to make an exageratedly sentimental ancestors really suffered and to point out that we ought to be grateful to them for the hardships they endured and the institutions they have built up. 'America' is a picture for Americans and has no propaganda, no message to put across other than that of plain, straight Americanism."

Portland Ore Oregonian March 2/24

D. W. Griffith's new [illegible] revolutionary [illegible] ture, which opened February 21 [illegible] the Forty-fourth-street theater. It will be officially called "America, Series One—The Sacrifice."

This is done to avoid confusion as to the theme, since the [illegible] story Mr. Griffith has produced [illegible] which Americans made to establish their independence.

Mr. Griffith hoped to make this the first of a series of elaborate pictures portraying the dramatic history of [illegible]

Fairfield (Iowa) Ledger March 1 1924

Represents Iowa in Great Photoplay

By FREDERICK ROCHE

SELECTED in preference to a score of titled applicants, Miss Zinita Graf, a native of Fayette, Iowa, will represent her native State and portray the role of a court dame of King George Third in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, which D. W. Griffith has just completed for the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Miss Graf was selected by Sir Percy Sykes, of London, Eng., formerly commander in chief of the British forces in Persia, who has been thrice presented at the Court of St. James, as well as at the Persian court and those of India, and is regarded as an authority on court ceremonies, and by David Wark Griffith, the noted film producer.

She is a graduate of Upper Iowa University, and of the Emerson School of Oratory. A member of F. G. Chapter, P. E. O., (Fayette) and of G. Chapter Z. Ph. E. (Des Moines), she has been active in sorority life. For several seasons she was leading woman with the Clifford Devereux company, touring the West and South. Her appearance in the colossal Griffith film, which had its world premiere at the Forty-Fourth Street Theatre, New York, on February 21, marked her debut in pictures.

Miss Zinita Graf, Iowa girl, as a court lady of King George Third in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, recently completed for the D. A. R.

A duchess, three countesses, and numerous "Ladies" of European title were among the applicants for the role given Miss Graf, that of a duchess at the royal court of King George Third. As practically everyone taking part in the film is of American revolutionary extraction, however, Griffith preferred to have an American girl in the role.

"America," tells in dramatic form of the early struggles of this country for freedom, and is intended by the D. A. R. to be one of the big features of the ten-year celebration of the sesquicentennial of the Revolution. In making the picture, in which hundreds of Revolutionary descendants appear, Griffith has enjoyed the aid of leading historians and patriotic societies, which aided in the difficult research work, and also provided invaluable relics as properties, and of the United States Army, several units of which, costumed and made up as British grenadiers, Indians, Minutemen and members of the Colonial Army, took part in the massive battle scenes.

Boston Herald March 6 1924 — Fall River (Mass) Herald 3/5/24

"BEST BRAINS" TO PRODUCE PICTURES

Griffith, in Boston, Sees Rosy Future for Screen

David Wark Griffith, the modern Goliath of motion-picturedom, sees great things ahead for the silver screen.

An instrument for making people think and see, and yet with entertaining qualities, the product of the best brains in the land and forming part and parcel of the larger cities, expressing their individuality, culture and soul—that is what Mr. Griffith sees for the motion picture 10 or 15 years hence.

Mr. Griffith, who is in Boston for the opening of his newest production, "America," at the Majestic tonight, visualized this rosy future during an interview at the Hotel Touraine yesterday afternoon.

"Ten or 15 years from now," said Mr. Griffith, "moving pictures will be quite different from what they are now, both in form and substance and their production.

"They will be the product of the best minds of the country and, being concerned with thought, they will give people something to think about, something to make them want to improve society. There will be none of these pictures like 'Why Boys Leave Home,' or 'The Scarlet Sin,' which we are trying to get away from now and have succeeded in doing to a certain extent. Of course there will always have to be a few light frivolous pictures for amusement only.

"Then, too, the studios will not be set apart to always place the lens and camera behind the light and weather conditions are best for photography. They will be built in the large cities and located in the most beautiful part of the country, so that the surroundings and the atmosphere will express the individuality of a community.

"A producer would not think of attempting to do his work in a dingy place, he should be in a place where the beauty surrounded to transmit the beauty of people, whether in the realm of action."

Mr. Griffith said that Mary Pickford was his first protégée, and that she was the greatest of all his stars. He said that he feels safe in saying that "Neil Hamilton" is going to be the most popular man in the movies in a short time. This young actor plays the leading male part in the new picture.

"Well," said the man who doesn't believe in the present system of high-priced stars, "this is a great welcome, but really, the stars I have made are much more impressive than I am. Any one of them makes 10 times as much money as I am able to earn. Everything I make in one picture I put in the vaults to help finance it.

"There isn't any money in being a moving picture director and producer of the type I am. I put all the money into the picture itself." He added, saying that accounts for the fact that no longer are such names as "Mary Pickford," his first and great find, and the galaxy of other well-known stars associated with David Wark Griffith.

Medford (Mass) Mercury March 11 1924

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

D.W. Griffith Picture Of 'America' Realistic

By MAURICE HENLE.
NEA Service Writer.

NEW YORK, Feb. 4.—D. W. Griffith brought his long, awaited picture, "America—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theater a few night ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy whimsical will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith shows his camera up the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church, the lamp as many soldiers as possible on their way (illegible)

It is (illegible) and Paul Revere waiting for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Then the lurking figure of a man who has been hiding in the far-off darkened (illegible)

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer has seen on a screen. We hear (illegible) the hoofs of horses (illegible)

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

Boston (Mass) Traveler March 6 1924

Carol Dempster Returns to Boston for Griffith Opening

YD

"My! What a lot of fires you have in Boston!" exclaimed Carol Dempster, as the fifth fire engine clanged by the hotel yesterday evening.

"Fire! They must be all going to the same one!" cried the reporter, coming to life suddenly.

"Six seven—" counted the movie star, throwing open the window and leaning out at a risky angle—"Oh, Boy! What's it?"

And before the eighth fire engine had a chance to speed by we were all jammed into a taxi careening down Summer street.

The fire was not, one must admit, as spectacular as a movie fire. It was more thrilling, being real, but by the time we arrived after the third alarm it was more the standing in cold outside a movie theatre, when there were dozens of fire engines, quantities of smoke and at least a million people there before us. But a flue of the million who couldn't get anything through the smoke might have made—Boy of Boy—some interesting movie film. Anything seemed to be there from the fire department down to a little boy's dog (illegible)

That's Carol Dempster.

THE CHURCH PUT UP

(illegible)

THE CHURCH FIRST

(illegible)

Taunton (Mass) Gazette 3/6/24 — My Review 3/8/24

GAZETTE MOVIETORIUM

By MAURICE HENLE
(N. E. A. Service Writer.)

NEW YORK, March 4.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth St. Theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith shows his camera up the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many soldiers as possible on their way [illegible])

It is (illegible) and Paul Revere waiting for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Then the lurking figure of a man who has been hiding in the far-off darkened (illegible)

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer has seen on a screen. We hear (illegible) the hoofs of horses (illegible)

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

CAROL DEMPSTER

The Photodrama Review

Columbus (O) Citizen March 11 1924 — Detroit News March 11 1924

NEW YORK EVENING JOURNAL • America's Greatest Evening Newspaper • THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1924

Thrills Come Thick and Fast in "America," Says Fay King

By FAY KING.

Talk about thrills!!!—they come thick and fast in D. W. Griffith's "America," now showing at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre!

This is series one, called "The Sacrifice," and Robert W. Chambers has woven a sweet love story through the facts that form the foundation of our country's history!

Not for an instant does the interest lag, and there are just enough close-ups to balance the long shots, so that you have an intimate picture as well as a spectacular one.

The acme of the action is reached when Paul Revere again rides that famous midnight ride—calling the people to arms, and I became almost hysterical with the reality of the historical event.

That horse oughta have his name on the programme! The way he takes fences and hedges and fallen trees—well, it just makes your heart jazz!

Every American oughta see "America"!—to better appreciate the real cost of our country!

I was never very good at history in school!

The battles drawn out with dotted lines on the chalked blackboard map didn't mean nearly as much to me as they should have! I realize that now!

Just imagine seeing George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, Paul Revere, the Chief of the Mohawks, and oodles of others actually before you, true to life and to their place in the history of these United States!

It's the thrill of a lifetime!!!

By all means, don't miss it!!!

There are tears and cheers for every inch of film.

The heart interest in our own history runs rich and red, and your whole being will tingle with pride when you see the Minute Men marching to victory or death!

It is the story of sacrifice for freedom, and after seeing "America" every American will love America more!!!!

The music that accompanies the story is as thrilling and inspiring as the picture itself!

During the thick of battle, how you love to hear "Yankee Doodle"!

It is a pretty romance that runs through the picture, and Carol Dempster makes a gentle, wistful Nancy!

Three cheers for "America"!!!!

National is to be complimented for providing so excellent a cast.

Made in America.

FORTY-FOURTH STREET THEATER—"America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice." Story and titles by Robert W. Chambers; directed by David W. Griffith.

THE CAST.

Nathan Holden.....Neil Hamilton
Miss Nancy Montague...Carol Dempster
Justice Montague.....Erville Alderson
Charles P. E. Montague.Charles E. Mack
Patrick Henry.....Frank McGlynn Jr.
King George III.....Arthur Donaldson
George Washington.....Arthur Dewey
Capt. Walter Butler...Lionel Barrymore
Paul Revere.....Harry O'Neill
Captain Hare.....Louis Wolheim
Joseph Brant.....Riley Hatch

EGAD, Mr. Griffith, but what a picture you've made, sir!"

That's what we wanted to say to the peer of all the directors in filmdom last Thursday night at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, where "America" was given its metropolitan premiere. But there were so many other enthusiastic admirers of the great D. W. ahead of us that we never got the chance. However, as Sir Philip Gibbs says, now it can be told.

In "America"—the complete title is "America—Series One, The Sacrifice"—Mr. Griffith has borrowed high spots from the pages of our early American history and he has paid us back in romance. Not the romance common to the screen or the stage, but the romance of the foundation of these United States. He has given us something to remind us—after 150 years—of the debt we owe those Yankee rebels of 1776 who died that we might live—Americans. He has created a new pride of country—rekindled the patriotism of a nation. Griffith has captured the spirit of America!

The new film at the 44th Street Theater is without a doubt the masterpiece of D. W. Griffith's directorial career. It is more thrilling than his "Way Down East," more stupendous than "The Birth of a Nation," which was produced more than 10 years ago and is still drawing capacity audiences wherever it is shown. The famous ride of Paul Revere, so masterfully reproduced in this latest and greatest Griffith achievement, rivals that of the Klansmen in "The Birth." Calloused first nighters and blase critics of the cinema stood up and cheered—really cheered—when Paul, astride his charger, thundered down a strip of moonlit road to warn the Minute Men of Lexington and Concord that the British were coming. "One if by land, two if by sea"—two lights had burned in the tower of Old North Church that night and Revere had ridden well. There are other scenes equally stirring, depicting the privations and hardships suffered by Washington's ragged and starved troops at Valley Forge, the brave stand against General Gage's redskin horde at Fort Sacrifice, the battle of Bunker Hill, at Concord where the shot was fired that was heard around the world, and still others too numerous to mention.

There is a marked authenticity about each chapter of this picturization of the birth of our nation that adds educational as well as inspirational value to "America." All of the nation, save, of course, that which has to do with the delightful romance that is so deliciously threaded throughout, is based upon historical incidents. Griffith has made use of no dramatic conveniences in the building up of these powerful photodramas.

The cast is one of the finest that has ever been assembled. Neil Hamilton and Carol Dempster, as Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, play the leading roles, and it is quite evident that Griffith has brought out the best that these two players have to offer. Of the two the greatest honors go to Hamilton. He is the latest Griffith find. One of the outstanding performances in the production is that of Charles Emmett Mack, who portrays Charles Montague, town dandy and the best shot and swordsman in the Colonies. Great things may be expected of Mack should he remain under the Griffith banner for another year or two. Lionel Barrymore is the bold, bad "heavy" of the film in the role of Captain Walter Butler, a soldier of the King. Whatever villainy Barrymore might have overlooked in the part is supplied by the renegade Captain Hare, a part that is excellently handled by Louis Wolheim.

One may trot out all the superlatives he has at his call and yet he wouldn't have half enough to describe the wonders of this new film—"America." Griffith has done it again! And when it is possible to make better pictures than the one at the 44th Street D. W. Griffith will make them.

"The Hunchback of Notre Dame" will be continued for another week at the Manhattan Strand Theater.

"Scaramouche," the Rex Ingram production at the Capitol Theater, remains for a second week.

"Shadows of Paris," with Pola Negri, moved from the Rivoli to the Rialto Theater yesterday, and will remain for another seven days showing.

Screen Mirror Feb 23 1924

Picture Play Apr. 1924

New Yorker Staats Zeitung Mittwoch den 27 Februar 1924

General Washington Visits His Soldiers at Their Campfire, at Dawn

The D. W. Griffith production, which had its premiere this week, has been titled "America, Series One—The Sacrifice." Others will follow in this series, made by the famous director for the Daughters of the American Revolution. Above, we see General Washington, visiting his tattered soldiers, at their campfire, at dawn. Arthur Dewey, is seen as "General Washington", while Carol Dempster and Lionel Barrymore are in the cast.

Screen Mirror 4/18

Hot Stuff for Next Summer

For years past motion-picture producers have busied themselves during the winter months shooting pictures whose setting was the frozen North. Endless vistas of snow and ice were looked upon as great box-office attractions for the sultry summer months. It looks as though this would all be changed next summer, for up until the middle of January, when production schedules for the coming summer were pretty well under way, there wasn't enough snow to support even one picture.

Consider the plight of certain directors who were making pictures that simply demanded snow and lots of it. There was D. W. Griffith, for instance, who had counted on having snow at Valley Forge, where he expected to stage many spectacular scenes for "America." He also wanted great cakes of ice in the Delaware River so as to film Washington's crossing with historical accuracy. Other years he would have had snow and ice and plenty of it, but this was an open winter and in place of snow there were tiny shoots of green grass and budded plants. Northward from New York his location scouts went and they even telegraphed to various points in Canada, but the reports came back that instead of ice cakes there were ducks floating on the rivers. Perhaps, in order to finish his picture on schedule time, Mr. Griffith will be forced to cut out these scenes altogether. Or, perhaps he will emulate the promoters of the Westchester Winter Sports Carnival and ship loads of snow down from the Adirondacks.

Mr. Griffith's difficulties are no worse than William de Mille's. He has been filming "Icebound," the Pulitzer prize play whose action will take place in a New England town that is mantled in snow and ice. It wasn't easy enough to find a town like the one described, but some of them are having any concentration this winter.

Mr. Griffith and Mr. de Mille would be readily forgiven if they changed the locale of these strictly New England pictures to the Alps or the Himalayas.

Theatre Magazine (Type) March 1924

DAILY MOVIE SERVICE

DREAMY D. W. GRIFFITH COMES FORTH WITH REALISTIC FILM OF "AMERICA"

BY MAURICE HENLE
NEA Movie Writer

WEATHER WAS RELENTLESS AND HAMPERED THE SNOW STORM BE REMADE

„Amerika".

Warum der Griffith-Film eine Errungenschaft ist.

„In Verbindung mit den Indianern führten die Soldaten des Königs George rücksichtslosen Krieg gegen die wehrlosen Einwohner, und verübten schreckliche Grausamkeiten. Kapitän Butler befahl seinen Leuten: „Vernichtet diese amerikanischen Wölfe, verschont nicht einen, denn aus den kleinen Wölfen werden große." Zur Ausführung dieses brutalen Befehls verkleideten sich die britischen Soldaten als Indianer, damit sie die Bestialitäten vollführen konnten, deren sie sich als Weiße schämen mußten.

Herr Griffith trägt diese Greuelbilder mit Behagen vor auf, mit demselben Behagen, mit dem die Hirtfelsch deutsche Propaganda und amerikanischen Schulbücher aufgetragen will. Er malt die Grausamkeiten Heldenmut und führt so edel, daß Schwache nicht sie übersehen können, aber ihr Gemüth kann Ihnen Ihre Grausamkeiten nicht verzeihen. Die Zeichnung des Amerikaners ist freilich auf das Studium von Robert W. Chambers gestützt, der in Bezug auf Stoffe und Stoffen in Bezug auf Stoffe historisch ist. Chambers auf Ihre Stoffe über die Amerikaner geschrieben, interessant in diesen Bemerkungen „Amerikaner", und hier sich Georgens gegen die Engländer bei Bisher Stoffen die Stoffen unterstützt. Es war auf Stoffen, und in den Stoffen die Stoffen ein auf die Engländer in englischen Stoffen, Stoffen und Stoffen und Stoffen und Stoffen.

Und in die Stoffen auf die Stoffen und auf Stoffen Stoffen. Das auf die Stoffen „Stoffen" in Stoffen Stoffen. Die Stoffen auf die Stoffen Stoffen, Stoffen in Stoffen Stoffen Stoffen

Boston Post March 7 1924

Boston Mass Traveler March 7

GRIFFITH AGAIN SETS ALIGHT THE SACRIFICIAL FIRE

ON "AMERICA" HE FOCUSES HIS CAMERA

The Stirring Days of '76 as Background for a Love-Tale in His Own Manner—Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill in Rousing Re-Creation — Alarums and Affrays in Cherry Valley—Choppy Pictorial Idiom, Wavering View-point—Paul Revere as Thrill Outstanding

A PURPOSE of long standing in the mind of David Wark Griffith has been gratified. For a number of years the most securely established—if not the greatest—of American directors has had it in the back of his head to depict on the screen the ardors and the sacrifices of the days of '76. Upon several occasions, notably during visits to historic Boston, he has spoken guardedly of his plans. Two and three times he seemed ready to begin work upon the project, and as often some other task prevented. Either he had just completed an historical spectacle of another period, or felt the need of recouping by an unambitious but profitable film losses incurred in the making of a more elaborate one; or, may be, was in a quandary to select from a wealth of picturesque colonial material those incidents which would best weave themselves into a picture-play. At any rate, his resolution has at last found outlet, as "America," now installed at the Majestic Theatre, will bear witness.

"America" comes close to being precisely what the attentive follower of Mr. Griffith's work might have expected him to do. That is to say, it consists of one part carefully reconstructed historical incident and background to two parts romantic glamour and sentimental interlude. The varied components of the whole are mixed with a painstaking hand; the pictorial narrative is couched in Mr. Griffith's own unmistakable idiom; and the finished product is topped off with just such a moralizing quirk as previous acquaintance with the director's style would lead one to anticipate.

The historical backbone of "America" is, of course, the American Revolution. The resentment of Massachusetts folk at what they held to be unwarranted taxation; the ride of Paul Revere; the gathering of the Minute Men; the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill lend scope to the earlier reels. The latter half of the picture revolves round skirmishes and massacres on the frontier in upper New York. There, where peril by Indian marauders was added to peril at the hands of the least responsible of the British forces on this continent, the shadows of conflict were blackest and the high lights of patriotic fervor consequently brightest. And there Mr. Griffith, and his collaborator in the matter of story-telling, Robert W. Chambers, found it most convenient to terminate their romantic narrative. Such a termination, to be sure, somewhat throws the closing sequences of the film out of focus with what precedes. Mr. Griffith has been at pains to assemble items of primary historical importance for the first part of "America." He has introduced Samuel Adams, John Hancock, George III., the elder Pitt, Jefferson, Patrick Henry. He has concentrated attention upon military engagements which were vital to the first phase of the Revolution. But the passing mention of Princeton and Yorktown, and the total omission of any reference to operations round Long Island, the Jersey coast, Vermont, Saratoga, or the Carolinas, mark an abrupt shift in the point of view, a shift which—however cleverly contrived—leads the unwary spectator to make certain quite unsubstantial historical judgments.

Mr. Griffith and Mr. Chambers have mustered a narrative little better than trivial to carry interest along. A Northern dispatch rider and the daughter of a Southern justice are their principal puppets. The boy shares the fortunes of the Minute Men and the Continental Army. The lady of his choice and her father begin with royalist sympathies; end by being firm adherents of revolt. Captain Walter Butler is the rather conventional "heavy" of the story; he covets the heroine until one of his own men shoots him from ambush. Such plot-development as there is, before news of Cornwallis's surrender sends the lovers scurrying into one another's arms leans solidly upon those basic elements of movie melodrama; the girl, the gun and the chase. Once more Mr. Griffith has relied upon the galloping horsemen to reach the scene of rescue in time; they have failed him no more than usual. Sub-titles by Mr. Chambers do nothing to maintain suspense. Too often they only summarize in advance the course of the action.

Mr. Griffith is always himself reflected in his players. Like almost every other director of note he dominates his cast; infuses his purpose into their every gesture and expression, and allows nothing foreign to his purpose to reach the screen. This holds true in "America." The acting is of uniform, thoroughly schooled excellence. Neil Hamilton, Erville Alderson, Miss Carol Dempster, Charles Emmett Mack, Lionel Barrymore, Louis Wolheim and Riley Hatch are readily malleable to his touch.

But the real dramatic power in "America"—and there is a truly considerable measure of it—resides in those scenes which have the least organic connection with the plot. Paul Revere's ride is a crashing bit of filming, knowingly cut and joined, pictorially evocative, faithful to the spirit of the Patriot's Day legend as revived and freshly documented some half century ago and since then enthusiastically rehearsed in every public school. The ride works up a thrilling crescendo, and merges smoothly into realistic scenes of fighting on Lexington Common and by the "rude" bridge. The sequence setting forth the Battle of Bunker Hill is equally stirring. The successive waves of attack, the disputed fosse and breastworks, the ultimate retreat after ammunition had failed the colonists, are noteworthy for clearness of content as well as for the effectively composed scenes which go to make it up. Glimpses of the sufferings at Valley Forge are likewise effective. One or two long shots of the pillaging troops in Cherry Valley give Mr. Griffith an opportunity to experiment with files and compact bodies of men moving rapidly in a number of directions simultaneously or fanning out swiftly over the countryside. In these views he turned several surprisingly brilliant studies in balancing violent motions of varying intensities. Several scenes of action at Johnson Hall will remain long in memory for the swirling composition which Mr. Griffith wrought when he sent Morgan's Raiders through a flank attack.

But against these vivid and soundly constructed scenes must be balanced a number in which the director was not at his best. Mr. Griffith—or his photographic staff—has a way of clouding all the corners of his frame with a gentle haze which leaves only a circle at the centre of his composition quite in focus. This trick is effective if not over-stressed; but beyond bounds it becomes one of those annoying methods of prettification which impair dramatic significance. A more radical fault in Mr. Griffith's work—from at least one spectator's standpoint—is the result, presumably, of his eternal pains to patch and shape, repatch and reshape his film after completion, seemingly without reference to any definite cutting script. He rarely screens a finished sequence as that word is now understood in the studios. His picture falls into no logical sub-divisions. His individual shots seem assembled jack-straw fashion, cut for what they will stand, and joined without much attention to pictorial form. And his flash-backs are innumerable and most disconcerting. The first five hundred feet of "America" contains more virtually unrelated jottings, strung loosely together than any similar bit of cinematic exposition which comes readily to mind. In these respects Mr. Griffith is today alone among directors of his standing; his work belongs to an older school of film narrative—one which is already passing.

The educational value of "America" is an uncertain quantity. Much of the film has been worked out with due reference to reliable sources. Mr. John Fell, who had a hand in "Down to the Sea in Ships," is credited with having written the "historical arrangement," and in so far as his efforts were expended upon the first half of the picture they were distinctly worth while. It is doubtful if the impressionable school-boy who may see "America" will soon again discover so vivid a visualization of the opening days of actual combat. And, the value of "America" as propaganda is limitless. It never for a moment suggests that the affection of any foreign national for his own flag may be as laudable a passion as the respect of an American for his. And it affirms and reaffirms, by sub-title and by implication, that this is the greatest country, not only of the present time, but of all time. These are sound precepts to be drilled into the youth of our land, especially in these days when the flow of oil hardly smooths the murmur of troubled waters. D. W. B.

"A Shape in the Moonlight, a Bulk in the Dark"

Paul Revere's Ride

Not the Least of Mr. Griffith's Moments in His New Film, "America"

"FIRST IN WAR, FIRST IN PEACE—

Arthur Dewey as General Washington in "America."

Griffith's 'America' Opens at the Majestic Theatre

D. W. Griffith set himself a prodigious task in filming the story of the revolutionary war for his new picture, "America," which opened at the Majestic Theatre last night.

The main features of the revolution are so thoroughly and vividly presented from the earliest days of school that every one knows them. No movie producer could fool us on them.

When it comes to picturing them, however, there is such a tremendous amount of stirring, dramatic, vital material in the history of the revolution that no picture of acceptable length could show it all. Not in one evening, at least.

And so Griffith has been obliged to pick from this wealth of material enough to suggest the whole, and yet a pitiably small amount, in order to have any sort of a story hold together. He has made a fine beginning, from the point of view of the historians; a better ending, according to the dramatists. For the first half is mainly episodic, presenting page after page of history, whereas the last part of the picture grasps the story by the horns, as it were, and presents it in a strong, well-knit crescendo of interest that makes even the "final clinch," the surrender at Yorktown and Washington's inauguration, seem anticlimax.

BOSTON TO VIRGINIA

If the film gets under way slowly, it is because Griffith is interweaving his themes, contrasting his efforts, with a certain sharp thoroughness. He shows the rugged countryside of Lexington, the gracious acres of a Virginia estate. He shows the patriotic Bostonians, led by Samuel Adams and John Hancock to rebel against British tyranny, and he shows the Virginia House of Burgesses, fired by Patrick Henry and by Washington. And to bind these together, he shows the young dispatch-bearer, Nathan Holden, who in the course of his trips South has fallen in love with a Virginia belle, Nancy Montague.

THE "MIDNIGHT RIDE"

Then comes the time when the British learn of the ammunition stored in Concord. The patriots, not to be outdone, go through the familiar rites of sending the lanterns in the Old North Church that blazes Paul Revere off on his famous ride. And what a ride it is! By country roads, through fields, over stonewalls, over ditches, by starlight and by brightest moonlight, to warn of the redcoats coming.

And the battle that follows—the marching at Lexington Green, the command to "Disperse, ye rebels!" which was not heeded, the unhurried farmers making their leisurely stand at Concord bridge, and the glorious rout of the British troops by the Minute Men, is a story to warm Boston's heart. The close scenes have made their way to our city, Concord and Lexington and old North Church and Concord bridge are as a great day back in our history. We know the spirit of Lexington and Concord.

VALLEY FORGE

The scene at Valley Forge is as moving as any in the picture. Washington's men are ragged, starving, and cold. Washington himself is a great figure, and Griffith has made him so. We see the suffering of the men, we see the faithfulness of Washington, we see the coming of the relief, we see the final saving of the fort by Morgan's men in thrilling indeed.

THE SACRIFICES

In "America," Griffith has accentuated the sacrifices that were necessary—not only sacrifices of life but of love, of comfort and security and of everything but a great ideal. In doing so, he has aimed more than ever at the heart. His aim is good. [illegible] may recognize this all along. [illegible] and scoff at sentiment, [illegible] Griffith will get you [illegible] Inc; as [illegible] Gloucester for everyone. [illegible] W. Simpson [illegible] ich in Griffith's picture [illegible] spectacle, sentiment, [illegible] Feb 2ary, glamor, excitement [illegible] Edgar Ralph even humor, and [illegible] at Southgraphy, capable acting [illegible] wit, as of amazing direction [illegible] It must be admitted [illegible] Coal Co still occasional crudeness [illegible] Philadelphia picture as well, but [illegible] doubt be trimmed out in [illegible] Mr. Griffith, as every [illegible] believes in continuing to [illegible] Everest picture for some time [illegible] Inc. shown to the public [illegible] Philadelphia are now for that purpose [illegible]

WELL CHOSEN

[illegible] choice of characters is [illegible] good. There is not a face [illegible] there that might not have [illegible] these happenings of 150 [illegible] And the celebrities are [illegible] Patrick Henry is capital. So [illegible] Thomas Jefferson, Samuel [illegible] King George III., John [illegible] captain of the Minute Men; [illegible] are and all of them. Arthur [illegible] seems slightly overcome by [illegible] of portraying George [illegible] ston.

[illegible] Dempster is beautiful and [illegible] as Nancy, doing by far her [illegible] so far. It is good to see [illegible] her emotional scenes she is [illegible] ing the mannerisms of other [illegible] trained stars—Lillian Gish, [illegible] arch and the others so frequently use the same methods. In [illegible] she is acquiring a technique [illegible] own, and a most effective [illegible]

A NEW HERO

[illegible] hero is Neil Hamilton, who [illegible] prophesies is going to be [illegible] Valentino. He is certainly [illegible] looking boy, and at times [illegible] great spirit, as in the battle [illegible]

[illegible] Emmett Mack came in for [illegible] part than is usually his lot. [illegible] the heroine's foolish [illegible] lover, brought up to the strict [illegible] tradition, but finally casting [illegible] against the King's orders [illegible] stupendous circumstances at Bunker [illegible] It is quite a characterization.

THE HEARTLESS VILLAIN

[illegible] to be overlooked is Lionel [illegible] who plays that wonderful [illegible] to a man to cause fear to [illegible] Captain. He adds complete [illegible] gets over all the more [illegible] the idea of heartless cruelty [illegible] and to human form [illegible] all cases. And he does [illegible] lively to Louis Wolheim [illegible] with the air of a [illegible] to his character [illegible] Wolheim [illegible] Revere's [illegible]

Boston Morning Globe March 8 1924

Boston Mass Traveler March 7 1924

PAUL REVERE'S RIDE GIVES THRILLS

Boston Sunday Herald March 2 1924

WINSOME HEROINE OF NEW FILM

Carol Dempster, Who Plays the Part of Nancy Montague, a Girl Who Faces Patriot in Revolutionary Days.

'AMERICA' AN EPIC OF FILMED DRAMA

Griffith's Great Picture Opens at Majestic

Boston Sunday Herald March 2 1924

Wins New Triumph

CARROL DEMPSTER

As a "Sweetie" Girl of the Revolutionary War, now being shown at Majestic Theatre.

'AMERICA' IS VIVID FILM OF REVOLUTION

Boston Morning Globe 3/7/24

"AMERICA" SCORES BOSTON TRIUMPH

Great Film Animated by Spirit of Freedom

Members of Patriotic Societies Vie With Each in Enthusiasm

[illegible] in the picturesque uniform of the Lexington Minutemen, pinned the official membership button of the organization on Griffith's coat, amid the wild cheering of the audience.

The ceremony was performed in the box occupied by the Lexington men immediately after Griffith, in response to repeated insistent demands, had made a brief speech at the finale. The young producer was tendered a tremendous ovation.

Mr. Chambers wrote the story of "America," he announced. The scenario is by Mr. Harvey Gates and there was in charge the great Griffith was assisted by the author of the scenario and Mr. Gates in the job of the scenario.

Paul Revere's ride, the [illegible] Lexington, the battle of Concord and Bunker Hill and the coming of the British.

Throughout the film runs the story of [illegible] Patrick Henry, Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Adams, Mr. Hancock, George III, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Washington, Mr. Lafayette, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Burgoyne, Mr. Clinton, Mr. Cornwallis, Mr. Butler, Mr. Morgan

Boston (Mass) Post March 8 1924 Boston American Boston (Mass) March 8 1924 Post 3/8/24

IN TEARS AFTER HER FIRST KISS

Carol Dempster Never Given Chaste Salute Until She Played With Barthelmess in Movies

CAROL DEMPSTER IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"
Miss Dempster is the great moving picture producer's latest star. She is shown here in her "Duckie" hat, just a little white duck for trimming on a black felt.

Carol Dempster was never kissed until she went into the movies, and this first kiss was given her by Richard Barthelmess. The feminine star of "America" made this confession for the first time last night. She frankly declares that of all movie ordeals the "screen kiss," although only a "screen kiss," is her most embarrassing experience.

KISSES STILL SCARE HER

She explains that Richard Barthelmess was directed by D. W. Griffith to kiss her for a "close-up," and to the amusement of a half hundred spectators she burst into tears. This was two years ago, and despite the fact that she has had quite a few screen kisses since, she claims they still frighten her.

"I suppose everyone will say that I am just making this statement to be different, but it is true. Ask Richard Barthelmess, Mr. Griffith; they can tell you. It is all right to act before five thousand and hundreds of people, but to register emotion, to kiss, to cry, hard work, well, for me it was terrifying.

"Yes, I cried before it happened when I found out that my part called for kissing, and I cried afterwards." Miss Dempster's great training was good enough.

"No, I don't see any more now, only when the camera calls for tears, but, unfortunately, the film and Richard Barthelmess didn't call for tears about the kiss. I guess I just had crossed signals instead, and I cried that I'd to have a great deal to have an embarrassing moment. The pictures which make me have to think in the future, they don't bother me. I guess that I am just like all the children of the world, I want to be good, I want to be a good girl, I want to be a good woman, I want to be a good mother, I want to be a good wife. The pictures are planned to change the public strongly, because if she fails, Miss Dempster might pick up the pieces of her career and start building great dramatic roles for herself. Miss Dempster is the representative of all the young actresses who

Devoted to the Work

"Yes, we have made this for you." Miss Dempster [illegible] "America." Lionel doesn't actually kiss me. His lips never touched mine. It is just the idea of expressing this emotion that troubles me. You see, I am naturally self-conscious. That's what Mr. Griffith taught me to overcome to forget that I was Carol Dempster.

Thinking Only of Art

"Perhaps, I ought not to tell these movie secrets. However, I don't think there is any great harm done. After all, if a girl is so fortunate as to become a Griffith prospect, she isn't thinking about movie thrills. She is thinking about Mr. Griffith's art.

This remark gave the reporter an opportunity to ask a very pertinent question. Mr. Griffith had been quoted the day before as saying he didn't know how long he would be able to retain Miss Dempster now that she was merging into the "star" class. It is against the policy of the man who made Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Rodolph Valentino, etc., to keep high priced stars on his staff.

Not to Leave Griffith

"Am I going to leave Mr. Griffith? Well, I should say not. I am going to stay with him as long as he has work for me. I hope some day it may be said that Carol Dempster was the star that remained a Griffith star. If that can be said of me, I shall feel truly rewarded," she answered, saying that she does not believe she has "arrived." In "America," she feels she has a great part, but she modestly protests after all she is just one of the actors who took part in the production.

"Yes, I have been offered some fine roles as great from other companies as the chance is coming, but to me it means more than money to be able to be in a Griffith picture.

"The success was plotted to change the public strongly, because if she fails, Miss Dempster might pick up the pieces of her career and start building great dramatic roles for herself. Miss Dempster is the representative of all the young actresses who

Boston Herald
American 3/8/24

GRIFFITH HONORED BY MINUTE MEN

Wins New Triumph

CARROL DEMPSTER
Star in "America" film of the Revolutionary War now being shown at Majestic Theatre.

'AMERICA' IS VIVID FILM OF REVOLUTION

Had D. W. Griffith taken for his theme some gripping tale out of the world's immortal fiction, he would have done well enough; that he should succeed so admirably with "America" at the Majestic last evening, the story of his own country, places him in line for deep gratitude in addition to warmest praise.

For this is the story of the birth of America, not opaque and abstract as in a school book, but so vivid and touching that again and again the audience wept unrestrainedly—at the naked feet of soldiers tracking blood on the snow of Valley Forge; at the stricken patriot lad rolling a keg of powder in the face of a rain of musketry; at the birth of the flag—the list is endless.

CLEVERLY WOVEN TALE.

Robert W. Chambers, the author, has cleverly woven into the stirring events of the Revolution the romance of Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, and told how, through the brave death of her brother, and the final conversion of her father to the patriots' cause they came to their happiness.

Holden, a young patriot, carries despatches to Virginia, and falls in love with the pretty Tory, Mistress Montague. The Montagues later arrive in the North in time to witness the massacre at Lexington, and young Charles Montague, hitherto a Tory fop, is moved by the sight to join the ranks of the Minute Men.

The accidental shooting of the older Montague by Minute Men estranges the lovers, who, after the intensity of battles, Indian raids, and fierce triumphant charges of Morgan's Men, at last come together in touching reconciliation.

The list of screen notables in the cast is impressive. One sees such names as Frank McGlynn, Jr., Lionel Barrymore, Louis Wolheim, and Lucille La Verne sufficient to the characters of the story. Of the principals Neil Hamilton is unquestionably pre-eminent. He plays with a fire and intensity that is admirably masculine, and is exceedingly handsome, mouse. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague is charming, wistful and demure, maintaining throughout the story with a grace and poetcness that is peculiar to her sex.

AVIATION FOR GRIFFITH

Charles Emmet Mack, as Charles Montague, portrays the young Tory who is so moved by the Lexington massacre as to join the rebels against the King. His acting was most commendable, he requires a [illegible] and [illegible] that [illegible] were present at the premiere were [illegible] the performances [illegible] Lionel Barrymore, Lucille La Verne, and Jean Hersholt, who played the villainous Hessian, Hessian, and [illegible] Hessian, Hessian, and [illegible] Hessian, Hessian, and [illegible]

Cincinnati (O) Billboard 3/8/24

REVIEWS
By SHUMLIN

"AMERICA"
(Series One: "The Sacrifice")
D. W. Griffith Picture

As long as I live I shall remember "America", David Wark Griffith's greatest triumph. It is an unforgettable picture. It is more to the screen than "The Miracle" is to the stage. As from year to year athletes break existing records in sports, so does "America" break all records in motion pictures. Once more Griffith places his standard another notch higher, there for the rest to reach at.

"America" gives in pictures as clear as lightning flashes in a darkened sky the very soul and spirit of those who fought and struggled mightily and sacrificed that there might be an America. If the young and the newcomer to this country are to be told why America is, no better instruction could be given them than this picture, this most wonderful, most thrilling photodrama of the Revolutionary period. Nothing they could read, nothing that could be told them would more enduringly etch in their minds and their imaginations the thing that is meant when it is said, "I am an American."

As a motion picture spectacle this new Griffith epic is drama painted on a great canvas. It is a great collection of endless marvels, each one perfect in rhythm with the one before and the one after. Marvels of photographic artistry, marvels of pictorial beauty in landscape and groupings, marvels of striking, breath-stopping drama, of poignant, throat-filling tragedy; all of these are "America", the proud but honest portrayal of a nation's majestic sweep toward greatness.

With all the artistry of the picture, the abundance of admirable things that strike the eye and hold the mind, one must still pause to admire the masterful showmanship of Griffith. It is enough to describe this showmanship to say that "America", tho it shows the defeat of England, will unquestionably register a great success when it is shown in England.

As for the cast of players, they are each and every one perfect in their parts. In Carol Dempster, Griffith has at last succeeded in molding an actess of the first rank. She has all the lovely feminine charm of Constance Talmadge in the lighter moments and strikes the deep tragic note of Mary Pickford in the sad ones. In Neil Hamilton the great developer of talent has discovered another young man destined to become a popular idol. As for Charles Emmett Mack, now a Griffith veteran, his performance is one of the finest things in the picture. Lionel Barrymore, as the heartless, fiendish English captain, Walter Butler, is such a vicious villain as one meets only in the wildest dreams. He is superbly villainous. Others in the cast are: Erville Alderson, Lee Beggs, John Dunton, Arthur Donaldson, Charles Bennett, Dowsing Clark, Frank Walsh, Frank McGlynn, Jr.; Arthur Dewey, Sidney Deane, W. W. Jones, Louis Wolheim, Riley Hatch, Lucille La Verne and many others.

In the great number of players are many who, although unprogramed, by their performances help greatly in making the picture the splendid drama of facts that it is. Such a one is Billie Rainsforth, a lithe, graceful, beautiful girl who plays an Indian dancing maid, one of the group of women in the entourage of the lustful Captain Butler. In her few short appearances before the camera she draws the attention with her vivid personality as a magnet draws steel. She surely will find a place in the picture world fitting to her youthful beauty and ability.

"America" is a very long picture—two hours of it, however, are as one hour of most pictures—but not long enough to contain all the glorious events of the war for independence. With a beautiful love story threading its way thruout, the picture takes up the events leading to the Revolutionary War and ends with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown to General Washington, with an epilog showing the inauguration of Washington. Historical scenes shown include the meetings of the patriots in Boston, sessions of Parliament in London, meetings of the Virginia Legislature, the thrilling ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, the desperate winter at Valley Forge and the bitter warfare of the Northern country when the British under Capt. Butler ravaged the farmers raising food for the American soldiers, pillaging, burning and murdering with the aid of the cruel Indian tribes. The main attention is given to the warfare in the Mohawk Valley farming region, the climax of the dramatic tale taking place there.

The dramatic tale weaves thru the historical backbone tells of the love of Nathan Holden, young dispatch rider of Lexington, for Nancy, the daughter of Justice Montague of Virginia, who is at first loyal to the English king, but is swayed by events to the American side. This tale takes the main characters from Virginia to Boston, to Lexington and the Mohawk Valley. It is love, in the form that Holden gives Nancy and her uncle father from the cruel treachery and lust of Captain Butler and finally Holden's chase to Butler after he has betrayed property, slaughtered his people and burned the village of the Mohawk Valley. This latter is the climax, the culminating climax of the tale, especially the thrilling chase of the traitorous and cowardly Butler.

"America" is the picture the patriotic and loyal American, man and woman, dreams and wishes to follow D. W. Griffith.

The Official Metropolitan Guide 47

EAST OF HOLLYWOOD

Harry O'Neill
as Paul Revere

THERE has never been an event pictured for the screen more gloriously exciting than that ride of Paul Revere in D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

All your history books, radio loud speakers, and oratorical torrents without number, can do but about one-tenth of what Mr. Griffith has done. Harry O'Neill, equipped with as speedy a mount as ever raced across the screen, gives life to Paul Revere's ride while the poet, Longfellow, could do no more than give romance and beauty.

No barrier stands in the path of this horse and its rider, for they will recognize none. Barriers and bullets from every side; the British striving frantically to curb this spirit of the Lexington farmers whom they thought only fit for plow and field; on through country uninviting for such wild riding, brooking no frustration no matter how great—that is the stuff of Paul Revere, his horse and the tumultuous journey they made on that historic night.

To all of which, Mr. Griffith has brought the skill and artistry that is his as our leading screen director.

Brooklyn Eagle March 9 1924

Long Shots and Closeups

Novarro-La Marr vs. Antony and Cleopatra—The Non-Professional Movie Critic—More About British Panning of American Films.

NOW that the question of movie censorship has been brought before the public eye and legislation pro and con is being debated by the 'awmakers in Albany, it would seem the psychological moment for the man in the street to register a bit of a kick of his own against the advertising of current movie attractions, written so that he who runs may read. We have in mind the advance newspaper advertising of a prominent motion picture producing organization to publicize the opening of its latest and greatest super-super-stupendous spectacle. The ad, written no doubt by one of the company's go-getteest copy men, advised the helpless reader that the world's greatest lovers were none other than Antony and Cleopatra, Queen Elizabeth and Sir Walter Raleigh, Napoleon and Josephine and—get this—Ramon Novarro and Barbara La Marr. Momentous news and interesting—if true. Too bad we haven't a Shakespeare today to go to Hollywood and immortalize the amours of Ramon and Barbara, Charlie and Pola, or perhaps Jack Pickford and Marilyn Miller in the manner of Tony and Cleo and Romeo and Juliet. Wouldn't the real estate value in that famous film colony soar to heavenly heights! California native sons could then discard their world famous climate slogan in favor of "Come to Hollywood, buy a love nest and go down in history along with Romeo, Raleigh and Ramon as one of the really great lovers of the world." (Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce take notice—no patent applied for.) Next to the champion lover ad we discover one created in the D. W. Griffith exploitation office that tells the world that "the great fleet came from California to see 'America' at the 44th Street Theater." What a wonderful enlistment slogan the navy could borrow from that. "Join the navy and see the world as well as all the first run movies." Ridiculous? Not at all. Hasn't the 26th U. S. Infantry, since it helped Griffith stage the battle scenes in "America," already launched an enlistment campaign based upon the very enticing slogan of "Join the 26th and work in the movies?" What next? It's up to the marines. So, you see, censorship of the films is not the all-important question of the industry. Something ought to be done to curb the enthusiasm of movie ad copy writers. Big business and even every-day entrepreneurs will find in movie advertising, if it is not censored, the greatest menace they have ever faced. If something isn't done soon, business will be headed for the demnition bow-wows, what with all the young bloods heading for Hollywood or going off to join the navy—or the 26th Infantry.

My Exhibitors Trade Review March 15 1924

w "America" on the opening night should eek at the production as it is today fol- k's pruning at the hands of its producer. one conceded it was a great picture as it stood at beginning. We saw on the tenth day the end of the st half and all of the second half of the picture. Where on the premiere night there seemed a sagging tendency in the second division owing to the great interest aroused in the career of young Montague, who dies at the end of the first half, as the picture stands now it may be said in all truth it is as fast in the latter part as it is in the first. And that is saying a lot. To suggest that "America" will be the greatest of the Griffith productions is perhaps to indulge in rash prophecy, especially in view of the phenomenal record of "The Birth of a Nation." But after again seeing the new subject following its final editing we are inclined to be reckless.

BY the way, we often hear of producers taking their pictures out into the smaller cities and trying them "on the dog." Bostonians may smile this week as they learn that Mr. Griffith, in preparing "America" for presentation in the Hub, deliberately "tried it on the dog" right here in New York. As many of the locations in the production are in Boston and its environs you may set it down Mr. Griffith is going to get a reception when he opens up at the Majestic [illegible] night of March 9. Boston will go to see this picture as it never did any of its predecessors.

Moving Picture World NY March 15 1924

Both Play to Capacity

While D. W. Griffith's latest photoplay spectacle, "America," a screen drama of the War of Independence, is showing to capacity audiences at the Forty-fourth street Theatre, New York, Griffith's first film spectacle, The Birth of a Nation, which began breaking box office records six years ago, was playing to capacity business at the Auditorium Theatre, Chicago.

My M P News 3/15/24

"America"—Forty-Fourth St., New York

Quinn Martin, World:—"The most stirring thing of its kind ever made is 'America,' at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. Will set a new standard of achievement in the picture play fully as high and commanding as Mr. Griffith's 'Birth of a Nation' set in its day. Griffith passes definitely into the ranks of the immortals."

Don Allen, World:—"'See America First' is the best slogan in pictures today. D. W. Griffith's picture brings every bit of patriotism to the boiling point. We cannot recall once since 'The Birth of a Nation' when we so much desired to express our enthusiasm."

Daily News:—"Griffith's touch still magic, 'America' proves. No one can outdo him. The ride of Paul Revere is heart-shaking."

Robert Sherwood, Herald:—"Never such applause. Paul Revere's ride is perhaps the most thrilling episode the movies ever achieved. For spectacular dash, coupled with tremendous historic significance, it has no equal."

Times:—"Something to be remembered, something greater than even Griffith has ever done himself. A picture that will stir the patriotic heart."

Louella Parsons, American:—"'America' is the best thing Mr. Griffith has made since 'Way Down East'."

Telegraph: "A masterpiece of exquisite photography, flawless direction and blood-stirring, appealing force."

Harriette Underhill, Tribune:—"'America' is the greatest story that has ever been put on the screen. The greatest screen thrill of our experience. This is a great picture. Do not miss 'America.'"

Sun and Globe:—"The most thrilling and satisfying motion picture entertainment in the city. Produced with the sweep and fine indignation that spurred our forefathers to signing the Declaration of Independence. The most exciting true story in the world. 'America' is decidedly something to see."

Journal: "A living, breathing document of sacrifice and idealism. Intensely vivid, historically accurate and fascinating."

Telegram and Mail: "Not since The Birth of a Nation has Griffith done anything more noteworthy. Not only educational but inspirational and a revelation. You film fanatics who rave [illegible] wonderful pictures, you [illegible] 'America' next. Then you'll have a real good reason to talk about something to rave about."

Post: "Another splendid motion picture. Audience Space [illegible] Never such [illegible]."

D. W. GRIFFITH
Director

"We saw a real thrilling Sunday night at Broadway [illegible] the thoughts [illegible] and [illegible] Griffith's [illegible] Wonder Picture [illegible] Wonder Picture [illegible] Griffith [illegible] Wonder Picture [illegible] Griffith [illegible] Wonder Picture [illegible] Griffith

Boston (Mass) Post March 8 1924 Boston American Boston (Mass) March 8 1924 Post 3/8/24

IN TEARS AFTER HER FIRST KISS

Carol Dempster Never Given Chaste Salute Until She Played With Barthelmess in Movies

CAROL DEMPSTER IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"
Miss Dempster is the great moving picture producer's latest star. She is shown here in her "Duckie" hat, just a little white duck for trimming on a black felt.

Carol Dempster was never kissed until she went into the movies, and this first kiss was given her by Richard Barthelmess. The feminine star of "America" made this confession for the first time last night. She frankly declares that of all movie ordeals the "screen kiss," although only a "screen kiss," is her most embarrassing experience.

KISSES STILL SCARE HER

She explains that Richard Barthelmess was directed by D. W. Griffith to kiss her for a "close-up," and to the amusement of a half hundred spectators she burst into tears. This was two years ago, and despite the fact that she has had quite a few screen kisses since, she claims they still frighten her.

"I suppose everyone will say that I am just making this statement to be different, but it is true. Ask Richard Barthelmess, Mr. Griffith; they can tell you. It is all right to act before five cameras and hundreds of people, but to register emotion, to kiss, to cry, third person, exit, for me it was terrifying.

"Yes, I acted before it happened when I found out that my part called for kissing, and I tried afterwards." Miss Dempster's great training was good enough.

"No, I don't me are more use, only when the scenario calls for tears, but unfortunately, in this way, there is a tremendous demand for tears from the star. I must have poured enough hundred feet, more than that, in a great theme to have an endless supply, and yet I cried hard to have to do it. It is the most difficult thing I do."

Miss Dempster is playing the part of Nancy Montague, and much too lo the eliminat would not s extent, but subtlety of the same p ting back throughout bined foots enough to were elimin these seque considerably standing fli

There is incident wh standing on to Nancy Mo to enough t the audience face with a touch, where brings out a none the mu could be ke the other o

The cast body to bri old Montag dramatic up many a little tedi acting could through wh scene, oth scenes, oth drama.

Again in Griffith the instant a sympathy, tears, and sorrow, and

When on making this after scene back of it humors in clim. Neve there is a overdoing points. W been all th most lost scenes.

Soon afte holds the Twice woul flash of the States, and have left touch. But after cuttin Nancy Mon tague, and much too l

'America,' Lionel doesn't actually kiss me. His lips never touched mine. It is just the idea of expressing this emotion that troubles me. You see, I am naturally self-conscious. That's what Mr. Griffith taught me to overcome to forget that I was Carol Dempster.

Thinking Only of Art

"Perhaps, I ought not to tell these movie secrets. However, I don't think there is any great harm done. After all, if a girl is so fortunate as to become a Griffith prospect, she isn't thinking about movie thrills. She is thinking about Mr. Griffith's art.

This remark gave the reporter an opportunity to ask a very pertinent question. Mr. Griffith had been quoted the day before as saying he didn't know how long he would be able to retain Miss Dempster now that she was merging into the "star" class. It is against the policy of the man who made Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Rudolph Valentino, etc., to keep high priced stars on his staff.

Not to Leave Griffith

"Am I going to leave Mr. Griffith? Well, I should say not. I am going to stay with him as long as he has work for me. I hope some day it may be said that Carol Dempster was the star that remained a Griffith star. If that can be said of me, I shall feel truly rewarded," she answered, saying that she does not believe she has "arrived." In "America," she feels she has a great part, but she modestly protests after all she is just one of the team who took part in the production.

Yes, I have been offered some few more as great from other companies in the industry in earning, but it is hard work than money to be able to be in a Griffith picture.

This interview was brought to change the subject, because, because of her success in "America" she is now being interviewed on all the leading newspapers of the country.

Devoted to the Work

We can have work like his regardless, [illegible] the expense [illegible] of the work.

Wins New Triumph

CARROL DEMPSTER
Star in "America" film of the Revolutionary War now being shown at Majestic Theatre.

'AMERICA' IS VIVID FILM OF REVOLUTION

Had D. W. Griffith taken for his theme some gripping tale out of the world's immortal fiction, he would have done well enough; that he should succeed so admirably with "America" at the Majestic last evening, the story of his own country, places him in line for deep gratitude in addition to warmest praise.

For this is the story of the birth of America, not opaque and abstract as in a school book, but so vivid and touching that again and again the audience wept unrestrainedly—at the naked feet of soldiers tracking blood on the snow of Valley Forge; at the stricken patriot lad rolling a keg of powder in the face of a rain of musketry; at the birth of the flag—the list is endless.

CLEVERLY WOVEN TALE.

Robert W. Chambers, the author, has cleverly woven into the stirring events of the Revolution the romance of Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, and told how, through the brave death of her brother, and the final conversion of her father to the patriots' cause they came to their happiness.

Holden, a young patriot, carries despatches to Virginia, and falls in love with the pretty Tory, Mistress Montague. The Montagues later arrive in the North in time to witness the massacre at Lexington, and young Charles Montague, hitherto a Tory fop, is moved by the sight to join the ranks of the Minute Men.

The accidental shooting of the elder Montague by Minute Men estranges the lovers, who, after the intensity of battles, Indian raids, and fierce triumphant charges of Morgan's Men, at last come together in touching reconciliation.

The list of screen notables in the cast is impressive. One sees such names as Frank McGlynn, Jr., Lionel Barrymore, Louis Wolheim, and Lucille La Verne suffused to the characters of the story. Of the principals, Neil Hamilton is unquestionably pre-eminent. He plays with a fire and intensity that is admirably masculine, and is exceedingly handsome. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague is charming, winsome and demure, moving throughout the story with a grace and carriageness that is peculiar to her own.

CHAPTER FOR GRIFFITH

Charles Emmett Mack, as Charles Montague, portrays the young Southern who is so moved by his Lexington experience as to join the rebels against the King. His acting was very commendable, he requires a [illegible] and expression that will [illegible] more prominent roles. Lionel Barrymore, who has perhaps played more roles in the moving pictures than any other actor, is in his best form in the role of Captain Walter Butler, the villain of the piece.

Louis Wolheim, who has perhaps played more roles in the moving pictures than any other actor, is in his best form in the role of Captain Hare, the villain of the piece.

Lucille La Verne, who has perhaps played more roles in the moving pictures than any other actress, is in her best form in the role of Mother Montague.

Jonas Parker, James Milaidy, Captain Hare, Louis Wolheim, Joseph Brant, Riley Hatch, Lord North, Emil Hoch, A Refugee Mother, Lucille La Verne and several others.

By Robert W. Chambers. Directed by D. W. Griffith.

SYNOPSIS. Present the sacrifices of our forefathers in establishing a free and independent nation. Nathan Holden, a Boston patriot meets aristocratic daughter of Virginia Tory, and develops a romance. Paul Revere warns countryside—and the Revolutionary War begins. The hero saves his sweetheart and the refugees in the stockade. British surrender at Yorktown.

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" STUNNING

Around Boston Scenes Are Magnificently Executed

BY PRUNELLA HALL

Patriotism and love, two of the greatest forces in life, have been welded into "America," D. W. Griffith's Revolutionary war film, which received its Boston première last evening at the Majestic Theatre before a notable audience. And if Griffith, the artist, had refused to bow to Griffith, the showman, we might have had a masterpiece. But Mr. Griffith's keen sense of picture values has made a marvellous attraction from the box office point of view and, perhaps after all, that is what really matters.

FIRST PART MAGNIFICENT

The first part of the film is magnificent, and if the romance had been subordinated to history, it would have been even greater.

The birth of a country is a great theme and the American Revolution is the most sublime struggle for independence that the world has ever known. And it was here in Boston that began the fight by which the 13 English colonies in America achieved their independence and laid the foundations for the great republic that today is a world power second to none.

The Midnight Ride

Perhaps the greatest thrill ever screened is the Midnight Ride of Paul Revere. Mr. Griffith, master of suspense, has featured rides to rescue in his other pictures but they pale into insignificance beside the tour de force of this famous historical journey. And one sat spellbound as Paul Revere rode through the countryside which echoed his momentous cry of "To Arms. To Arms. The British Are Coming."

And that valiant little band of Minute Men responded to a man, captained by that brave soul, John Parker, who shouted: "If they want war, let it begin here." And then on to Concord, where the "shot heard 'round the world" was fired. And 77 redoubtable Americans vanquished 800 red-coats.

Washington's Appointment

On to Bunker Hill the warfare waged and although the British conquered, it was a sorry victory. Other high-lights in this part of the photoplay were the House of Burgesses at Williamsburg, Penn., when Patrick Henry delivers those immortal words, "If this be treason, make the most of it"; the court of King George III, the tyrant; William Pitt, the great commoner, making his speech in defence of the Colonists; the escape of Samuel Adams and John Hancock, and the appointment of George Washington as commander-in-chief of the American army.

Then Romance Enters

All through these stirring and gripping episodes runs the thread of romance of Nancy Montague, whose father is King George's representative in Virginia, and Nathan Holden, messenger between Boston and Virginia, and one of the brave Minute Men. Nancy's heart conquers her loyalty to England, and the little Tory is blind to Nathan until she believes he has wounded her father. Then comes the death of her dear brother, Charles, who has gone over to the American side, which further wounds her royalist beliefs.

The photography is marvelous here and throughout the picture. Some of the finest photo pictures and groups are reminiscent of Mary Pickford. And the scene of the battles and charging men and horses are superb.

Hoosick Valley Campaign

The second half of the film is given over to the Hoosick Valley campaign, with the very finest work in showing the advance of Gen. Burgoyne's army and British and Indian raids and massacres. Scenes of Washington at Valley Forge, and the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, are given in the last part of the picture.

Nothing in story, the blood of the average American and no less his imagination at the stirring and romantic history of his own country and he proved a story on rich from the depth to the struggle for independence. This is the period chosen by Mr. Griffith and with a story by the famous author, Robert W. Chambers, introducing a strong personal element and a story in miniature, he has sought together characters gathered in replying the incidents and in bringing out the heroisms. He has sought this story and transferring it to the screen in such a way that you place in the up in America and realize the real spirit of the country's greatness—the spirit of its people.

Good in that is the fine handling of the cast. The principal of good characters, the principal of good characters, the principal of comedy, tremendous parts and all in the majority have strong personal and beautiful and pretty photography, in which there is the added art of permanence at the end of a scene.

Motion Picture News March 8, 1924

America

(D. W. Griffith—About 14 Reels)
(Reviewed by Laurence Reid)

IT is a historic spectacle that Griffith presents here—even if it fails to furnish a sweeping epic of the torch of liberty which was lighted and carried by our forefathers in making us a free and independent nation.

What Griffith attempts to portray (and succeeds admirably) is the great sacrifice made by our forefathers. The spirit of 76 is vital—exceptionally vital in the first half of the picture. With a fine sense of dramatic values he presents several sweeping climaxes. The most thrilling episode which ever was projected in our estimation is the midnight ride of Paul Revere. It will arouse great patriotic fervor—for the spirit is behind it. The manner in which he rouses his audience to a frenzied pitch of excitement during the momentous ride surely stamps him the master of dramatic effects. And he follows up this magnificent episode with the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill. The Minute Men arrayed against the British furnishes a scene which will make screen history. These episodes make "America" great.

The picture is packed with typical Griffith touches. He has inspired his players—especially Neil Hamilton—to immortalize our forefathers with the spirit they manifested in making us a free nation. It's a spectacular picture—a great picture, stirring in its climaxes—and carrying a fine spirit of sacrifice. And it will be a big success everywhere.

THEME. Historical romance against background of Revolutionary War—showing the features which led to America taking up arms against Britain—and pointing the conflict which was terminated in the surrender at Yorktown.

PRODUCTION HIGHLIGHTS. The ride of Paul Revere. The battle of Lexington and Concord. The battle of Bunker Hill. The suspense. The death of Butler. The fine acting. The excursions into British parliament. The death of the Tory's son.

DIRECTION. Brings out all his customary suspense. The dramatic effects—such as Revere's ride—and the battle of Lexington and Concord. Splendid atmosphere. Gets unusually fine results from players.

EXPLOITATION ANGLES. Play up Griffith and the large cast. Link up with societies, schools, colleges, women's clubs, etc. Present dignified campaign. Use dignified prologue.

DRAWING POWER. For first run houses.

SUMMARY. Historic spectacle which carries most appeal in early reels—after which it plunges into romance which dominates salient episodes of War. Has fine spirit and individual scenes magnificent, but is disappointing in the respect that vital characters and chapters of Revolution are neglected.

THE CAST

Nathan Holden	Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague	Erville Alderson
Nancy Montague	Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague	Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams	Lee Beggs
John Hancock	John Dunton
King George III	Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt	Charles Bennett
Patrick Henry	Frank McGlynn, Jr.
Thomas Jefferson	Frank Walsh
George Washington	Arthur Dewey
Captain Walter Butler	Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague	Sidney Deane
General Gage	W. W. Jones
Paul Revere	Harry O'Neill
Captain Parker	H. Van Bousen
Major Pitcairn	Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker	James Milaidy
Captain Hare	Louis Wolheim
Joseph Brant	Riley Hatch
Lord North	Emil Hoch
A Refugee Mother	Lucille La Verne

and several others.

By Robert W. Chambers. Directed by D. W. Griffith.

SYNOPSIS. Present the sacrifices of our forefathers in establishing a free and independent nation. Nathan Holden, a Boston patriot meets aristocratic daughter of Virginia Tory, and develops a romance. Paul Revere warns countryside—and the Revolutionary War begins. The hero saves his sweetheart and the refugees in the stockade. British surrender at Yorktown.

Exhibitors Trade Review March 8 1924 Chicago Herald

Entertainment Feature

"...CE," a William B. Ha... ...duction, written by John... ... Directed by Bertram ...n. Length, 5,550 feet.

...ntrigue, romance an... ...on make "Dece" a good program pi... ...e. It is a ...rent sort of story in many ...s and ...n it plays upon many of the s...e old ...ds that supply the theme for ...cores ...passable pictorial tunes.

...ichelo Brescia and his daughter Lucia ...migrate to America to enjoy the opportunities that are said to be on every hand ...the land of the free." After a few ...ks in this country they face starvation ...Brescia determines to end it all by ...wing himself and his beautiful daughter into the sea. Lucia falls in a boat and ...scued unbeknown to the distracted ...r who is saved from a watery grave ...passing policeman. Lucia falls in ...with her rescuer, Guido Savori, but ...her—one Francisco, a villainous old ...rman—also craves her. To gain his ...Francisco caused the finger of scan...o point toward Lucia, who has been ...ing house for Guido and Luigi ...nt, his good friend, and the latter's ...crippled sister, and as a result the ...s driven from the peaceful little home ...her lover is absent. Francisco seizes ...girl as she is roaming aimlessly along ...beach and he sells her to Pietro, ...

JOHN GILBERT in a scene from the Fox production, "The Wolf Man," in which he is starred.

Convent... ...al Tale Give... ...d Production

...SIN," F. B. O. ...rring Madge Bel... ...by Harold Shu... ...ed by William ...th, 6,230 feet.

...ner Photoplay Corp. story ...n theme or denouement ...pen a spectacular fire finish ...The latter is well handled ...duces some excellent color wor... ...the fire scenes a lifelike aspect. ...cast is an excellent one numbering ...well-known stars as Madge Bel... ...Hallam Cooley, Otis Harlan, Edit... ...es, John Bowers and others. There ...s much excellent photography and Di... ...rector Seiter has managed to keep the ...action moving smoothly leading up to ...the exciting fire climax.

Madge Bell... ...in the leading role ...to use her conventional her... ...real. Coincidence plays an im... ...art throughout. Hallam Cooley ...han who commits the "white ...side from one or two scenes e... ...geracts, is adequate. Tek... ...tro...

...Madge Bell... ...John Bow... ...Hallam Cooley, Priscilla Billing... ...James Corrigan, Otis Harlan, Edi... ...erle V...

Moving Picture World March 8 1924

"America"

Griffith's Latest a Dramatic and Powerful Story Dealing with the Revolutionary War Period

Reviewed by C. S. Sewell

Under the title, "America, Series One, The Sacrifice," D. W. Griffith has delved into American history and produced what seems to be the first of a series. There is no pretending the fact that he has made a picture that will probably appeal tremendously to the majority of audiences, and while it is not another "Birth of a Nation," it should rank with the best from a box office standpoint.

Nothing in story the blood of the average American and no less his imagination at the stirring and romantic history of his own country and he proved a story on rich from the depth to the struggle for independence. This is the period chosen by Mr. Griffith and with a story by the famous author, Robert W. Chambers, introducing a strong personal element and a story in miniature, he has sought together characters gathered in replying the incidents and in bringing out the heroisms. He has sought this story and transferring it to the screen in such a way that you place in the up in America and realize the real spirit of the country's greatness—the spirit of its people.

Good in that is the fine handling of the cast. The principal of good characters, the principal of comedy, tremendous parts and all in the majority have strong personal and beautiful and pretty photography, in which there is the added art of permanence at the end of a scene.

achieved by the first half of the picture. Mr. Griffith announces he has made no attempt to portray the story of the Revolution, but has selected phases that reached the sacrifices of our ancestors in this tremendous struggle. With such a wealth of material to choose from there is bound to be differences of opinion as to the wisdom of those selections and a certain disappointment that situations of strong popular appeal have not been included. Doubtless many will feel he has placed too much stress on Butler's activities. Also the "punch" of the thrilling ride in this section is weakened by its being almost a repetition of Paul Revere's ride in the earlier portion.

Bringing in the same category as historical novels, this picture will also prove valuable and entertaining from an instructive angle, for the events are presented in a more vivid and impressive way than any book possibly could.

The cast is in keeping with a production of this magnitude. Carol Dempster is perfectly in the leading feminine role and this Griffith playing contrasts is exceptionally fine. He is a newcomer with an attractive personality and is an excellent point. Lionel Barrymore does excellent work in the important role of Butler, while Louis Wolheim is about as a particularly obnoxious role in which he disgusts in his Italian. The acting of the entire cast is of a high order but it is to regretted that the place and passage Thomas Washington and you look more like the familiar portraits of him.

Moving Picture World March 8 1924

This Week ... "AMERICA" ... And nothing else. Food for conversation wherever you go and as many varieties of arguments as you care to have.

Every man who argues starts out with the flat premise that "AMERICA" will make a wad of money, that no spectator who sees it will come away without having enjoyed himself, that it abounds in real GRIFFITH touches.

From that point the argument starts. On the points of "what might have been done," on the relative importance of many things that are done.

Opinions are equally the prerogative of wise men and fools. I have seen:

"AMERICA" is the first half is only GRIFFITH. "AMERICA" is the second half is GRIFFITH is a worthy effort, or a GRIFFITH who, having his subject bigger than expected and overwhelmed by it, said: "Can't handle it somehow or other."

We say Griffith is a genius and because of the editing the successive episodes, the long, flat and a poor emphasis of the second part of "AMERICA" convinced us that GRIFFITH is a genius. Yet, we say, the Wyoming Valley episodes, the Wyoming Valley episodes, the episodes that they are fine, with the end his chapter, and he found it necessary to "drag a few Valley Forge scenes in," insert a couple of minutes [illegible] and finish the [illegible]

And having said these things we all, that we are going to [illegible] a [illegible] [illegible] to make [illegible] [illegible]

Boston Herald March 8 1924

Boston Herald March 8 1924

GRIFFITH HONORED BY MINUTE MEN

Exhibitors Herald March 8 1924

Cincinnati (O) Billboard 3/9/24

REVIEWS

By SHUMLIN

"AMERICA"
(Series One: "The Sacrifice")
D. W. Griffith Picture

As long as I live I shall remember "America", David Wark Griffith's greatest triumph. It is an unforgettable picture. It is more to the screen than "The Miracle" is to the stage. As from year to year athletes break existing records in sports, so does "America" break all records in motion pictures. Once more Griffith places his standard another pitch higher, there for the rest to reach at.

"America" gives in pictures as clear as lightning flashes in a darkened sky the very soul and spirit of those who fought and struggled mightily and sacrificed that there might be an America. If the young and the newcomer to this country are to be told why America is, no better instruction could be given them than this picture, this most wonderful, most thrilling photodrama of the Revolutionary period. Nothing they could read, nothing that could be told them would more enduringly etch in their minds and their imaginations the thing that is meant when it is said, "I am an American."

As a motion picture spectacle this new Griffith epic is drama painted on a great canvas. It is a great collection of endless marvels, each one perfect in rhythm with the one before and the one after. Marvels of photographic artistry, marvels of pictorial beauty in landscape and groupings, marvels of striking, breath-stopping drama, of poignant, throat-filling tragedy; all of these are "America", the proud but honest portrayal of a nation's majestic sweep toward greatness.

With all the artistry of the picture, the abundance of admirable things that strike the eye and hold the mind, one must still pause to admire the masterful showmanship of Griffith. It is enough to describe this showmanship to say that "America", tho it shows the defeat of England, will unquestionably register a great success when it is shown in England.

As for the cast of players, they are each and every one perfect in their parts. In Carol Dempster, Griffith has at last succeeded in molding an actess of the first rank. She has all the lovely feminine charm of Constance Talmadge in the lighter moments and strikes the deep tragic note of Mary Pickford in the sad ones. In Neil Hamilton the great developer of talent has discovered another young man destined to become a popular idol. As for Charles Emmett Mack, now a Griffith veteran, his performance is one of the finest things in the picture. Lionel Barrymore, as the heartless, fiendish English captain, Walter Butler, is such a vicious villain as one meets only in the wildest dreams. He is superbly villainous. Others in the cast are; Erville Alderson, Lee Beggs, John Dunton, Arthur Donaldson, Charles Bennett, Downing Clark, Frank Walsh, Frank McGlynn, Jr.; Arthur Dewey, Sidney Deane, W. W. Jones, Louis Wolheim, Riley Hatch, Lucille La Verne and many others.

In the great number of players are many who, although unprogramed, by their performances help greatly in making the picture the splendid drama of facts that it is. Such a one is Billie Rainsforth, a lithe, graceful, beautiful girl who plays an Indian dancing maid, one of the group of women in the entourage of the lustful Captain Butler. In her few short appearances before the camera she draws the attention with her vivid personality as a magnet draws steel. She surely will find a place in the picture world fitting to her youthful beauty and ability.

"America" is a very long picture—two hours of it, however, are as one hour of most pictures—but not long enough to contain all the glorious events of the war for independence. With a beautiful love story threading its way through, the picture takes up the events leading to the Revolutionary War and ends with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown to General Washington, with an epilog showing the inauguration of Washington. Historical scenes shown include the meetings of the patriots in Boston, sessions of Parliament in London, sections of the Virginia Legislature, the thrilling ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Bunker Hill, the desperate winter at Valley Forge and the bitter warfare of the Northern country when the British under Capt. Butler scourged the farmers raising food for the American soldiers, pillaging, burning and murdering with the aid of the cruel Indian tribes. The main attention is given to the warfare in the Mohawk Valley farming regions, the climax of the dramatic tale taking place there.

The dramatic tale weaves thru the historical backbone tells of the love of Nathan Holden, young English rider of Lexington, for Nancy, the daughter of Jacob Montague of Virginia, who is at first loyal to the English king, but is caught up events on the American side. Thru tale takes the main characters from Virginia to Boston, to Lexington and the Mohawk Valley. It is here, in the Mohawk Valley, where Nancy and her uncle further Holden, where Nancy and her uncle, after the cruel treatment and rude advances of Captain Butler and Indian Hunter's school to Butler and Indian Hunter, are rescued by Paul Revere, who is on his midnight ride to warn the colonists and muster the militia. Another thrilling episode is the capture of Paul Revere by Butler and Indian Hunter and his escape through the King's face printed on paper money.

"America" is the production of the year. It is a great picture, a great story, a great piece of work. It is a lifelike aspect. ent one numbering as Madge Bel- this Harlan, Edit- nd others. There tography and Di aged to keep th ls leading up t the leading rol conventional her ence plays an im Hallam Cooke mits the "whit or two scenes n adequate. John a scene from th e Wolf Man," F

Tale roduction N," F. B. O. g Madge Bel- Harold Shu- by William 6,230 feet. toplay Corp. story ne or denouement ctacular fire finish r is well handle cellent color wor a lifelike aspect. ent one numbering as Madge Bell this Harlan, Edit nd others. Ther tography and Di aged to keep th ls leading up t the leading rol conventional her ence plays an im Hallam Cooke mits the "whit or two scenes n adequate. John

EAST OF HOLLYWOOD

Harry O'Neill
as Paul Revere

THERE has never been an event pictured for the screen more gloriously exciting than that ride of Paul Revere in D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

All your history books, radio loud speakers, and oratorical torrents without number, can do but about one-tenth of what Mr. Griffith has done. Harry O'Neill, equipped with as speedy a mount as ever raced across the screen, gives life to Paul Revere's ride while the poet, Longfellow, could do no more than give romance and beauty.

No barrier stands in the path of this horse and its rider, for they will recognize none. Barriers and bullets from every side; the British striving frantically to curb this spirit of the Lexington farmers whom they thought only fit for plow and field; on through country uninviting for such wild riding, brooking no frustration no matter how great—that is the stuff of Paul Revere, his horse and the tumultuous journey they made on that historic night.

To all of which, Mr. Griffith has brought the skill and artistry that is his as our leading screen director.

Brooklyn Eagle March 9 1924

Long Shots and Closeups

Novarro-La Marr vs. Antony and Cleopatra—The Non-Professional Movie Critic—More About British Panning of American Films.

NOW that the question of movie censorship has been brought before the public eye and legislation pro and con is being debated by the 'aw-makers in Albany, it would seem the psychological moment for the man in the street to register a bit of a kick of his own against the advertising of current movie attractions, written so that he who runs may read. We have in mind the advance newspaper advertising of a prominent motion picture producing organization to publicize the opening of its latest and greatest super-super-stupendous spectacle. The ad, written no doubt by one of the company's go-gettest copy men, advised the helpless reader that the world's greatest lovers were none other than Antony and Cleopatra, Queen Elizabeth and Sir Walter Raleigh, Napoleon and Josephine and—get this—Ramon Novarro and Barbara La Marr. Momentous news and interesting—if true. Too bad we haven't a Shakespeare today to go to Hollywood and immortalize the amours of Ramon and Barbara, Charlie and Pola, or perhaps Jack Pickford and Marilyn Miller in the manner of Tony and Cleo and Romeo and Juliet. Wouldn't the real estate value in that famous film colony soar to heavenly heights! California native sons could then discard their world famous climate slogan in favor of "Come to Hollywood, buy a love nest and go down in history along with Romeo, Raleigh and Ramon as one of the really great lovers of the world." (Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce take notice—no patent applied for.) Next to the champion lover ad we discover one created in the D. W. Griffith exploitation office that tells the world that "the great fleet came from California to see 'America' at the 44th Street Theater." What a wonderful enlistment slogan the navy could borrow from that. "Join the navy and see the world as well as all the first run movies." Ridiculous? Not at all. Hasn't the 26th U. S. Infantry, since it helped Griffith stage the battle scenes in "America," already launched an enlistment campaign based upon the very enticing slogan of "Join the 26th and work in the movies?" What next? It's up to the marines. So, you see, censorship of the films is not the all-important question of the industry. Something ought to be done to curb the enthusiasm of movie ad copy writers. Big business and even every-day entrepreneurs will find in movie advertising, if it is not censored, the greatest menace they have ever faced. If something isn't done soon, business will be headed for the demnition bow-wows, what with all the young bloods heading for Hollywood or going off to join the navy—or the 26th Infantry.

My Exhibitors Trade Review March 15 1924

w "America" on the opening night should eek at the production as it is today fol- s pruning at the hands of its producer. me conceded it was a great picture as it stood at beginning. We saw on the tenth day the end of the st half and all of the second half of the picture. Where on the premiere night there seemed a sagging tendency in the second division owing to the great interest aroused in the career of young Montague, who dies at the end of the first half, as the picture stands now it may be said in all truth it is as fast in the latter part as it is in the first. And that is saying a lot. To suggest that "America" will be the greatest of the Griffith productions is perhaps to indulge in rash prophecy, especially in view of the phenomenal record of "The Birth of a Nation." But after again seeing the new subject following its final editing we are inclined to be reckless.

BY the way, we often hear of producers taking their pictures out into the smaller cities and trying them "on the dog." Bostonians may smile this week as they learn that Mr. Griffith, in preparing "America" for presentation in the Hub, deliberately "tried it on the dog" right here in New York. As many of the locations in the production are in Boston and its environs you may bet it down Mr. Griffith is going to get a reception when he opens up at the Majestic on the night of March 9. Boston will go to that picture as it never did any of its predecessors.

Moving Picture World March 15 1924

Both Play to Capacity

While D. W. Griffith's latest photoplay spectacle, "America," a screen drama of the War of Independence, is drawing to capacity audiences at the Forty-fourth street Theatre, New York, Griffith's first film spectacle, "The Birth of a Nation," which began breaking box-office records ten years ago, was playing to capacity business at the Auditorium Theatre, Chicago.

My Times March 1 1924

Paul Revere in "America"

My Exhibitors Trade Review 3/8/24

A National Picture

[illegible] on the public screen of "America" is an [illegible] in motion picture [illegible]. Seldom [illegible] has there been a subject carrying so dramatic [illegible] as does this product of the Griffith [illegible] pictures fail in all respects to meet the re- [illegible] those who go to see it there may be said in [illegible] that very likely we have [illegible] much from Mr. Griffith [illegible] the reviews in the New York newspapers [illegible] marked goodness as in the power of the [illegible] dramatic force with which its message is [illegible]

[illegible] the one the producer sought [illegible] this production to fail to guide him, prov- [illegible] suggestions and indications from tangible and [illegible] there throughout the whole and so [illegible] that come under the powerful hand [illegible]

[illegible]

Boston (Mass) Herald March 9 1924

My Exhibitors Trade Review March 15 1924

"America"—Forty-Fourth St., New York

Quinn Martin, World:—"The most stirring thing of its kind ever made is 'America,' at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. Will set a new standard of achievement in the picture play fully as high and commanding as Mr. Griffith's 'Birth of a Nation' set in its day. Griffith passes definitely into the ranks of the immortals."

Don Allen, World:—"'See America First' is the best slogan in pictures today. D. W. Griffith's picture brings every bit of patriotism to the boiling point. We cannot recall once since 'The Birth of a Nation' when we so much desired to express our enthusiasm."

Daily News:—"Griffith's touch still magic, 'America' proves. No one can outdo him. The ride of Paul Revere is heart-shaking."

Robert Sherwood, Herald:—"Never such applause. Paul Revere's ride is perhaps the most thrilling episode the movies ever achieved. For spectacular dash, coupled with tremendous historic significance, it has no equal."

Times:—"Something to be remembered, something greater than even Griffith has ever done himself. A picture that will stir the patriotic heart."

Louella Parsons, American:—"'America' is the best thing Mr. Griffith has made since 'Way Down East.'"

Telegraph: "A masterpiece of exquisite photography, flawless direction and blood-stirring, appealing force."

Harriette Underhill, Tribune:—"'America' is the greatest story that has ever been put on the screen. The greatest screen thrill of our experience. This is a great picture. Do not miss 'America.'"

Sun and Globe:—"The most thrilling and satisfying motion picture entertainment in the city. Produced with the sweep and fine indignation that spurred our forefathers to signing the Declaration of Independence. The most exciting true story in the world. 'America' is decidedly something to see."

Journal: "A living, breathing document of sacrifice and idealism. Intensely vivid, historically accurate and fascinating."

Telegram and Mail: "Not since The Birth of a Nation has Griffith done anything more noteworthy. Not only educational, but inspirational and a revelation. You film fanatics who read [illegible] wonderful [illegible] Another splendid motion picture. Audience burst into applause. Never such a perfect example of film [illegible]

D. W. GRIFFITH
America
FREEBOOTER

"Genius?" Says Griffith; "Not At All; Just Long, Hard Work"

By LOUIS WEITZENKORN

THE trouble with David Wark Griffith is that he cannot be anything except a dreamer. If Griffith could hold on to the fortunes he has made instead of spending them upon impossible tragedies like "Broken Blossoms" he would have had little anxiety concerning his latest picture, "America." When the crank of the projection machine in the 44th Street Theatre began turning the night "America" opened D. W. Griffith had put all his money, and the money of his backers upon one color. He bet red against black. Not to lift the tension too quickly for the so-called anxious reader, here is a picture of Griffith during the birth of the picture on Broadway:

It was a few moments before the performance and Griffith, his voice nearly gone, his throat sore from the strain of direction, talking to managers, press agents, newspaper men and no doubt calming the anxious fears of those who had invested in "America," watched the streaming crowd pour into the lobby of the theatre and filter past the ticket taker into the auditorium. Hundreds passed and Griffith, a bulking man dressed in brown tweeds, a wide brimmed soft hat slanted upon his head, stood silently. His long nose, the index of his personality, seemed to dip among the crowd like the prow of a boat. That nose is an impressive thing. There seems to be a magnetic relation between it and human psychology and this interviewer, who watched Griffith as he watched his peripatetic audience, could almost see the shape of psychic inhalations.

feelings are. David Wark Griffith will corroborate them for you.

When he settled back in a chair in the dressing room to talk he was a big man, worn to the edge, and yet satisfied to an extent that he had won again. He exults that the critics have praised his play, that audiences are packing to see it, but he feels that he has one more big bet to make, when he piles up sufficient money he's going to play it upon another color—gray—the gray of the Confederate States of America, their rise and fall, and the epic tragedy of the South.

"I have been reputed to be an Englishman," said Griffith. "Of course I'm not. I was born in Kentucky, near Louisville, and my family were victims of the Civil War, as nearly all Southerners were. After the war we were broke. Now the suffering in the South is known to me and I think that story is the greatest story of a lost cause in history. And all men love lost causes—I mean the lost cause is usually a brave one, thrilling, daring, tragic. Men are lost causes themselves. They fight and they lose and just the bravery of living and fighting an inevitable doom is the marvel and the greatness of man.

"If I can get the money with no backer to tell me what to do and what not to do, I'm going to film the rise and fall of the Confederacy and when I'm finished with it it will be the greatest work of my life."

Griffith doesn't talk much in small terms. He wants canvases of the seven-acre type. The French Revolution and Carlyle's history of it fascinates him and he plays with the idea of using Carlyle as his scenario writer.

"It's not supposed to be accurate," he said. "Thomas Carlyle was prejudiced bilious and all that, but what he wrote could have happened and for the most part did. It seems to me that what could happen is as good as what did. At any rate I'd rather be misled by Carlyle than bored by most of the historians."

He talked of the book, the chapter called "The Night of Spurs," the flight of the King and Queen to

D. W. GRIFFITH completing "AMERICA" gifs for a photograph.

The house manager came up to him.

"Mr. Griffith," he said, "we're sold out all except your personal box. Can we sell that?"

Griffith grinned. "No, we don't need those two dollars. But it's a success, isn't it?" He walked into the theatre and looked at the creeping heads of men and women, the hum of their whispering sending a calm breeze wind through the house. "It's great," he said. "We do something and then have people come to see it. And it's satisfactory."

Thomas Wise stopped a tall man as he hit the aisle back to a theatre chair behind the screen for the opinion of an interview. Griffith didn't want any excuse under the mask of [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible]

[illegible] Another [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible] Wise, who was [illegible]

[

March 15 1924

The Editorial Page

The 'Short' and Its Future

WHAT is the future of the short subject? Has it seen its best days, has it reached the peak and is it now on its way down the hill to its long home?

We pause while the vote is being taken.

From all over the land comes the roar from thousands of exhibitor throats: "No!"

It is here to stay.

The motion picture came to us in the guise of a short subject—very short, to be precise.

It grew in the course of years from 50 feet to approximately a thousand. On another page is told the story of how D. W. Griffith, then a new director at Biograph, refused to cut a picture from two reels to one.

That was not the least of his crimes. He had fractured the standing rules of the institution by spending not only the $75 allowed each director for making a picture but $105 in addition.

There was no machinery for distributing a film of that inconceivable length. It might be a good picture, but it was junk nevertheless.

The director was "fired." He was an impossible executive.

Of course, progress would not be denied. Some distributing genius discovered a way out of the dilemma. The picture would be issued in two parts, as a serial. And Griffith was restored to the industry.

It is true there are some feature productions that make a satisfactory afternoon or evening's entertainment.

BUT those which do are sure to be far out of the ordinary in the way of entertainment. There must be in them some mighty appeal to the imagination.

Easily the aggregate of those pictures which come within this category cannot exceed 2 per cent of the whole.

That leaves at least 98 per cent which must be accompanied, or at least should be.

Now what is the average length of the feature of today?

In the December list we find 30 pictures that exceed 6,500 feet in length and 28 that are under. The January chart discloses 20 productions that exceed 6,500 feet in length, while there are 47 that are listed as less than that length.

Which would indicate, by the way, that the complaint on the part of exhibitors that features were too long is being heeded by producers.

The foregoing figures justify the assumption that placing the average length as 6,500 feet is not an understatement. Let us assume it is approximately correct.

It will mean that the average exhibitor planning a two hours' program of straight pictures will require at least 3,500 feet of film to be divided among short subjects.

Here is opportunity for real diversity of entertainment.

In the first place there is a news weekly. It may not be of current date, but if your patrons have not seen it it is new to them. And a program is not complete without a weekly.

If you are in doubt about this statement pick up a list of programs taken from the announcements of successful houses and see how many there are in which a weekly is missing. See if you can discover one.

That leaves three reels to be accounted for. Just here is where the stand-by of a two-part comedy comes in. This is the point where rigid selection should be exercised.

THERE are all kinds of comedies—excellent, good, fair, bad and worse. It is the last two classes the exhibitor should avoid.

It is in booking comedies that the exhibitor may make full use of his business papers, by filing the reviews. It will give him a check-up on the salesman. And if it happens that the exhibitor is fooled on the review then the editor's hide should be made to feel the lash.

For the fourth reel there are many choices. A good scenic is always appreciated—if patrons get a chance to see it.

It is in the fourth reel, however, where the short subject has abundant opportunity for expansion. We know that in other days much good entertainment was provided by single-reel dramas. The chance is present today as much as ever.

Judging by experience the making of short subjects is a work of specialization. The largest output in that department is provided by two companies practically devoted to it.

The importance of the short subject in the estimation of exhibitors may be judged when it is stated that putting aside the large quantity of material and much of it meritorious supplied by other companies the two concerns devoted to short subjects last year received in bookings practically one dollar out of every seven paid in to all the exchanges.

The short subject is "sitting pretty."

Brooklyn Eagle 3/9/24

Ten Best Pictures Selected

SCREENLAND has selected the ten best motion picture dramas of all time. The votes in the contest which closed on January 15th, have been tabulated, and the final results are presented on this page.

SCREENLAND went to great pains to get a cosmopolitan vote. The foremost men of the celluloid world, including such authorities as Adolph Zukor, president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, offered their choice of the ten best pictures, the leading screen critics were invited to give their selection, and the readers of SCREENLAND were asked to send in their own individual lists. Our readers responded in remarkable fashion, the votes flooding in from all parts of America, from Mexico, Cuba, Canada, Australia, Japan and England.

Admirable Consensus of Opinion

SCREENLAND looks upon the vote as presenting an admirable consensus of opinion. The final vote is the list of ten as selected by the men who make the movies, the writers who criticise them and the people who go to see them. No list could be more satisfactory [illegible] more definite in its findings.

Until the very last vote was counted it was impossible to tell definitely whether David Wark Griffith's The Birth of a Nation or Rex Ingram's The Four Horsemen had won first place. The Griffith epic finally [illegible] Mr. Ingram's film version of the Blasco Ibanez novel. The Four Horsemen [illegible] The Kaiser, The Beast of Berlin, Hearts of the World, Intolerance, Broken Blossoms, Way Down East, Orphans of the Storm, The Miracle Man, Hoodoo Ann, Hearts of the World, Way Down East, Broken Blossoms, Orphans of the Storm, Intolerance, The Miracle Man, Hoodoo Ann, The Birth of a Nation, The Four Horsemen.

Griffith "America" again stamps him as the daddy of all directors, foreign and American. His picture is so far above the alleged great ones that to start to compare them is a joke. Griffith, and Griffith alone, has the knack of raising his audience to fever pitch excitement and creating suspence that is marvelous, to say the least. "America" is a picture no one should miss, if they want entertainment. It is a sure cure for [illegible] circulation.

my Star March 7 1924 that the great film public is steadily advancing in its tastes and likings.

Very close behind the first twenty were The Christian, Foolish Wives, The Golem, Where the Pavement Ends and The Green Goddess. In fact, but a few votes separated them from the last of the lucky twenty.

The Griffith Productions Honored

THE final vote presents some interesting food for thought. David Wark Griffith is the only director represented by more than two productions. Griffith has four screenplays in the first ten and one in the second. Rex Ingram, James Cruze, Allan Dwan and Charlie Chaplin each have one in the first and one in the second ten, and Fred Niblo has two in the second ten.

Stars played an amazingly small part in the voting. Only two stars are present in more than two of the first twenty selections. Both Richard Barthelmess and Lillian Gish were in three of the first ten and Miss Gish was in one of the second ten. Which would seem to augur well for the forthcoming Barthelmess-Gish production of Romeo and Juliet. Rudolph Valentino, Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin, Marion Davies and Mac Marsh are represented in one of the first and one of the second ten selections.

Some Interesting Votes

IT is not too late to present some of the interesting final votes. Anna [illegible] known to SCREENLAND readers for her crisp and [illegible] entered the following list of ten:

1. Blood and Sand. 2. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. 3. Sins of the Fathers. 4. The Prisoner of Zenda and The Girl I Loved. 5. The Merry-Go-Round. 6. Nanook of the North. 7. The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. 8. The Three Musketeers. 9. Hell's Hinges and It Happens to Every Man. 10. The Woman of Paris, Lorna Doone, Under Two Flags, Little Old New York.

The Second Ten

1. Blood and Sand. 2. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. 3. Sins of the Fathers. 4. The Prisoner of Zenda and The Girl I Loved. 5. The Merry-Go-Round. 6. Nanook of the North. 7. The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari. 8. The Three Musketeers. 9. Hell's Hinges and It Happens to Every Man. 10. The Woman of Paris, Lorna Doone, Under Two Flags, Little Old New York.

Which would indicate that [illegible] thinks well of comedy and particularly of [illegible] Ben Turpin.

[illegible] Bidwell Ave., Jersey City, N. J. [illegible] including The Wonder of Wife, [illegible] Biograph [illegible] Clare [illegible] Biograph [illegible] Mae Marsh, Bobbie Harron [illegible] The Birth of a Nation, Gloria Swanson, The World to Live In, Restless Passion, The Half Breed [illegible] Doug Fairbanks Triangle production, and Hoodoo Ann [illegible] Charles Ray [illegible]

[illegible] continued on page [illegible]

¶ Watch for Upton Sinclair's sensational article in next month's issue of Screenland—
"Money and the Movies"
Out April 1st

Boston (Mass) Traveler March 8 1924

LIFE

Silent Drama

"America"

Right off the Reel

By [illegible]

"America" Too Big to Be Appreciated at First Viewing

Post [illegible] March 9 1924

Screen Gossip

Boston American 3/2/24

my Post 3/9/24

RK REVIEW, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 1924 New York Review

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"

THE SCREEN'S GREATEST ACHIEVEMENT

By Colgate Baker

That the American Revolution could ever be used to make a screen masterpiece probably no one but D. W. Griffith ever dreamed, and that he did is, after all, not extraordinary, for his "dreams"—or, rather, the realization of them in motion pictures—are among the most important things that have happened in the cinema world the past decade.

I felt, after seeing "America," at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, that the Revolution must have been staged by George Washington and the rest of the patriots of '76 for the special purpose of giving Mr. Griffith an opportunity to make a picture which not only surpasses as an achievement in production all his previous master films in magnitude, in artistic values, in heart interest and in service to our country, but which will probably inaugurate a new epoch in film production, for it shows that a historical subject properly treated is more interesting than the greatest imaginative story ever screened.

"America" is the biggest hit as a film that Broadway has ever seen. It is a hit, in my opinion, not because the masses of people feel the patriotic urge that the subject invokes so keenly, but because it is so thrilling and absorbing as a story and as a panorama of action, battle scenes, horseback rides, fights, retreats, love episodes, tragic deaths, heroism, fortitude and suffering in which our revolutionary forefathers took part.

Griffith to Rescue

It has come to the theatre at the psychological moment, just when it is needed and calculated to do the most good. The movies had commenced to grope in the dark again for leadership. Producers have been going to extreme lengths to obtain profitable literary material for the screen. They have impressed into service every likely author from her to Timbuctoo; have paid fabulous sums to novelists who do not understand the requirements of the screen, but, for all that, have not advanced a single step, either commercially or artistically, the past five years.

If you will recall the tremendous impetus that the success of Griffith's first great picture, "The Birth of a Nation," gave the industry, you will be able to appreciate what the success of "America" means to the movies, for it means something just as big.

That is one angle of the matter, and another side is the patriotic service that Griffith has rendered. Our biggest national problem is the assimilation and Americanization of the vast horde of foreigners that have emigrated and settled here the past twenty years. How to make good citizens out of them, imbue them with the traditions which we cherish, to give them the ideals of the noble men and women who founded the United States of ours, is the big problem of the day. "America" will do more for this cause than all the text-books on American history ever written. It will convert the mature and enthuse the youth, for no one, not even a red anarchist, can resist its appeal.

Historically Accurate

As history it is about as flawless a piece of work as has ever been achieved. Even the English historians can take no exception to any scene or incident on the ground that it is historically inexact. You will learn more about the Revolution by seeing this picture than you could by reading every book there is on the subject, and even a professor of history gets a better understanding of the causes and efforts of the revolt of the thirteen colonies and the motives of the participants in the struggle for liberty than he had before.

For the first time the great figures of the Revolution—Washington, Patrick Henry, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Thomas Jefferson, Paul Revere and the minute men of Lexington are vitalized and real human beings, and the incidents that moved them move us. It is wonderful, this thing—illusion, you may call it. The magic of the power of the screen never more astounding.

This brings us right back to the point of the marvellous power of the motion picture art—something that only a few people, even in Hollywood, of all the producers who have been head of the movies, to realize that there is no limit to what the film can do. And the end is not yet. The sky is more limitless in scope, etc., etc.

Why Its Produced It

Frankly, what was it that impelled Griffith to produce "America"? I asked him, and he said a present situation, a situation so unlike any other that it seemed to him the duty of the American people, and of the world, to be given a great lesson in Americanism. He said he felt that the time was ripe for such a picture, that the time was right, and that he had to do it.

He said that he had wanted to do it for years, but that every time he had to postpone attempting to picturize it. Then last year I decided that the time was ripe for a picture dealing with the Revolution and I ressurected my play. After consideration I decided not to use the play, but to have another story written and I secured Robert W. Chambers to write this story for me, and went to work on "America."

Necessary Corporation

"I am glad that I waited all those years before trying to produce this picture, because I doubt whether in the early days I could have enlisted such valuable assistance from the historical organizations, the authorities the War Department and other people of distinction in making the production. I har the time and means to do justice to the subject, and every facility of the War Department, the various historical societies, such as the Sons of the Revolution, the Lexington Historical Society etc, was placed at my disposal. It was necessary, of course, to have every detail absolutely correct, so that no learned historian could find fault with it. This called for a vast amount of work, but my staff was organized to deal with the matter efficiently and everything progressed smoothly up to the day we began to photograph our first scenes.

"The actual work of taking the picture on location proved to be extremely difficult. There were new problems to be solved in handling the army of extras that probably could not have worked out if I had not had so much experience before in this kind of work.

"In many scenes you will notice that we had to include a large number of people all of whom were vitally concerned in the central action and every individual does something important in the making of the whole scene. To get this all done on time, in the proper way at the proper time, to get views at the right angles and synchronize it all, was a tremendous labor, calling for endless rehearsals, but I am happy to say that it was all done satisfactorily.

"I am very much pleased with the manner in which the production has been received by the public. We have not done much advertising and yet we have been playing to capacity audiences and I have never seen so much applause before at a film showing on Broadway.

Absorbing Situation

"The audiences seems to forget that they are seeing something which happenned two hundred and fifty years ago. They even appear to forget at times the historical significance of the picture and to be completely absorbed in the development of the love story and the pathetic episodes in it, such as the death of young Montague, and the tragic situation of his sister, in love with the young patriot Holden who she thinks has shot her father. Mr. Chambers romantic story of the love affair between Nancy Montague and Holden, the Yankee express rider, has been worked out by him in a series of very powerful scenes which certainly grip the audience, for I hear, for the first time in my life, an audience cry at every performance.

"The Montague family, by the way, was suggested by the Fairfaxes of Virginia. George Washington, in his youth, as you know was a friend of Lord Fairfax and a visitor at his home in Virginia very frequently. Washington as a young man was not a fashionable youth. Although of high birth, he was just a plain young surveyor, without much social polish, but greatly admired for his fine, upright character and was received at the homes of the aristocracy of Virginia and cordially welcomed there rather because he was man, but not because he belonged to the 'smart set' of the day.

"The fashionable folks of the time were pretty nearily all Tories and it is a fact that a good many of them were converted, like the Montagues were to the cause of Independence before the war over by their disgust at the manner in which such British officers as Captain Walter Butler and his Indian allies behaved, as shown in the picture.

The Opening Guns

"I have tried to be perfectly fair to the British at all stages of the picture. It seems that the Battle of Lexington was largely an accident. The most careful historical reserch into every detail of this first engagement of the war has been made. Paul Revere's ride could not have been directer better had I done it myself. It is established that there were only seventy-seven Minute Men assembled to oppose the regiment of 800 British soldiers that General Gage sent to the village to put down the uprising and arrest Hancock an accidental discharge of a gun by and Adams. However it does seem as if an expert scenario writer had staged the whole affair. It could not have been framed up better for movie purposes.

"The first shot fired, you know, was some excited soldier and the first volley fired by the British was in the air, after the officer in command had ordered the Americans to lay down their arms. It was only after the Minute Men had fired into the ranks of the British, because they thought that they were being fired on, that the British shot to kill. It does seem strange that 'the shot was heard around the world' was an accident, but it is true. If that accident had not occurred at that second, the Revolution might have been postponed indefinitely, but of course it was bound to come sooner or later in view of the insensate policy of George III towards the colonists. Yet we do not know what might have been. Do we?

"I have taken great care to show how British opinion was divided at the time as to how the colonists should be dealt with. King George certainly was not supported by a majority of his people in his politics. If the movies had been in existence at the period there would have been no War for Independence.

How to Prevent War

"You know I think that war is caused by a comparatively small group of people in authority, always and that the masses if given a voice and knowledge of the issues would always prevent war. The great antidote for war, in my opinion, is the enlightenment of the masses by means of motion pictures. I firmly believe that the movies will be the means of preventing war, perhaps not immediately, but surely at no distant future time.

"The education of the people of this country and every other country by means of just such films as 'America' will be the means of preventing kings and presidents and small groups of politicians from plunging their countries into war. There are always two sides to a question. The trouble in the past has been that the masses have had only one side presented to them by their own government.

The movies as an educational force, properly used, will be the most potent instrument in making one country deal fairly with another and that holds out the hope that every international question which might precipitate a war will be settled b ythe force of public opinion. No country's politicians would dare to provoke a war if the people were solidly against it.

"For example, if the entire body of the English people were fully informed of the injustice of King George's policy towards the American colonies, the King would not have dared to pursue them to the point of making Americans rebel.

English New Today

"As a matter of fact it was the realization on the part of the English people of the injustice of their case against the American colonies that was a big factor in bringing the War for Independence to an end. The average Englishman today in discussing the Revolution says this very frankly. The Englishman prefers to think that England practically gave us our independence, rather than admit we won it.

"Perhaps England hoped that we would grow weary of struggling along as an independent nation and seek to come back into the mother group of English speaking nations as a prodigal son.

"It seems as if Washington himself sensed this hope and feared that it might be realized because the colonies had been for our country in particularly the prime factor that kept them together. Washington knew that if a factor in its history, the glorious cause of holding our land if we be prime cohesive in European politics. The genius of the whole has enough brought home to all of us, and I think in Washington, too. By knowing this factor we have become the greatest and most powerful nation in the world, and, had Washington not foreseen the dangers that would arise if the colonies were to be divided, we might not have had the United States of America. Washington was the greatest statesman of his day, and I think that he was the greatest statesman of all time.

The Minute Men

The story of America is bound up in a series of events, subsequent to the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and putting in practice the rights and freedom of the United States of America. The Minute Men of Lexington and Concord, the battle of Bunker Hill, the crossing of the Delaware, the battle of Trenton, the battle of Princeton, the battle of Saratoga, the battle of Yorktown, the battle of Cowpens, the battle of Guilford Court House, the battle of Eutaw Springs, the battle of Kings Mountain

D. W. G. MAKES ANOTHER STAR—MEET MR. NEIL HAMILTON

All-American Film Star Tells His Story

David Wark Griffith doesn't do it often, but when he does it, he DOES it.

You get what we're talking about, of course? You don't? Well, you oughta. Make movie stars is what we mean—make them out of human beings—even as you or I—who besides being very, very human are also possessed of certain and varied dramatic capabilities.

And now with Mary Pickford, Doug Fairbanks, Dick Barthelmess, Lillian Gish and Colleen Moore heading his made famous list, D. W.'s gone and done it again. Neil Hamilton, tall, handsome with deep penetrating brown eyes and luxurious brown locks, just now grown almost to shoulder length because of his part in "America," flashing white teeth, gorgeous dimple and—yes, girls, it's too bad, we know—a wife whom he adores, is Mr. Griffith's latest find.

If D. W. Griffith and an interviewer on the world's greatest morning newspaper have any sort of luck in predictions of the future, Neil Hamilton is mighty soon going to win his way to the hearts of the most exacting and particular of movie fans. In plain words, he's gonna get YOU.

Real American.

Rudy Valentino and Ramon Novarro are all very well—perfectly grand, in themselves. So is Dick Barthelmess who happens to be a Griffith find—but they're of the Latin type, the two former being absolutely foreign and the latter of Latin descent. Even Tommy Meighan lays claim to Bonny Ireland. And right now comes a grand and glorious American boy, with the good old name of Hamilton to make movie thrillers truly thrilling.

If you've seen "America," there's no doubt but that you've already fallen for the handsome Neil. Indeed, you must have fallen for him when you saw "The White Rose," for it was then that D. W. made the discovery.

Neil Hamilton has, despite his youth—he's only twenty-four—posed for everything under the sun from tooth-paste ads to overcoat, collar and hat ads. Then, besides this, he has been used as magazine cover and illustration model by artists of no less distinction than Harrison Fisher, James Montgomery Flagg, May Wilson Preston, James Preston and W. W. Browne.

Indeed, it was one of these prominent artists who first saw a film career for Neil—but this story's all his, and we've been telling it all without quotes. Here's to do our stuff in Neil's own words with our own many, many interruptions:

Eight Subtitles in Neil's Life.

Here are sidelights on the career of Neil Hamilton, D. W. Griffith's newest star:

1. Born in Lynn, Mass., in September, 1899.
2. Moved to New Haven, Conn., at seventeen. Lost job in factory.
3. Left for New York with $50 Liberty Bond, to seek stage career.
4. Got job in stock at $25 per week.
5. Posed for ads and illustrations.
6. Played extra parts in movies.
7. Married Mrs. Hamilton. Received employment with D. W. G. in "White Rose."
8. Played leading man part in Griffiths "America."

Worked Hard.

Neil: I was born in Lynn, Mass., and brought up in the one-horse town of Athal. Went to high school there and soon after my graduation we moved to New Haven, Conn., where my mother and father still live.

I took up my fifty dollar Liberty bond then—this was seven years back, you know—and made my way for New York. I really believe if my parents had urged me on I would have gone straight back home within a week, but as it was, mother said, "We're having chicken for dinner on Sunday, Neil. Be sure you're back early." When she said that I swore that the only way I'd be brought home Sunday was plain dead. I had always had a great hankering for the stage, and after gathering up sufficient nerve I applied for and to my astonishment was given a job with a Brooklyn stock company. After a couple of months I was made juvenile second to the leading man who was drawing $250 per week. I was getting $25. When all sorts of commendations came to me through the mail and in person I determined to ask for a raise, and I got one—$5.

Neil: Well, it was at about this time that somebody in the cast urged me to go to see some of the famous artists. I did and since then I've posed for everything under the sun—and it's a funny thing, but I've met many of the prominent movie stars through this field of endeavor. May McAvoy and myself—neither of whom wear glasses—made a public appearance together in an eye-glass ad that has been posted all over the country.

Us: How did you get in with Mr. Griffith?

Neil: Well, that makes a story, too. This happened a year and three months ago. I had just lost my job in the stock company because the next two plays required an older man. In one week's time I was going to be married to the lady who is now Mrs. Hamilton. So, of course, I had to get busy. I applied for jobs in two pictures—one with another company, one with Griffith, who was about to make the "White Rose." Friday night came, and I hadn't heard a word from either company and my marriage was scheduled for the following Monday. I can tell you I was worried. Well, on Saturday night, just as fate would have it, I received offers from both companies. Mr. Griffith requested that I see him that night, but I told him it was impossible as I was expecting the lady whom I was about to marry, and couldn't leave her alone. Just imagine me—out of employment, about to be married—putting off the great D. W. Griffith—till the following Thursday, but that's what I did. And after that, I was accepted for the part of the grocer boy in "The White Rose." (Other picture on page 1)

CAROL DEMPSTER in "AMERICA" 44TH ST. THEATRE

"AMERICA" MONTH'S BEST FILM

Comedy and Adventure in Current Movie Diet

By McELLIOTT.

A man on a horse. Dust in the quiet country road. Britishers waiting the man in a quiet covert. Thump! thump! hoofbeats on the bridge. Rat-a-tat on the colonial door, with startled householders spilling over the sill to answer Paul Revere's summons. This is one of the reasons—the horseman, I mean—why "America" is the best picture of the month. If you get no thrill from the ride of Revere through that benign countryside you are hopeless, and I give you up. But, of course, you did—or will, depending on your status so far as the Griffith film is concerned.

There was something of the same breath-taking spirit, as I remember it, in "The Birth of a Nation." A sense that you, yourself, in a prosaic enough theatre chair, were helping to make history and gain freedom. This is the hold the maker of "America" has on his optiences. He supplies nine-tenths of the action, and lets the people who pay for admission supply the remaining tenth. You are player as well as spectator. You are a friend to the lovers and a mourner for the gallant dead. You may be ashamed of your tears, but they are shed before recollection overtakes you.

Lionel Barrymore

It must be very satisfying to Mr. Griffith to sit on the sidelines and observe average fan's reaction to this picture. It must be worth all the tiresome detail work of the battles, the endless cutting, the waiting for snow to take the Valley Forge scenes.

I hear they have been retaking some bits and cutting some of the excess footage for "America," and that is good news. It was, by far, too long at the first view. There were a few too many battles, too much riding to save the stockade. Some of the same wearinesses which adorned "Orphans of the Storm."

Here's Comic Relief.

For Carol Dempster, as the lovely lady in the tale, I have only admiration. Hers is a warm, vivid and delicate drawing. Lionel Barrymore's blustering soldier stands out with a fine arrogance, and Charles Emmet Mack as the courageous dandy presents a portrait which carry with them a quite continuous reminder and flavor of their own. In the hearts of our youth America is, so to speak, born over again, so that almost in a literal sense the dawn of the Revolution becomes immortal, even as, we trust, the sun of Americanism will never set. The sanctity and inspiration of birth, like the symbolic inspiration of ever-recurring spring, leavens the whole period, and the dewy freshness of the morning is upon it.

The American Revolution had its tragic and heartrending features and episodes, of course; but somehow it does not recur to us with colors of sadness. But far differently does the Civil War affect our imaginations. No less triumphant for liberty than was the Revolution, that tremendous struggle yet contains a deep sadness—a sadness perhaps reflected in Lincoln's melancholy countenance and almost, one can fancy, prophetically limned in the wonderful and majestic face of Webster. It is as if America, having at that time attained to the full stature of manhood, manfully acknowledged moral responsibility for the evil done to Negro and Indian. The sole meaning the Revolution [illegible] making to any [illegible] and smoothly [illegible] the world transgressions of the Revolutionary struggle. But the sole basis of the civil war, the compromises of the Constitution, the compromises of the Revolutionary period, that weakened [illegible] and monstrous growth, more remembered by American humanity and [illegible] [illegible] the sacrifices made to expiate the sins of America. [illegible] [illegible] and smoothly [illegible] the world transgressions of the Revolutionary struggle. But the sole basis of the civil war, the compromises of the Constitution, the compromises of the Revolutionary period, that weakened [illegible] and monstrous growth, more remembered by American humanity and [illegible] [illegible] the sacrifices made to expiate the sins of America. [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

CAMBRIDGE SCHOOL CHILDREN CAN SEE "AMERICA" FREE

The Cambridge Tribune Will Give Fifty Tickets to the Majestic Theatre Each Week For the Best Essays by the Youth of This City on "The High Lights of American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country"—Contest Open to All the School Children of Cambridge.

Commencing with next week's run at the Majestic, of "America," the thrilling picture by David Wark Griffith, tracing the American Revolution from its inception to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, the Cambridge Tribune will give fifty tickets a week to Cambridge school youth who send to this paper the best essays—not exceeding 500 words—on "The High Lights in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country."

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH, Producer of "America"

The contest will be open to all school children of Cambridge, those over 12 who win, receiving one ticket, and those under 12, two tickets, in order to conform to Majestic Theatre rules requiring parent with child.

Dean Chester N. Greenough of Harvard has kindly consented to judge the essays and a sub-committee under the Dean will pass on grammar, punctuation, and legibility so look out, boys and girls, everything counts.

This gives Cambridge school youth a chance to see the best American picture yet made, at its only showing in New England for some time at the finest theatre in Boston—at orchestra seats.

The Tribune undertakes this contest in its educational works of the screen.

Unless the Tribune is mistaken the note struck by the school children of Cambridge in these essays on Griffith's play "America," and the reviews by these youths run in this publication will result in some serious thinking in New York and Hollywood studios. At any rate the contest is unique in that it "starts something" in motion picture promotion.

"America" was shown for the first time in Boston at the Majestic theatre this week. It shows the rise of rebellion against the tyranny of George III, the first call to arms, the ride of Paul Revere, the stand of the patriots against British regulars at Lexington and Concord Bridge, the Battle of Bunker Hill and the Signing of the Declaration of Independence.

It shows Washington and his tattered army at Valley Forge, and at the end, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. All these dark but glorious days are here again in Griffith's picture and George Washington, Patrick Henry, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Thomas Jefferson and the Minute men of Lexington live again on the screen.

The Tribune will give fifty tickets a week to Cambridge school youth to see this picture. Send essays to "America" editor Cambridge Tribune, Harvard Square. We will publish the best essays and reviews of the picture by boys and girls who see it.

JOHN L. S. POLL
Who Made Historical Arrangements

ROBERT E. LEFFLER
Who Made Musical Arrangements

THE CAST

Nathan Holden.....Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague.....Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague.....Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague
Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams.....Lee Beggs
John Hancock.....John Dunton
King George III.....Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt.....Charles Bennett
Lord Chamberlain.....Downing Clark
Thomas Jefferson.....Frank Walsh
Patrick Henry.....Frank McGlynn, Jr.
George Washington.....Arthur Dewey
Richard Henry Lee.....P. R. Scammon
Captain Walter Butler..Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague.....Sidney Deane
General Gage.....W. W. Jones
Captain Montour.....E. Rosenfan
Chief of Senecas, Hiakatoo, Harry Semalls
Paul Revere.....Harry O'Neill
Captain John Parker.....H Van Bousen
Major Pictairn.....Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker.....James Milaidy
Colonel Prescott.....H. Koser
Major General Warren..Michael Donovan
Captain Hare.....Louis Wolheim
Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Brant
Riley Hatch
Marquis de Lafayette....H. Paul Doucet
Edmund Burke.....W. Rising
Personal servant of Miss Montague
Daniel Carney
Household servant at Ashley Court
E. Scanlon
Lord North.....Emil Hoch
A Refugee Mother.....Lucille La Verne
(By special courtesy)
Major Strong.....Edwin Holland

CAMBRIDGE YOUTH DIED FOR FLAG

Private Manuel A. Gill, Rindge boy, gassed in action, died March 9, 1923, after years of suffering in the hospitals. This Cambridge school boy, who "did his bit" for America, was the son of Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Gill, long residents of this city. He graduated from Kelly school and the evening high school, went to Rindge Technical school for a year, and was one of the first American volunteers, joining the

MANUEL A. GILL

French Motor Corps, afterwards the United States forces. He now lies buried in the soldiers' lot, Cambridge Cemetery. Thus this lad, responding, at 19, to the nation's call, and laying down his life for our country after years of suffering, at the period of life when most young men are fitting themselves for life, becomes the modern prototype of the heroes of the Revolution pictorized in Griffith's great film, "America."

Paul Revere

CAROL DEMPSTER
as Nancy Montague

NEIL HAMILTON
As Nathan Holden

Minute Men

The Battle of Lexington

Patrick Parker

Surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown

ROBERT E. LEFFLER
Who Made Musical Arrangements

The Battle of Bunker Hill

LLOYD'S
SPECIALISTS IN THE ART OF FITTING
EYEGLASSES and SPECTACLES
Prompt and Efficient Service
1 BRATTLE STREET
HARVARD SQUARE
ANDREW J. LLOYD COMPANY
OPTICIANS, INC.

My Picture Play Magazine March 1924

Mr. Griffith's Next Production

It is to be called "America" and it will treat the American Revolution in somewhat the same way that "The Birth of a Nation" treated the Civil War.

By James Randall Elliott

Miss Irma Harrison, who will play a Colonial belle.

FOR several months D. W. Griffith has been traveling up and down the Atlantic seaboard, taking scenes in historic locations for his forthcoming picture, "America," which is to treat the Revolutionary War in a manner similar to that in which "The Birth of a Nation" pictured the Civil War.

Predicting that a picture in the making will be a "masterpiece" is a hazardous business, but in view of the effort that is being expended on this undertaking, its outcome will be awaited with more than ordinary interest, for there is every reason for anticipating that it will be a significant contribution to the screen. "We believe that it is going to outbirth the 'Birth' and uncover the 'Wagon,'" one of Mr. Griffith's associates said enthusiastically, in commenting to me about it recently. Mr. Griffith, naturally, is making no such boastful comparisons as this, but his remarks about the theme of the picture indicate its possibilities.

Carol Dempster plays "The Girl."

"What we hope to do," he told me, some months ago, between the scenes on which he was working at the little village of Somers, New York, "is to show through what heroic efforts this great continent was settled and freedom was won by the American colonists, and how that freedom which they secured laid the foundations for the peace and prosperity which we now enjoy and which we so little appreciate."

That is a big theme. It is a theme as big as that of "The Birth of a Nation." And Griffith's aim undoubtedly is to make this picture, if possible, as great, or even greater than "The Birth."

As a historical record it can scarcely fail to be of great value. Months were spent in research work before a single location was visited. Every possible aid has been extended to all the American historical societies by the government, and by individuals. Scenes have been shot in every available historic spot where [illegible] landmarks have been preserved, and where these have changed, sets were erected on locations bearing a semblance to the [illegible] which the [illegible] unearthed in museums and libraries.

Neil Hamilton will be the hero of the picture.

Such a location was the one shown on the opposite page—the one at Somers, New York, where the Indian attack upon a colonial settlement, and the retreat from the Battle of Concord, were filmed last summer.

This drawing, which was made from sketches done on the spot, shows Griffith's method of directing one of the big scenes. Like a general directing a battle, he was stationed high up on a hillside, where he could communicate with some of the near-by camera men by megaphone, and with his assistant directors, stationed at different points on the location, by means of a specially installed telephone system.

The filming of scenes at this location alone was a huge undertaking. Before the company went there, every available room in every near-by farmhouse was engaged, as well as all of the rooms in the historic "Elephant Inn." In addition several camps were erected. Some three hundred workmen, most of them skilled mechanics, carpenters, painters, and the like, arrived first to build the necessary roads, erect the sets, and install the various equipment necessary.

Then came the company, and with them some four or five hundred soldiers from Fort Meyer, whose military discipline and training made them the ideal type of extras to represent the British troops. Several weeks were spent on this location, and on the last day they staged the big scene, in which sets erected for miles around were burned.

And this was but a small part of the entire undertaking, for a list of the locations visited would read like an index to a history of the Revolution. At this writing Mr. Griffith is doing interiors at his Mamaroneck studio, where he has reproduced the British House of Lords, where bits of the historical debates that took place at the time of the Revolution will be enacted. And a little later, when snow has fallen, he will set out again to old scenes at Valley Forge.

There will be, of course, a love story running through the picture, in which Carol Dempster will play "The Girl" and Neil Hamilton "The Boy." But in addition to these romantic and fictitious characters there will be a long list of historic ones including Washington, John Adams, John Hancock, Alexander Hamilton, Patrick Henry, Paul Revere, Mad Anthony Wayne, General Gage, [illegible] Charlotte Burke, King George, the Earl of [illegible], Sir Guy Carleton, Baron de Kalb, Count Pulaski, Count Rochambeau, Baron de Grasse, and others.

Real Life (page) April 1921

THE SCREEN MIRROR 1/19/24

Carol Dempster

Who will have the leading feminine role in AMERICA, D. W. Griffith's next picture.

—Photo by Frank Bees

"AMERICA"

Sonntagsblatt Staats-Zeitung und Herold.

ang. No. 9. Section B New York, Sonntag, den 2. März 1924. Trade-mark Registered in U. S. Patent Office Sonnta

D. W. Griffith hat dem Amerikanischen Publikum eine Epik gegeben, die für immer in seiner letzten und größten Produktion „America" fortleben wird; ein Lichtbild, welches jetzt im Forty-fourth Street Theatre gezeigt wird. Das obige Bild zeigt Charles Mack in der Rolle von Charles Montague, John Strong als John Holden und Carol Dempster als Miß Montague. Das mittlere Bild zeigt den dritten Sturmangriff der britischen Soldaten in der Schlacht von Bunker Hill und die „Minute Men", welche zwar weit in der Minderheit waren, aber den Briten einen heißen Lebenskampf lieferten. Das rechte Bild zeigt Paul Revere im kühnen Ritt, um die Amerikaner vor dem Herannahen der Engländer zu warnen und bereit zu stellen. Dieser Ritt wird ewig in Ihrem Gedächtnis bleiben. Durch den Ritt war Revere in der Lage, die britischen Soldaten, die ihm heiß auf den Fersen waren, zu überlisten und wir sehen das brave Pferd samt Reiter über Zäune springen, Klippen nehmen, Wasserströme durchschwimmen, eine wilde Jagd um die Wachtposten beizeiten zum Kampf gegen die Bedrücker vorzubereiten. Kurzum, ein Bild, das zu sehen sich jeder leisten müßte. Reveres wilde Jagd allein ist der Mühe wert. Der hiesige Herald, in Frank Munsey's Besitz, meint, das Bild sei „zu anti-englisch". Es ist zwar nicht so, wie der Herald sagt. „America" ist Historie. Griffith hat keinen Versuch gemacht, die Engländer in einem schlechteren Licht zu zeigen, als die Geschichte es uns lehrt und sie es ohnehin schon waren.

Charles Cayehart verlegt „The Chiffon Girl" morgen abend vom Lyric ins Jolson's 59. Street Theatre. Eleanor Painter spielt die Titelrolle. Das Stück ist eine lustige Musikposse mit einschmeichelnden Melodien, hübschen Tänzerinnen, viel Prohibitionswitzen und allem was dazu gehört.

"AMERICA", Griffiths' latest, makes History live again

Lionel Barrymore and Carol Dempster represent the opposing forces of Britain and the Colonies in D. W. Griffith's screen epic, "America."

New film is masterpiece of dramatic and historic art—"Happiness," "The Unwelcomed Guest" and "Damaged Hearts" among other pictures of the week

Reviewed by John W. Vanderveer

"AMERICA"

Griffith Recreates a Nation's Dreams

The spectator is caught up in an emotional cyclone which deposits him three hours later, gasping, back again in a time which, for the nonce, has ceased to exist—the present.

The acting responsibilities fall upon Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton. Each is incomparably fine. Barrymore, in a remarkably interesting part, is brilliantly decisive and forceful. Miss Dempster convinces us, after duly calm consideration, that she is the one finely gifted and really beautiful woman on the screen.

It is needless to advise you to see "America." We might make ourselves useful, however, by suggesting a second and a third, and perhaps, a fourth trip to it. You will tire of it only when you tire of romance in its greatest sense.

Springfield (Ill) Journal 3/2/24

Keeps Faith With Facts In Producing New Film "America"

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

Photoplay Magazine Chicago Apr 1924

Cambridge Tribune March 1 1924

TRIBUNE OFFERS FIFTY PRIZES TO CAMBRIDGE SCHOOL CHILDREN

"The High Lights in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country"—Contest Closes March 30—Fifty Tickets to Griffith's New Play "America," Auspices Daughters of the American Revolution, the Prizes

Commemorating the first serious attempt to pictorially visualize American history—running true to fact and American traditions—and helping to prepare the way for this nation's celebration of the third century of its existence in 1930, and the second centennial in 1926 of the signing of the Declaration, the Cambridge Tribune will give 50 tickets to the picture "America" created by David W. Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution which commences a run at the Majestic Theatre March 6th.

The contest will be open to all school children in Cambridge. The judges will be the officers of the Cambridge Historical Society, who will be asked to serve, and there are no restrictions except each essay must be 500 words or under.

Now here you are, boys and girls, grab it. All the contestants will have the same chance and the essays will be published in the Tribune so you can see what wins the most. No fancy words or fancy ideas, the greatest stress will be placed on knowledge of history and good judgment will probably be shown by the judges in awards of the prizes to winners.

The great picture marks the first attempt to create genuine educational motion picture—a reproduction of the great events that go to make up the history of the United States. Mr. Griffith, though the general idea of the picture belongs to the Daughters of the American Revolution, has put real life into it.

In the prize essays will be asked questions of the history of America, the meaning and the spirit of this country, the men and women who made this country, the great events in the history of this country, the great men and women who made the history of this country, the great events in the history of this country, the great men and women who made the history of this country, the great events in the history of this country, the great men and women who made the history of

Canton (Ohio) News March 2 1924

Detroit Mich Saturday Night March 1 1924

GRIFFITH IS MAKING "AMERICA" FOR D. A. R.

NEW YORK: — When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America," as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth of a Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belle, Revolutionary descendants and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably, in reproduction of big battle scenes—giant movie cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to tell them in small companies, for sale in moderate pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the pirated scenes and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The complexity of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the early battles of the War of Independence with exact fidelity to historical accuracy; that he can not, as he has been used at ready, do more than shadow outline these scenes in the manner that thousands of camera men photographed the battle of Gettysburg, and that when completed the film will actually have cost more than a hundred times as much as a feature of a full reel should to produce in order to be a full reel, and that when completed the film will actually have cost more than a hundred times as much as a feature of a full reel should to produce in order to be a full reel.

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Indeed the production of "America" may be said to have taken on the aspect of a national revival of patriotism, and particularly of a renaissance of interest in the ideals and traditions of Revolutionary days. Whole townships have turned out to watch the rehearsing and the taking of scenes, and thousands who never saw a motion picture camera, and who had forgotten there ever was a War of Independence, have had an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the same and treasure chests of their museums, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, swords and drums, to epaulets and costumes resembling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this authenticity it has been possible to use as "supers" in "America" historical relics never before photographed instead of pirated for the screen.

Griffith's aim in presenting his historical narrative, "America," has been to present through the medium of the motion picture, the story of the birth of our country, in contrast to the presentation of a single episode in the history of the country, as in the case of the "Birth of a Nation," and "Intolerance," and "Orphans of the Storm," and "Hearts of the World," and "Way Down East," and "Broken Blossoms," and "Dream Street," and "Isn't Life Wonderful," and "Dream Street," and "Isn't Life Wonderful," and "Dream Street," and "Isn't Life Wonderful

Springfield (Ohio) News March 2 1924

GRIFFITH IS MAKING "AMERICA" FOR D. A. R.

NEW YORK.—When the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America," as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth of a Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants and the enlisted men of the United States army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie camera men attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in outdoor pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the pirates' cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the entire battle of the War of Independence with strict fidelity to historical accuracy; that this and other of his films have been cited officially, and more than one has been used as a textbook in the schools, and that thousands of copies of his films have been crated and shipped to the country of Italy through the courtesy of the United States War Department, and a fortnight in Paris was devoted to a few showings of his films, which sometimes have caused actually have caused riots in the theaters where they were shown.

Although Griffith's "America" is not a film of his photoplay, he is using a cast of thousands of people, and has spent months in preparing the production of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the cue from the cause and treasures chests of their ancestors, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from plates, spoons and drums, to carbines and muskets, something with sage, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as scenes in "America" historical relics never before photographed, and never, of course, they replicas.

Griffith's aim in preparing his current screen play has been achieved several months through the assistance of a special bureau of research. This bureau, which for years has been connected with the motion picture industry in personnel, including a similar bureau for Cecil B. DeMille's "Ten Commandments" and "Manslaughter" which was here for the Rialto last week, has been flooded with requests from historical organizations which wish to aid with historical data or to appear in the picture; with valuable historical information from students of the Revolutionary period; with requests from municipalities which figured as the sites of Revolutionary incidents for him to bring his company and take pictures in their cities, towns and hamlets.

Indeed the production of "America" may be said to have taken on the aspect of a national revival of patriotism, and particularly of a renaissance of interest in the ideals and traditions of Revolutionary days. Whole townships have turned out to watch the rehearsing and the taking of scenes, and thousands who never saw a motion picture camera, and who had forgotten there ever was a War of Independence, have had an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction

FREE to Watertown Boys & Girls -- Absolutely FREE

Reprint from THE WATERTOWN SUN

"SUN" WILL GIVE BOYS AND GIRLS 50 TICKETS A WEEK TO "AMERICA"

— E. H. Packard —

Boys and girls of Watertown!

Here's a good chance for you to earn, without much trouble—and right in line with your school work—a complimentary ticket to see perhaps the best motion picture ever made, at the best theatre in Boston—the Majestic. Just listen!

THE WATERTOWN SUN has made arrangements with David Wark Griffith's Boston manager so that each week from 25 to 50 Watertown school boys and girls can see Griffith's great picture "America," now showing at the Majestic Theatre.

This picture is a story of the American Revolution from the Battle of Lexington to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. It shows the gathering of the Minutemen, the ride of Paul Revere, the Battle of Lexington, the Battle of Concord Bridge, the Battle of Bunker Hill, Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the conflicts with the Indians, the British Parliament, the British Court and King George III, the American Congresses and signing of the Declaration of Independence, the acceptance by Washington to command the Colonial troops, the stirring speeches and leadership of Washington, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson in the Colonies, and Edmund Burke and William Pitt in the British Parliament.

In fact we have here for the first time some reviews of the film by Watertown boys and girls.

Mr. Griffith is personally very much interested in this contest. With the exception of Cambridge it is the first thing of the kind ever attemped in connection with motion picture productions. He is deeply interested in what he terms his life-work, namely motion pictures that will make better citizens, better boys and girls and greater love for our country and its institutions.

Your essays, boys and girls, will be published in the SUN. Mr. Griffith will read every one of them. He will not only read your essays but also your criticisms of "America," after you have seen the picture. The SUN will publish the pictures of some of the boys and girls taking part, so if you have a picture of yourself, send it to the SUN with your essay.

Now, boys and girls of Watertown, "put your best foot forward"—AND GET BUSY. Remember that you hail from old Watertown, the "Mother Town" of New England; that here two Provincial Congresses met, and here the greatest men of the Revolution debated and took action which committed our country to the greatest events of all time. Here Washington addressed the patriots in stirring words; here President Coolidge's ancestors settled on their arrival from England.

We shall mail copies of the SUN con-

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH, Producer of "America"

Paul Revere

NEIL HAMILTON
As Nathan Holden

CAROL DEMPSTER
as Nancy Montague

Capt. Parker and the Minute Men

The Battle of Lexington

Patriots of Massachusetts in Parliament

March 8 1924

THE HARVARD CRIMSON

THE CRIMSON PLAYGOER

AMERICA: A SUPER FILM

D. W. Griffith Presents His Greatest Picture Since "The Birth of a Nation", at the Majestic

In its general effect "America" is the most powerful moving-picture that has been seen since the production if "The Birth of a Nation", many years ago. And once again D. W. Griffith is responsible. His film is probably the most highly emotional, vivid and grandiose spectacle that theatre goers have ever seen. It bristles with a spirit of the fighting patriotism of the Revolution, and blends with it an intense love story of one Massachusetts Captain and the daughter of a Virginian Tory; adding battle-scenes, breathless rides, and hair-breadth rescues. It is high melodrama with the power which Mr. Griffith knows how to give.

Pictures Historical Scenes First

The first part of the picture is hardly more than a succession of historical scenes, vividly pictured, and joined together by a thin thread of actual plot. The beauty of the photography and the turbulence of the action carry it through. George III is pictured as the king "who ever warred with freedom and the free," George Washington is remarkably acted by Arthur Dewey without undue exaggeration; and Samuel Adams and John Hancock are brought forth as the guiding spirits of the Northern Colonies. Paul Revere's ride and the Battle of Lexington are as vivid as screen art can make them. And finally, the Battle of Bunker Hill, and the winter spent at Valley Forge picture the indomitable spirit of "America."

Second Part Produces Great Affect

But in the second part the Drama opens out, freeing itself from the strictness of absolute history. Nathan Holden—acted by Neil Hamilton, and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) hold the chief interest. Neil Hamilton proves by his work in this picture that he is worthy of being classed with the greatest of cinema actors. This film should make his fame, as "The Four Horesmen" made that of Rudolph Valentino. Then, besides the leading couple, Lionel Barrymore is effective as the cruel Captain Butler, who directs the froquois raids, and ravages the American outposts. About these three a rapidly shifting melodrama of death, passion, and mad action revolves with bewildering intensity. Indian raids, banquets, panoramic rides of rescue, fort-storming, and cavalry charges of fighting patriots succeed each other. Deep touches of pathos, and fleeting moments of humor—some ridiculous, some gruesome—are mixed through. The scenes are all emotional to the extreme. When the play is over there is hardly a normal heart in the theatre. The effect is much the same as that of a football game, leaving every spectator limp from exhaustion.

The two elements which stand out most vividly in later perspective are the perfect photography, and the fine acting of Neil Hamilton. But the effect of the whole is what makes the picture the "super-film" that it is.

Indianapolis (Ind) Star 3/9/24

The Master of Mamaroneck, so-called, fared little better than Mr. Hearst at the hands of the first-nighters. The critics found Griffith's film of the American revolution, "America," an "average movie melodrama," and some were puzzled "to understand how a director of Griffith's experience and perception could have gone so far wrong." Others noticed that he suffered from the Hirshfield influence and succumbed to the temptation to paint the British the blackest black.

That Griffith has not turned out another "Birth of a Nation" one might easily deduct from the following account by Robert E. Sherwood in the New York Herald:

"'America' is incoherent from the start; its scenes are choppy and disconnected. But for a long time no one minds this. Mr. Griffith has only to display the one word, 'Concord,' on the screen to conjure up in the minds of his audience a picture of a rude bridge arching a flood and of an embattled farmer firing the shot heard 'round the world.

"Through these scenes of authentic American history he weaves his fictional story, and does it well. No one can resent the introduction of romance as long as it keeps its place. But then this romantic scene begins to dominate the whole revolution, and 'America' moves further and further away from the main issue. Washington and his battles move off into the dim distance. The very scene changes from the center of activity to little known battlefields in upper New York state, and the characters who move about on the screen are people who are unknown to the audience. In an era which produced such exciting figures as Nathan Hale, Benjamin Franklin, Lafayette, Alexander Hamilton, Israel Putnam, Maj. Andre, John Paul Jones, Gen. Burgoyne and Benedict Arnold, it seems silly to concentrate attention on anonymous individuals like Nathan Holden, Capt. Walter Butler and Capt. Hare.

"He started out with the most magnificent struggle for independence that the world has ever known, and then resolved it into a private quarrel between Lionel Barrymore and several other actors."

D. W.'s Fight.

The blame for the flatness of "America" should not fall entirely upon Griffith's shoulders. Joe Dannenberger, mainstay of the Film Daily, condoles with the director: "What between the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Colonial Dames, at least 3,423 historians and every descendant of the revolution who lives in New England, Griffith must have had his troubles in deciding just what to do with 'America.'"

The chances are that, if the truth were known, D. W. added gray hairs to his collection, and the chances are that 'America' as made is far different from what D. W. would like to have had it."

Griffith's production of "America" recalls, incidentally, that the last time a man made a similar picture he was thrown in prison. About seven years ago Robert Goldstein, a Los Angeles theatrical costumer, decided to make a film called "The Spirit of '76." His movie experience was limited to providing costumes for films, but he lacked no confidence in his abilities and made his own version of what occurred in 1776.

Mr. Goldstein had the misfortune to release his film during the war and after it had been shown a few times he was charged with circulating propaganda detrimental to the cause of the allies, England specifically, and was subsequently sentenced to spend ten years in San Quentin prison. He is probably still there unless he has won a discharge by virtue of good behavior.

If any more of Griffith's prodigious undertaking the experience of "America," "Dream Street," "One Exciting Night" and "The White Rose," a reaction is bound to set in to his disadvantage. Already Rex Ingram has been groomed to succeed to Griffith's high place in the estimate of Singapore and Arthur H. Weave puts in a word for Cecil B. DeMille in the Philadelphia Public Ledger: "We're going to go on record as believing that DeMille, with all his 'Adam's Ribs' and 'Manslaughters' is potentially a far greater artist than Griffith ever thought of being. DeMille's bokum—and it is terrible bokum, we will admit—is somebodies bokum, but Griffith's bokum is international. To the man himself it is the finest article

Ft. Wayne (Ind) Journal-Gazette 3/9/24

Dreamy D. W. Griffith Comes Forth with Realistic Film of "America"

By MAURICE HENLE
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, Mar. 8.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: 'The Sacrifice'—to the Forty-fourth street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their indorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffin plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has actually reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aid.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Lowell (Mass) Leader March 12, 1924

NEWEST FILM STAR IS A LOWELL BOY

Neil Hamilton, Star of "America" Attended St. Patrick's Boys' School.

With a good deal of pride Lowell may look up D. W. Griffith's latest big film "America" now showing in Boston, for in the leading role is Neil Hamilton, product of the Acre district and of St. Patrick's Boys school.

Young Hamilton—for he is only 23 years of age at the present time—is on his way to be one of the biggest of the country's screen stars and Griffith, who found him playing on the legitimate stage, has predicted that his success will be as great as that of Rudolph Valentino. At the present time he is under a three-and-half years' contract with the great director and the latter is considering plans to lend him to an international company, making a film in Paris.

NEIL HAMILTON

Hamilton's rise to the leading role in "America" reads like a fairy story. For some time he was connected with "The Better Ole" company and played later as leading man to Grace George. He was later connected with a stock company in Brooklyn and from there he broke into the moving picture game, in minor parts to be sure.

His success in the movies was assured after he had taken a couple of parts and it was not long before he was doing a second part in "The White Rose." It was in this venture that the young man came under the watchful eye of D. W. Griffith who is eternally on the watch for screen-star possibilities. Griffith made him an offer which he accepted and right away he was given the leading role in "America" which is declared to be among the biggest films Griffith has ever made.

Mr. Hamilton was born in Lynn but moved to Lowell when but a couple of years of age. The family settled in Willie avenue, near the North common and the boy was sent to St. Patrick's school where he was a great favorite.

His mother is a Lowell girl, who might well be rememebered for her maiden name of Lizzie O'Neill, sister of "Jerry" O'Neill, janitor of the Normal school and living at Waugh and Willie streets. The father is a Lynn man, Alexander Hamilton, and the family is now living in West Haven, Conn.

Mrs. Hamilton has been visiting in Lowell over the week-end, staying with Mrs. Joseph D. Lannan at 119 Bowers street. She was enthusiastic at her boy's success and predicts a brilliant future for him.

"Neil got his start in dramatics in Lowell," said Mrs. Hamilton in discussing the boy's talents. "You see we were all inclined that way when we lived in Lowell and we used to put on many entertainments for the orphanages and Catholic societies of the city.

"At that time Neil was going to St. Patrick's school and the brothers loved him very much. He was a bright scholar and when we left Lowell and went to West Haven he showed a desire to follow his vocation and enter into the dramatic world. For a few years he was connected with small companies but gradually he broadened out and today he has been signed by Mr. Griffith for the lead in his new picture.

We all saw the opening of this picture in New York a few weeks ago, said Mrs. Hamilton in discussing the boy's debut in the big picture. We all had tremendous pride in the showing and with Neil on the screen we felt a lump in our throats. We didn't expected when I saw the picture I knew the picture would be a success. We felt that it was only a matter of time when Neil would be in demand to take leading parts in pictures. We are very happy in the success of our boy and we are confident that he will be a great success in the movies."

Toronto (Canada) World March 9 1924

ENGLISH ATTACKED BY D. W. GRIFFITH

According to the New York papers D. W. Griffith has been busy tail-twisting in his new picture, "America." Regarding his attacks on the British, the reviewer of the New York Herald has this to say:—

There was undoubtedly a motive in Mr. Griffith's selection of a scene for the enactment of the latter part of his drama, and it is not a creditable motive. He diverted his characters to the grain fields of New York State, presumably because it was there that the British perpetrated their most ferocious atrocities. Co-operating with the Indians, the soldiers of King George waged ruthless warfare on the defenceless inhabitants. They performed deeds of cruelty as frightful as any of those blamed on the Germans in Belgium. "Wipe out the American wolves," is Captain Butler's command to his men. "Spare none of them. The little wolves will grow into big ones." To carry out such brutal orders many of the British soldiers disguised themselves as Indians so that they might commit acts which would be considered beyond the pale for white men.

Mr. Griffith rubs these episodes in with all the relish of a Hirshfield erasing British propaganda from American history books. He represents the English in the same black tones that he used to paint the negroes in "The Birth of a Nation." He gives them no quarter.

I don't attempt to dispute the truth of these representations. But I do question their usefulness in the picture, and I violently condemn their exaggeration. This phase of the Revolution was a relatively unimportant one as compared with the activities at Lake Champlain, Bennington, Saratoga, Long Island, Princeton, Monmouth and in the Southern States. In calling his picture "America," with the implication that he will set forth the principal facts concerning the birth of this nation, Mr. Griffith promises far more than he gives.

Thus, "America" is entirely lacking in the significance of its title.

Buffalo (NY) Times March 10 1924

THE FILM FLAPPER

By INEZ KLUMPH

"Do you realise that the motion picture industry is changing rapidly?" demanded the Flapper as if an earthquake were imminent.

I shook my head.

"Bigger and better pictures?" I asked hopefully.

"No—that is, perhaps, but that isn't what I'm talking about. I mean the way the big people work nowadays.

"For instance, take Lionel Barrymore. When Mr. Griffith was making 'America' he wanted Lionel Barrymore for one part. Barrymore was doing 'Laugh Clown, Laugh' on the stage, and was awfully busy, but also wanted to do the picture. So he did it, piecemeal. That is, he'd work by the day. That meant that all his scenes had to be made during the few days that he worked. They'd take scenes right up to his, and then he'd come out and do his, you see. The price they paid him was simply stupendous, of course, but isn't it characteristic of the great D. W. that he'd rather work under those conditions and pay that salary, to have the right man for that part, than engage someone else, who couldn't play it so well and would be cheaper, and could work under ordinary conditions.

"Then along came Elliott Dexter. He was wanted for an important part of a picture, that was to be specially made, but he didn't want to give much time to it. So finally he said he'd give it a day—that he'd arrive at eight, but must be through by six-thirty.

"And the people who were making the picture wanted him enough to pay the whooping salary he asked, and do his part in a day. They were wise, of course.

"Now, what I want to know is this. Isn't this going to change the old system entirely? The first thing we know, everyone will be doing it. Actors will be engaged just for short terms and then will work three times as hard while they do work. Why, there won't be any more long-term contracts."

"I don't see that that matters," I returned. "Any man who can get over a thousand dollars for working one day would be silly not to take it—and why shouldn't he work that way, instead of weeks at a time? If the industry is affected, it will be change for the better. They won't have time for so many meaningless close-ups."

"I never thought of that," murmured the Flapper, delightedly.

Huntington (W Va) Advertiser 2/14/24

"America" Seen On N. Y. Screen

D. W. Griffith Realistically Reproduces Scenes of Country's Founding.

By Maurice Henle

New York, Mar. 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street Theatre a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feel a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location.)

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere road looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller, Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale, Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish frim Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore.) whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Syracuse (NY) American March 11 1924

GRIFFITH FILM PLAYS UPON EMOTIONS

"America," However, Shows "D. W." Played Up Many Historical Incidents.

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS.

NEW YORK, March 11.—"America" has a most devastating effect upon one's nervous system. David Ward Griffith, with his extraordinary combination of artist and showman, lets his P. T. Barnum tendencies so far run away with the film in the last half that the emotional tug at one's heart-strings is actually unbearable.

In the first moment of passing through this stage of interest enhancer we are inclined to judge Mr. Griffith's epic of the Revolutionary War solely on its audience appeal. We can only speak of his picture as it relates to our feelings, not from the critical standpoint that usually measures the merits of a motion picture review.

We can only speak in the spirit of Paul Revere's ride, which brought the most glorious hours of our early, we can only respond to the patriotism of the great young Atlanta Man, who thought and dreamed of the freedom of these days, who fought and died in the early battles of Bunker Hill and Lexington and who spent that long and cold winter at Valley Forge.

[illegible]

Lowell (Mass) Courier-Citizen March 13 1924

LOWELL BOY STAR OF NEW FILM, "AMERICA"

Neil Hamilton, Product of "Acre," Now Griffith's Leading Man.

Neil Hamilton, star in D. W. Griffith's great film, "America," is Lowell's latest addition to the hall of fame.

This young star, who is one of Griffith's latest finds, is now away up in the movie world and it is said that he will be a second Valentino for popularity. He is a Lowell product, having lived for many years in the Acre district and having attended St. Patrick's Boys school. His parents lived in Willie avenue, off the North common, and later moved to West Haven, Conn., where they now reside.

Hamilton's rise to the leading role in "America" reads like a fairy story. For some time he was connected with "The Better Ole" company and played later as leading man to Grace George. He was later connected with a stock company in Brooklyn and from there he broke into the moving picture game, in minor parts to be sure.

His success in the movies was assured after he had taken a couple of parts and it was not long before he was doing a second part in "The White Rose." It was in this venture that the young man came under the watchful eye of D. W. Griffith who is eternally on the watch for screen-star possibilities. Griffith made him an offer which he accepted and right away he was given the leading role in "America" which is declared to be among the biggest films Griffith has ever made.

Mr. Hamilton was born in Lynn but moved to Lowell when but a couple of years of age. The family settled in Willie avenue, near the North common and the boy was sent to St. Patrick's school where he was a great favorite.

His mother is a Lowell girl, who might well be rememebered for her maiden name of Lizzie O'Neill, sister of "Jerry" O'Neill, janitor of the Normal school and living at Waugh and Willie streets. The father is a Lynn man, Alexander Hamilton, and the family is now living in West Haven, Conn.

Mrs. Hamilton has been visiting in Lowell over the week-end, staying with Mrs. Joseph D. Lannan at 119 Bowers street. She was enthusiastic at her boy's success and predicts a brilliant future for him.

"Neil got his start in dramatics in Lowell," said Mrs. Hamilton in discussing the boy's talents. "You see we were all inclined that way when we lived in Lowell and we used to put on many entertainments for the orphanages and Catholic societies of the city.

"At that time Neil was going to St. Patrick's school and the brothers loved him very much. He was a bright scholar and when we left Lowell and went to West Haven he showed a desire to follow his vocation and enter into the dramatic world. For a few years he was connected with small companies but gradually he broadened out and today he has been signed by Mr. Griffith for the lead in his new picture.

We all saw the opening of this picture in New York a few weeks ago, said Mrs. Hamilton in discussing the boy's debut in the big picture. We all had tremendous pride in the showing and with Neil on the screen we felt a lump in our throats. We didn't expected when I saw the picture I knew the picture would be a success. We felt that it was only a matter of time when Neil would be in demand to take leading parts in pictures. We are very happy in the success of our boy and we are confident that he will be a great success in the movies."

Cleveland (Ohio) Times 3/13/24

D. W. Griffith Honored by Minute Men for "America"

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and realness of the scenes at the Common, when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater luster to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

My Telegraph 3/14/24

Griffith a "Minute Man"

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event. The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph March 13 1924

GRIFFITH CONSIDERS MAKING FILM IN ROME

[illegible]

My Film Daily March 13 1924

Girls Make Offers

[illegible]

My Film Daily 3/14/24

Griffith Cuts Force

Reduces Studio Organization to Skeleton Pending Development of Future Plans

D. W. Griffith has discharged a number of employees at his Mamaroneck studio and has cut his force there down to the bone. Over 50 have been let out pending future production plans.

As pointed out in previous news items Griffith is very uncertain over future plans. It is more or less of an open secret that the problem of proper financing is an element and it is known in the trade that he experienced some difficulty in securing money on his "America" and that when the production had progressed very considerably he found a necessity to turn to outside help for funds.

The reduction at the studio has therefore been a logical move as economy must and undoubtedly should prevail. It is pointed out that Griffith is strongly in favor of making a big drive to make a big picture, but he has other problems to meet in this country.

Lord Beaverbrook and Sir Harry Lauder are also interested in the Griffith project and it is said that the Scotch comedian will be seen in a Griffith production if the plans do not miscarry.

My Review March 15 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH SIGNS TO PRODUCE PICTURE ON ROMAN HISTORY

Will Direct Filming of Big Historical Subject for the Italians

Boston (Mass) Advertiser March 9, 1924

GRIFFITH REVIVES PATRIOTIC FERVOR

His "America" Stirs Enthusiasm Like that of World War Film Days—Now Comes DeMille and His Famous "Ten Commandments"—Barbara Bennett's Dancing Debut

By H. T. PARKER

[illegible]

THURSDAY, MARCH 13, 1924

NATIONAL FAVORITE OF MR. GRIFFITH

[illegible]

Exhibitors Trade Review March 15 1924

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH, returning from Boston to New York following his great triumph there with "America," brought with him the bronze button of membership of the oldest military organization in the country, the Minute Men of Lexington. The honorary distinction was conferred upon the producer for the faithfulness with which he portrayed the battle of Lexington. The button was presented by Captain Breed, who was accompanied by fifteen members of the famous organization, on the stage of the theatre.

my American March 15 1924

Griffith Going to Rome to Make Picture for Italian Interests That Have Visions of a Hollywood; Closes Mamaroneck Studios

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH will sail on the Aquitania April 2 to make a picture in Italy. For several weeks representatives of G. Andrea Serrao, wealthy Italian banker, have been holding out tempting inducements, but it was not until last night that a cable containing the American producer's acceptance was sent to Rome.

LOUELLA O. PARSONS

"The Last Days of Pompeii" and "Cleopatra" are being considered possible vehicles, although Mr. Griffith has said that he will not make any definite plans of production until he gets to Rome and looks the situation over.

The studios at Mamaroneck have already been closed down and more than thirty persons dismissed. Rosie and James Smith, cutters, and Billy Bitzer, his camera man, will accompany him. Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack, under contract, will be farmed out to other companies.

Famous Players-Lasky, it is said, have already made an offer for young Hamilton of $1,000 a week, and this has been topped by another company, offering $1,250. The contract is due to be signed any day. The plans for Carol Dempster have not yet materialized, although it is not unlikely that she may go to Italy. It depends on whether Mr. Griffith uses an all American company.

The Griffith offer is said to be inspired by a hope of making Rome the Hollywood of Europe. Charles Duell is already located there with the Lillian Gish company and other producers see the possibilities because of the climate. Before the war the Cines Company was an important factor in international motion picture production, and to-day it is said that the Italians are ambitious to make their pictures rank with the finest in the world.

MR. GRIFFITH'S acceptance of the Serrao offer will not affect his status with the United Artists Company. Albert Grey, general manager of the Griffith company, will represent him in any conferences relative to a reorganization of the company. Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and Mr. Griffith are all said to be in accord over the plans of expansion to take care of the special productions.

Boston (Mass) Transcript 3/15/24

PHOTOPLAYS NEXT WEEK

Majestic—America

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH'S newest historical romance, "America," now tenants the Majestic Theatre. The film summons as background the earlier battles of the Revolution of '76—Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill—reveals the suffer-ings of Valley Forge, and goes into details of the fighting against British and Indians in western New York. A slender thread of sentimental adventure holds the piece together; yet it prevails most in the moments when it ranges widest over Colonial legend and far-flung skirmish-line. The ride of Paul Revere makes the most thrilling incident in the whole; the rescue of the heroine by the hurrying horsemen—incidental interlude in a Griffithian work—brings conclusion. Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and a lengthy cast are pliable and expressive material to the director's purposes. Rounding out the second week.

Newark (NJ) Star-Eagle March 15 1924

FOR his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, The Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common, when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, The Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Captain E. F. Breed, of Lexington.

In his presentation, Captain Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of The Battle of Lexington."

my Journal March 15 1924

CAROL DEMPSTER, "America," Fourty-fourth Street.

my Review March 15, 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH SIGNS TO PRODUCE PICTURE ON ROMAN HISTORY

Will Direct Filming of Big Historical Subject for the Italians

D. W. Griffith accepted an offer today from Italian bankers to go to Rome within three weeks to plan an elaborate motion picture production. The Italian group, headed by Commissioner G. Andrea Serrao, K. C. B. E., negotiated for the Italians, who say a successful Griffith production would help to establish Italy as the Hollywood of Europe. The theme to be filmed will be of a national character as "America," Griffith's patriotic film of the Revolutionary War.

Buffalo Express Commercial March 15 1924

Lee Shubert intends to send Artists and Models to London in June. The production will make a tour of the principal cities, headed by Boston, before it leaves this country.

"America is the biggest hit as a film that Broadway has ever seen."—Colgate Baker in New York Review. D. W. Griffith made it.

my Telegraph March 15 1924

D. W. Griffith, Who Sails on April 2 for Rome to Confer With Syndicate Over Picture Which Will Restore National Prestige in Film Industry.

Boston Morning Globe March 15 1924

MOVIE FACTS AND FANCIES

NEIL HAMILTON

Times Sq Daily (New York City) 3/15/24

HISTORICAL VOGUE IN FILMS

"America" Starts State Righters Digging for Old Pictures

my Herald March 16 1924

my Telegram March 16 1924

GRIFFITH'S FILM AT 44TH ST. THEATRE

my Tribune March 16 1924

GRIFFITH'S FILM AT 44TH ST. THEATRE

Boston (Mass) Morning Globe March 16 1924

Morgan's Raiders in "America" Majestic

NEIL HAMILTON A NATIVE OF LYNN

Success in Griffith's "America" Has Not Changed Him From a Whole-Souled Boy

"To me David Wark Griffith is one of the finest and most noble men in the world," said Neil Hamilton, speaking of D. W. Griffith, producer of "America."

The hero of the film at the Majestic Theatre, who has been called a "second Rudolph Valentino" by Mr Griffith, has a deep respect for the man who has advanced him to his present status of leading man for one of the greatest photoplays of the decade.

Hamilton, born in Lynn, and educated in Athol, this State, has nothing of the screen star about his manner. He is a simple, whole-souled boy, whose every act and word reveal an unusually beautiful nature. And he is sincerity itself.

Characteristic of him was his remark when, following the premiere of "America" in New York, he was told that he had "arrived," in the movie world.

Where the average boy of his age would have thought of how success meant a new automobile, plenty of spending money or similar things, Hamilton, tears glistening in his eyes, exclaimed: "Then I can have Mother and Dad take a nice long trip and enjoy themselves."

Theological Student

And as one talks with him, one realizes more and more that the big "kick" Hamilton is getting out of his success, is not so much personal satisfaction, as the happiness of bringing joy to his white-haired parents.

His theological studies have left their mark on him. His voice is low and vibrates as he discusses these nearest his heart, and there is about his personality a suggestion of the ecclesiastic.

"I gave up theology because I was convinced I was not fitted for such a career," he explained. "It may sound foolish, but the stage and the pulpit were the only careers I desired—so I finally tried the stage. I had always been a movie fan. In Athol, and later in New Haven, I went to every picture that came to town, and I read everything I could find about movies. I could tell you the color of the eyes of every star and all their history.

So it was natural that instead of trying to get on the stage in the beginning I should try to break into the movies. I will never forget the day when I left New Haven to take New York by storm, leaving the old folks at home to await my triumphant and brilliant return.

Getting His First Job

"It was the first time I had ever been away from home. When we reached Jersey at the great pier of the nationally famed ferry, I found that there was only one way to get from Jersey City to New York, that was by the ferry, and I was such a 'hick' that I went into the ferry office at the entrance of Broadway and did it to see where Broadway was.

"I did not know anyone in New York, but I had decided I was in New York to stay, and I was determined to make good. I had my ambition, my determination and my good looks, and I was sure I could get a job. I had decided I would be a leading man, and I was sure I could get a job. I had decided I would be a leading man, and I was sure I could get a job. I had decided I would be a leading man

Boston Post March 16 1924

Theatre-Goers

Carol Dempster in the gorgeous part of Nancy Montague in "America." Here she is hesitating between her loyalty to the old country and her love for Nathan. Needless to say love conquers. Patriotism and love, the two great life forces, have been marvelously welded into D. W. Griffith's great film of Revolutionary days now running for the first time at the Majestic Theatre.

My Telegraph March 16

It's a ... for Snow.

No one ever desired snow, particularly in the old days, except small boys and lumbermen. Nowadays it is in some instances a most important asset to a certain branch of industry; that is, motion pictures.

The year in the East has been most pleasantly spared from heavy snowfalls and no one has regretted it except certain producers. For instance, there was Griffith's "America" which had to rush about seeking for sufficient snow to depict the sufferings of Valley Forge. Then there was "Icebound" which had to show some New England scenes. Such were weather conditions that director William De Mille had to send forth scouts seeking enough snow to put his picture across.

Now up in Northern New York where ordinarily there may be found six to eight feet of the "beautiful," Marion Davies, the Janice Meredith Company and several battalions of United States revolutionaries are trying to discover enough snow to enable them to show some more revolutionary scenes. Although there were blizzards in Boston and snowfalls in other sections of the country reported, it only rained up around Plattsburg.

The last report was that Director E. Mason Hopper has sent scouts as far north as Canada looking for fields of snow. He may have to show the Battle of Trenton on English territory and Washington crossing the St. Lawrence instead of the Delaware. No doubt in another season or so, the prop men will have a reserve supply in cold storage to fit any kind of picture ...

My American March 16 1924

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH was the first producer to realize that he must employ exploitation if he wished to get results. Up to the time "The Birth of a Nation" was heralded as a great film drama, very little was done to promote motion pictures. Even advertising in the daily papers was done very sparingly and without much encouragement from the publishers, who did not look upon the films as anything on which to spend either time or space.

My Telegraph March 16 1924

EMBATTLED FARMERS WHOSE SHOTS WERE HEARD AROUND THE WORLD.—Desperate struggle of the American colonists against the final charge of the red coated British at Bunker Hill as portrayed in one of the thrilling scenes of Griffith's historic photoplay "America."

Detroit Mich March 16 1924.

My Telegraph Sunday March 16 1924

"Big Four" to Dissolve THOSE CANINE ACTORS

By HAROLD HEFFERNAN.

HIGH cost of distribution and unsatisfactory exploitation of their past pictures has led Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, D. W. Griffith and Charlie Chaplin to renounce the United Artists organization and go their own separate ways hereafter. Within a week it is expected these four stars will announce plans for a readjustment of their distributing affiliations. The probabilities are that the 26 branch exchanges of the United Artists will be scrapped or consolidated with some other organization that may attend to distribution for the "Big Four."

The final disposition of the future pictures of these four players is very likely to be as follows:

Doug and Mary are expected to enter upon a producing alliance with Famous Players-Lasky.

Charlie Chaplin is expected to continue his present method of sporadic production, paying little attention to actual distribution until his films have been completed.

D. W. Griffith may go abroad to produce there for a time. His future plans are perhaps the furthest from settlement of any of the "Big Four" group.

When the United Artists combine was organized four years ago, each of the four players agreed to deliver nine pictures. To date, Griffith, Fairbanks and Miss Pickford have delivered seven each. Chaplin has made only one, "A Woman of Paris."

The now-and-then policy of Chaplin is believed one of the essential reasons for the disintegration of the organization.

GRIFFITH TO MAKE GREAT FILM FOR ITALY

Director to Go to Rome to Consult With Syndicate Which Will Back Him in It.

'VE TO REHABILITATE INDUSTRY HURT BY WAR

Promoters Would Restore Trade Mark of Their Nation Throughout the World.

Negotiations have been completed and steamship passage booked whereby D. W. Griffith will sail for Rome on the Berengaria on April 2 to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. The Italian group, which is headed by Comm. G. Andrea Serrao, K. C. B. E.—prominent in the municipal government at Rome and an attorney for the British embassy in Italy—has been engaged in consultation with Mr. Griffith for several months through A. Serrao, his nephew, who has been in this country.

Mr. Griffith is expected to be in Rome on the 12th of April to begin the conferences. He has been assured already of ample financial support, which some rumors place as high as $1,000,000 American gold. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is not to make a profit so much as it is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy, which was so badly crippled by the war. It is believed that an American director of the prominence of Mr. Griffith, working with an American cast of principals, in the perfectly appointed studios of the country will be able to restore the prestige of Italian films throughout the world.

While no definite picture has been selected for Mr. Griffith's effort abroad, it is known that a number of them are under consideration, namely: "Faust," "L'Aiglon," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra" and "The Quest of the Holy Grail." The subject, however, will be decided during the conferences in Rome.

The fact of A. Serrao in prevailing upon Mr. Griffith to go to Rome for the conferences is regarded as an unusual one, for it is known that for more than four years representatives of governments and of private syndicates of different countries of Europe, especially Italy, have been vainly trying to induce the director to make an alternative picture for their purposes instead. He has turned all these down, saying that he "was most fortunate," said Mr. Serrao, recently, following a conversation in Rome in which he was informed that the world should be informed of the progress of motion pictures are in an infancy, yet seem to develop and mature with such a rapid bound that we may feel as if we were only on the fringe of the concrete and practical. I feel that the Italian people are in the mood to see the Italian trade mark throughout the world with the dignity it had attained before the war.

I feel sure that the Parliament will be influenced to do all in its power to help us to get the Italian film industry on a firm basis. We have the talent, we have the ability, we have the history, we have the scenery, we have the ... Italy is ready to respond affirmatively to all in this effort to put the Italian trade mark throughout the world with the dignity it had attained before the war.

I feel sure that the Parliament will be influenced to do all in its power to help us to get the Italian film industry on a firm basis. We have the talent, we have the ability, we have the history, we have the scenery, we have the ... Italy is ready to respond affirmatively to all in this effort to put the Italian trade mark throughout the world with the dignity it had attained before the war.

Boston American March 16 1924

SCENE FROM 'AMERICA' AT MAJESTIC THEATRE

CAROL DEMPSTER AND LIONEL BARRYMORE

Boston (Mass) Advertiser 3/17/24

Why Griffith "Cut" Boston Tea Party

One of the several dramatic incidents started by D. W. Griffith while he was making "America," and then dropped to make way for scenes that would lend more variety to the picture, was the famous Boston Tea Party.

That daring exploit would not fit in with the sacrificial character of the picture. Many other great adventures by patriots of '75 and '76 were considered and then put aside for the same reason. Carol Dempster

Mr. Griffith continues to emphasize the fact that this new production at the Majestic Theatre, with Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in romantic roles, is mainly a depiction of patriotic, though crowned with triumphs.

The complete story of the Revolution, says Griffith, is "too tremendous to be told by many pictures ..."

Boston Telegram 3/17/24

OLD STATE ST. OF 1775 IN 'AMERICA'

There is a scene in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, at the Majestic Theatre, which shows State street—then King street—Boston, as it appeared in 1775. It lasts but a minute. But it took six months to take it.

To begin with Griffith's research department had to search through voluminous masses of old documents to find an accurate description of the street and its stores. Griffith insisted that the signs over the shop windows be the same as they were in 1775, and that the windows be stocked with the same merchandise.

When the research department had finished the construction department began. Brick as exact in size and look like the bricks of the street and the shops. Lamposts were made from pictures of those that were used on the street when the Revolution was on. Hundreds of dollars and months of time for a few seconds of picture. Nothing is found in the city of Boston.

Pictures of Boston scenes were made available to their respective ... by the Boston Historical Society, the Bostonian Society, the Massachusetts Society of Colonial Dames, the Massachusetts Society of Colonial Wars

Moving Picture World (my) March 22 1924

THIS Griffith poster illustrates what is possible where copy is limited to essentials. Note the small size of Mr. Griffith's name as compared to title. This is good advertising. The poster dominates because of simplicity and absence of non-essentials in which the public has no interest. Griffith's publicity department uses the twenty-four as the big gun in the campaign—its proper function. The newspaper ads and other forms of publicity supplement it with other selling data too voluminous for inclusion on a twenty-four-sheet. Posters as effective as this one would be the rule rather than the exception if the advertising men were not hampered by legal or contractual stipulations as to "per cent. size of type."

Boston (Mass) Transcript March 17 1924

Moving Picture World (my) March 22 1924

"D.W." puts "G.W." in the MOVIES

NOTED FILM DIRECTOR PRODUCES SCREEN VERSION OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES CALLED "AMERICA."

David Wark Griffith, who directed and produced "America."

George Washington, the "father of his country," who appears in "America."

A dramatic scene from "America," with Dorothy Mackaill, as the girl, and Riley Hatch, as Brant, the Indian chief.

The surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown—one of the fine spectacular effects of the new Griffith film.

The ride of Paul Revere—only not the midnight one, apparently, of the famous poem.

A battle scene from "America," in which British regulars and Continental soldiers meet.

...reen

ITEMS ABOUT THE FILMS

Mr. Griffith Looks Towards Italy—Again the Reinhardt Legend—"Beau Brummel"—Messrs. Arliss and Barrymore—Sestrom, Lubitsch, Chaplin

FOUR years Mr. Griffith has toyed with attractive offers from various foreign film companies. Now he seems definitely to have accepted a commission to Italy. On April 2 he will sail on the Berengaria. G. Andrea Serrao, K. C. B. E., prominent in the municipal government of Rome and an attorney for the British embassy in Italy, is head of the group of cinema folk who will seek to have him supervise an Italian-made picture. Short conferences in Rome will be followed by a return trip to America, where the director will select American principals and an American technical staff to aid him in the work of filming abroad. No choice of subject is yet announced. "Faust," "L'Aiglon," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra" and "The Quest of the Holy Grail" have been tentatively considered. The rehabilitation of "the industry" in Italy is a chief object of the authors of the scheme. Mr. Griffith will bring a skilled hand and a high reputation to the task, but his methods are those of the older cinema, and he is scarcely the man to acquaint Mediterranean régisseurs with the newer and more plastic technique.

The report that Max Reinhardt will work for Mr. Hearst cannot be downed. Again the New York offices state that he will oversee five "super" films, one of which will be "The Miracle." The Cosmopolitan company even gives assurance that Lady Diana Manners will act the Madonna, and Miss Marion Davies the Nun, but as before there is no corroborating word from Professor Reinhardt himself.

It had seemed that with the possible exception of Miss Pickford's version of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," Mr. Fairbanks's "Thief of Bagdad" was to be the most ambitious "road-shown" film to reach Boston during the current season. Now however, the Warner Brothers are latest [illegible] opened runs for "Beau Brummel," their film picture with John Barrymore in the principal part. All the "key cities" are in it.

As in the early years of the movies, there are still actors of high repute and taste who [illegible] the camera for all purposes save that of extracting pin money to tide them through the dull season. Mr. Lionel Barrymore, who would doubtless refuse to act in a motion play unworthy his talents, will [illegible] share the dubious honors of a pretentious picture to be called "Washington Square." Mr. Arliss, who is scarcely [illegible] in his choice of scripts [illegible], will appear in a comedy to be called "Hit a Week," based on a novel by [illegible] Wright. Marion Wright, who was responsible for the creation of the [illegible] atmosphere in which Mr. Arliss had part, will assume charge of the production.

"Hurricane" is now in process of [illegible] Thomas Meighan will be the principal [illegible] and Mr. Meighan will be [illegible] Mr. Meighan's [illegible] will be [illegible] Mr. Meighan's [illegible] Mr. Meighan's [illegible] Mr. Meighan's

LETTERS - AND - ART

LITERATURE DRAMA MUSIC FINE-ARTS EDUCATION CULTURE

REDCOATS AND REDSKINS IN THE VALLEY!

Settlers at Fort Sacrifice holding the granary of our Revolution against Butler's Tories and Mohawks. Sacrifice is the keynote of "America."

GALLOPING THROUGH THE REVOLUTION

A GALLANT WHITE-FACED CHESTNUT named Leaping Danger (or Laugh-a-Ballagh in his native hunting county in Ireland) appears to be the star of David Wark Griffith's first instalment of "America." Next to him comes his imperturbable rider, Harry O'Neil, who for his "Ride of Paul Revere" is placed by enthusiastic movie critics ahead even of such horsemen as Tom Mix and William S. Hart. Longfellow's "hurry of hoofs in the village street, a shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark," is visualized under the alchemy of Mr. Griffith, in a superb Irish hunter, beautifully ridden, who has brought every first-night audience of the film up shouting with excitement.

More daring feats, says one critic, may have been seen upon the screen, but none in which the audience seemed so swept away, as horse and rider went tearing to Lexington and Concord to warn the patriots. Another critic in the New York Times adds that no one who views this marvelous section of the production will ever forget Paul Revere's ride, or how man and horse took stone walls and hedges, leaped clean of nasty ravines, and won in the end, by a real exhibition of nerve and skill. Practically every other critic comments on the peculiar thrill of this "perfect movie episode." The effect of this spectacular dash, suggests the New York Herald critic, lies in the combination of artistry with tremendous historical significance. He terms it "perhaps the most thrilling episode the silent drama has ever achieved." Motion-pictures have been featuring wild rides for years, but nothing, other critics agree, has ever had quite the same heart-shaking effect on an audience. It only goes to show, points out one, the grasp of psychology shown by the director in realizing that just as Longfellow said:

> Through all our history to the last,
> The people will waken and listen to hear
> The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed
> And the midnight message of Paul Revere.

So much for the big episode of what is regarded by many newspaper writers as Mr. Griffith's most ambitious attempt to recreate on a panoramic scale one of the great periods of American history. The obvious comparison, of course, is with this same director's "Birth of a Nation" of ten years ago. "America," say many of them, is a far greater picture (tho there is little improvement in the battle scenes) and, indeed, it has a better right to be called the "Birth of a Nation" than the other.

"A living, breathing document of the sacrifice and idealism of the men who freed America," is the New York Evening Journal's characterization of the result. In the same vein, the critic of the New York Evening Telegram and Mail says that "to the student of history, America, will bean inspiration; to the school boy, it will be an education, and to the man ignorant of his country's early struggles, it will be a revelation." Mr. Griffith comes in for the usual bouquets, and one critic in the New York World even goes so far as to say that with this production he "passes definitely into the ranks of those whom we think of as being immortals."

The most comprehensive summary of the film as a whole, from this same laudatory angle, is given by Thomas B. Hanly in the New York Morning Telegraph. After adding to the nosegays with the statement that "America" is a "masterpiece of exquisite photography and flawless direction," he goes on to say:

"Upon a screen of well-nigh limitless dimensions the man has projected the immortal story of the sacrifices of the American Colonists to win freedom from the British Crown, and he or Robert W. Chambers, the author, has interwoven in it all the love romance of a Tory maid for a patriot soldier and officer as it was beset by the machinations of Walter Butler.

"Around this story he has thrown the great scenes which brought cheers from the audience. You see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg, and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty in Boston. George Washington, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Jefferson, John Adams pass before you, and you shift to England, the palace of King George III, or Parliament with Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies.

"You have Paul Revere's ride and the wonderful fight at Lexington and Concord. There is Bunker Hill and Valley Forge, the first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington Army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

"Mr. Griffith introduces his audience to a company of very effective, most efficient players, even if he does not disclose any who seem likely to rank with the stars he has made in the past. Lionel Barrymore, as Butler, does some of the best work of his career, and Louis Wolheim, as Captain Ross, a villainous Tory ally of Butler, is devilish enough to suit anybody. Words of praise, as a matter of fact, must be said for the entire large cast.

Quite another point of view is represented by Robert E. Sherwood, writing in the New York Herald. After adding his mead of praise for Paul Revere's ride which received such applause as he has never heard in a movie theater before—and still received applause, too, he continues as follows:

"In this instance, the Griffith formula has been reversed. Revere's magnificent ride comes at the very start of the picture, instead of at the finish. Usually, Mr. Griffith saves his horses for the climax, as he did in 'The Birth of a Nation,' 'Intolerance' and 'Orphans of the Storm.' It is safe to assume that, if D. W. Griffith had staged the Revolution, he would have forced Paul Revere to wait a few years.

"It's too bad he didn't. For, after the battles of Lexington and Concord, 'America' resolves itself into a mammoth and thoroughly honorable anti-climax. There are subsequent moments of greatness—notably in the scenes at Valley Forge—but the general trend of Mr. Griffith's spectacle is down-hill. The later reels are incoherent and wearisome and the finish extremely flat.

"During the course of 'America,' Mr. Griffith turns more and more from history to fiction. At the start he introduces a number of characters who are obviously destined to carry the story with its incidental love interest. For a while these romantic people do not intrude too heavily upon the vastly more important drama in which they are called upon to play a part. But their prominence increases steadily, and in the latter half of the picture George Washington has faded into the background.

"The picture is evidently the first of a series which will ultimately carry Mr. Griffith through the entire course of American history. We hope that next time he selects a war in which the punch is delivered at the finish."

Few critics are as harsh as this, but both the New York Times and The Tribune seem to feel that in the latter reels of this production the villainy of Walter Butler is shown to be too much detail, as is also the fighting in the Mohawk Valley. Both make considerable distinction between Part 1 of America and Part 2. Part 1 they characterize as superb, and admit that Mr. Griffith's method of obtaining suspense by cutting from one scene to another, from to a third scene, and eventually back to the first episode, is justified with the audience. But in Part 2, as The Tribune puts it, Mr. Griffith's enemy begins to whisper at the elbow suggesting: "Suspense—hold your spectators in suspense. Make that scene longer—keep going back to it—make your characters suffer a lot, and your spectators will suffer with them. Only, says the critic, "they didn't." The Boston Globe also regretfully wishes that Mr. Griffith had made the second part "as really great in the annals of motion-pictures as the story of the fight against the British in Massachusetts."

In addition to the Paul Revere incident certain features of the pictures seem to stand out in the minds of most critics. The

Moving Picture World (my) March 22 1924

THIS Griffith poster illustrates what is possible where copy is limited to essentials. Note the small size of Mr. Griffith's name as compared to title. This is good advertising. The poster dominates because of simplicity and absence of non-essentials in which the public has no interest. Griffith's publicity department uses the twenty-four as the big gun in the campaign—its proper function. The newspaper ads and other forms of publicity supplement it with other selling data too voluminous for inclusion on a twenty-four-sheet. Posters as effective as this one would be the rule rather than the exception if the advertising men were not hampered by legal or contractual stipulations as to "per cent. size of type."

Boston (Mass) Transcript March 17 1924

Moving Picture World (my) March 22 1924

"D.W." puts "G.W." in the MOVIES

NOTED FILM DIRECTOR PRODUCES SCREEN VERSION OF REVOLUTIONARY TIMES CALLED "AMERICA."

David Wark Griffith, who directed and produced "America."

George Washington, the "father of his country," who appears in "America."

A dramatic scene from "America," with Dorothy Mackaill, as the girl, and Riley Hatch, as Brant, the Indian chief.

The surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown—one of the fine spectacular effects of the new Griffith film.

The ride of Paul Revere—only not the midnight one, apparently, of the famous poem.

A battle scene from "America," in which British regulars and Continental soldiers meet.

reen

ITEMS ABOUT THE FILMS

Mr. Griffith Looks Towards Italy—Again the Reinhardt Legend—"Beau Brummel"—Messrs. Arliss and Barrymore—Sennstom, Lubitsch, Chaplin

FOUR years Mr. Griffith has toyed with active offers from various foreign film companies. Now he seems definitely to have accepted a commission to Italy. On April 2 he will sail on the Berengaria. G. Andrea Serrao, K. C. B. E., prominent in the municipal government at Rome and an attorney for the British embassy in Italy, is head of the group of cinema folk who will seek to have him supervise an Italian-made picture. Short conferences in Rome will be followed by a return trip to America, where the director will select American principals and an American technical staff to aid him in the work of filming abroad. No choice of subject is yet announced. "Faust," "L'Aiglon," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra" and "The Quest of the Holy Grail" have been tentatively considered. The rehabilitation of "the industry" in Italy is a chief object of the authors of the scheme. Mr. Griffith will bring a skilled hand and a high reputation to the task, but his methods are those of the elder cinema, and he is scarcely the man to acquaint Mediterranean réalisateurs with the newer and more plastic technique.

The report that Max Reinhardt will work for Mr. Hearst cannot be downed. Again the New York offices state that he will oversee five "super" films, one of which will be "The Miracle." The Cosmopolitan company even gives assurance that Lady Diana Manners will act the Madonna, and Miss Marion Davies the Nun, but as before there is no corroborating word from Professor Reinhardt himself.

It had seemed that with the possible exception of Miss Pickford's version of "Dorothy Vernon of Haddon Hall," Mr. Fairbanks's "Thief of Bagdad" was to be the last ambitious "road-shown" film to reach Boston during the current season. Now however, the Warner Brothers are latest with special runs for "Beau Brummel," their picture with John Barrymore in the principal part. All the "boy critics" will see it.

As in the early years of the movies, there is still a nature of high repute and taste who turns the camera for all purposes save that of extracting pin money to tide them through the dull season. Mr. Lionel Barrymore, who would doubtless refuse to act in a motion play unworthy his talents, will share the Athens honors of a prominent picture to be entitled "Madame Sappho." The action, who is recently noted chiefly in the choice of unique setting for his pictures, will appear in a comedy to be named "Six a Week," based on a novel by Mr. Edgar Franklin. Florence Wright, who was responsible for the direction of the beautiful photoplays in which Mr. Barrymore took part, will assume charge of the production.

"Hell's Hinge" is now in process of [illegible] Thomas Meighan has left the production of Paramount's "Tom Sawyer" to take the part of Mr. Hugh Fraser in "Hell's Hinge." Mr. Fraser is to be directed by Mr. Wallace Worsley, who directed "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" and "The Penalty." Mr. Worsley is now in Hollywood, California, where he is directing Miss Lila Lee in "Anna Ascends," a production of Cecil B. DeMille. Mr. Fraser is a graduate of the Chicago Theatre, in America, and he has been starring in Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis and Los Angeles. Mr. Fraser has had a great deal of experience in the film business, and he is now in the production of Mr. Cecil B. DeMille's "Fool There Was" and "Cecil B. DeMille's Production." Mr. Fraser is a graduate of the Chicago Theatre, in America, and he has been starring in Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis and Los Angeles. Mr. Fraser has had a great deal of experience in the film business, and he is now in the production of Mr. Cecil B. DeMille's "Fool There Was" and "Cecil B. DeMille's Production."

film, and Mae Crane is getting [illegible] creased emoluments of all kinds.

Big Boys Don't Bother

The big boys who have arrived don't bother about arbitrary "per cent. size of type" in their advertising. Look at Griffith's 24-sheet poster on "America," for instance. It will also be noted that Paramount has put out block 24-sheet posters in New York on which Cecil De Mille's name appears in smaller type than "The Ten Commandments." Both men have sufficient business acumen to realize that their productions' success is their success and they are not so short-sighted as to ruin their advertising by arbitrary "per cent. size of type."

WHEN "per cent. size of type" is eliminated from contracts, and not before, can we hope for twenty four sheets which will be as good as the commercial posters. Look at any row of billboards and see how far the commercial advertiser outstrips us in getting the public eye. Our twenty-four-sheets should beat the soap and cigarette stands in attractiveness because we are advertising drama, which is vastly more interesting and appealing. But "per cent. size of type" and valueless names make our posters a mess of type, none of which can be large enough or prominent enough to compete with the commercial poster.

Exhibitors "Wise"

Exhibitors know this and will not buy posters which they know are practically valueless. They don't use the useless names in their own advertising. The result is the "per cent. size of type" space-grabber loses out all around, and where in the old theatrical road show days the billboard was the amusement guide of the masses, the soap and cigarette is driving our paper off the boards.

Either "per cent. size of type" must go or the motion picture poster will languish and disappear. And billboards are one of the best forms of motion picture advertising known because men, women and children read them. The same is not true of any other advertising medium to anything like the same extent.

The Bookman

"It isn't the Cost of Clothes that Counts!" says Carol DEMPSTER

It's their appropriate selection and choice for the personality of the individual wearer made your own style

An Interview with Ruth Mahoney

REDCOATS AND REDSKINS IN THE VALLEY!

Settlers at Fort Sacrifice holding the granary of our Revolution against Butler's Tories and Mohawks. Sacrifice is the keynote of "America."

GALLOPING THROUGH THE REVOLUTION

A GALLANT WHITE-FACED CHESTNUT named Leaping Danger (or Laugh-a-Ballagh in his native hunting county in Ireland) appears to be the star of David Wark Griffith's first instalment of "America." Next to him comes his imperturbable rider, Harry O'Neil, who for his "Ride of Paul Revere" is placed by enthusiastic movie critics ahead even of such horsemen as Tom Mix and William S. Hart. Longfellow's "hurry of hoofs in the village street, a shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark," is visualized under the alchemy of Mr. Griffith, in a superb Irish hunter, beautifully ridden, who has brought every first-night audience of the film up shouting with excitement.

More daring feats, says one critic, may have been seen upon the screen, but none in which the audience seemed so swept away, as horse and rider went tearing to Lexington and Concord to warn the patriots. Another critic in the New York Times adds that no one who views this marvelous section of the production will ever forget Paul Revere's ride, or how man and horse took stone walls and hedges, leaped clean of nasty ravines, and won in the end, by a real exhibition of nerve and skill. Practically every other critic comments on the peculiar thrill of this "perfect movie episode." The effect of this spectacular dash, suggests the New York Herald critic, lies in the combination of artistry with tremendous historical significance. He terms it "perhaps the most thrilling episode the silent drama has ever achieved." Motion-pictures have been featuring wild rides for years, but nothing, other critics agree, has ever had quite the same heart-shaking effect on an audience. It only goes to show, points out one, the grasp of psychology shown by the director in realizing that just as Longfellow said:

> Through all our history to the last,
> The people will waken and listen to hear
> The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed
> And the midnight message of Paul Revere.

So much for the big episode of what is regarded by many newspaper writers as Mr. Griffith's most ambitious attempt to recreate on a panoramic scale one of the great periods of American history. The obvious comparison, of course, is with this same director's "Birth of a Nation" of ten years ago. "America," say many of them, is a far greater picture (tho there is little improvement in the battle scenes) and, indeed, it has a better right to be called the "Birth of a Nation" than the other.

"A living, breathing document of the sacrifice and idealism of the men who freed America," is the New York Evening Journal's characterization of the result. In the same vein, the critic of the New York Evening Telegram and Mail says that "to the student of history, America, will bean inspiration; to the school boy, it will be an education, and to the man ignorant of his country's early struggles, it will be a revelation." Mr. Griffith comes in for the usual bouquets, and one critic in the New York World even goes so far as to say that with this production he "passes definitely into the ranks of those whom we think of as being immortals."

The most comprehensive summary of the film as a whole, from this same laudatory angle, is given by Thomas B. Hanly in the New York Morning Telegraph. After adding to the nosegays with the statement that "America" is a "masterpiece of exquisite photography and flawless direction," he goes on to say:

"Upon a screen of well-nigh limitless dimensions the man has projected the immortal story of the sacrifices of the American Colonists to win freedom from the British Crown, and he or Robert W. Chambers, the author, has interwoven in it all the love romance of a Tory maid for a patriot soldier and officer as it was beset by the machinations of Walter Butler.

"Around this story he has thrown the great scenes which brought cheers from the audience. You see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg, and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty in Boston. George Washington, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Jefferson, John Adams pass before you, and you shift to England, the palace of King George III, or Parliament with Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies.

"You have Paul Revere's ride and the wonderful fight at Lexington and Concord. There is Bunker Hill and Valley Forge, the first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

"Mr. Griffith introduces his audience to a company of very effective, most efficient players, even if he does not feature any who seem likely to rank with the stars in his cast in the past. Lionel Barrymore, as Butler, does some of the best work of his career, and Louis Wolheim, as Captain Rice, a villainous British ally of Butler, is devilish enough to suit anybody. Words of praise, as a matter of fact, must be said for the entire large cast.

Quite another point of view is represented by Robert E. Sherwood, writing in the New York Evening Post. After adding his mite of praise for Paul Revere's ride which received such applause as he has never heard in a movie theater before—and well-earned applause, too, he continues as follows:

"In this instance, the Griffith formula has been reversed. Revere's magnificent ride comes at the very start of the picture, instead of at the finish. Usually, Mr. Griffith saves his horses for the climax, as he did in 'The Birth of a Nation,' 'Intolerance' and 'Orphans of the Storm.' It is safe to assume that, if D. W. Griffith had staged the Revolution, he would have forced Paul Revere to wait a few years.

"It's too bad he didn't. For after the battles of Lexington and Concord, 'America' resolves itself into a tremendous and thoroughly honorable anti-climax. There are subsequent moments of greatness—notably in the scenes at Valley Forge—but the general trend of Mr. Griffith's spectacle is down-hill. The later reels are incoherent and wearisome and the finish extremely flat.

"During the course of 'America,' Mr. Griffith turns more and more from history to fiction. At the start he introduces a number of characters who are obviously destined to carry the story with its incidental love interest. For a while these romantic people do not intrude too heavily upon the vastly more important drama in which they are called upon to play a part. But their prominence increases steadily, and in the latter half of the picture George Washington has faded into the background.

"The picture is evidently the first of a series which will ultimately carry Mr. Griffith through the entire course of American history. We hope that next time he selects a war in which the punch is delivered at the finish.

Few critics are so harsh as this, but both the New York Times and The Tribune seem to feel that in the later reels of this production the villainy of Walter Butler is shown to far too much detail, so as to slow the fighting in the Mohawk Valley. Both make considerable distinction between Part I of America and Part II. Part I they characterize as superb, and admit that Mr. Griffith is entitled of obtaining suspense by cutting from one scene to another. This to a third scene, and eventually back to the first episode, is justified with the audience. But in Part II, as The Tribune puts it, Mr. Griffith's enemy begins to whisper in the ear suggesting: "Suppose—hold your spectators in suspense. Make that scene longer—keep going back to it—make your characters suffer a bit, and your spectators will suffer with them." Only, says the critic, "they didn't." The Boston Globe also regretfully wishes that Mr. Griffith had made the second part "as really great in the annals of motion-pictures as the story of the fight against the British in Massachusetts."

In addition to the Paul Revere incident certain features in the pictures seem to stand out in the minds of most critics. The

WHY WE HAVE SO FEW FRENCH BOOKS

THE CURIOUS INABILITY of French publishers to sell their books in America has serious consequences, we are told, as it prevents the development of an intellectual entente between the two countries. The other day a Frenchman traveling in America, called the attention of the Paris Temps to the situation, as follows:

"While the economic relations between the United States and France are important, it is my belief that to-day the intellectual relations between the two countries are even more important. Sentiment is a power in America, and the friendship that binds the Americans to us is based upon expressions of the mind and the heart much more than it is upon material considerations.

"Naturally, this leads me to speak of our books. Many of the great book stores have departments for foreign books. French books are to be found there, but they are not so conspicuous as we could wish them to be, and that is because our publishers don't send their men to put them there. Our books have paper covers. In a week's time a book that is picked up and examined several times a day is no longer in a condition to invite the purchaser. So why not send out our books in board covers to start with—or at least do so in the case of those to be shipped to America? And why not stop sending books with uncut leaves? We are behind the times. We must learn to make classified catalogs, listing our books by subjects—medicine, law, etc.—and bearing in mind a catalog listing French works on America.

"Many of our contemporary writers are still unknown in America. We must make them known through lectures and by means of short biographies widely circulated."

Meanwhile, there is another way of reaching the Americans, thinks the traveler. The American Library Association, brings out a monthly bulletin of new books, and with that as a basis at least eight hundred American public libraries make their purchases. So the writer observes:

"Fifteen French books can be put on that list every month, provided only that the selection is made and the books sent over.

"What I say about French books applies also to French music and to French decorative art—furniture, ceramics, interior decoration. The demand is eager. Will Paris wake up?"

"NO RIGHT UNDER HEAVEN TO TAX THE COLONISTS"

The dying William Pitt makes his fiery protest against George III, in Griffith's film.

THE HUMILITY OF A GREAT MUSICIAN

FRITZ KREISLER FEELS that he is a long way from the realization of his ideal. "I often feel that the artist who thinks he is a success is a monumental failure!" This is what he told Basanta Koomar Roy recently in an interview which is published in Success. He tells how his first trips to America were failures, and the philosophy they taught him. It is true that at this time he was only fourteen, but at ten years he had won first prize (the Prix de Rome) and a gold medal at the Vienna Conservatory of Music in competition with the best European musicians. Nevertheless to Americans he was only a prodigy—an object of curiosity. They all seemed convinced, he told Mr. Roy, that such a prodigy could not last long.

Back he came a few years later. Money was scarce, musical critics were severe, friends few. "I can assure you," said Kreisler, "I did not win popularity over night. I built it by gradually getting acquainted with my scanty audiences. I had to fight hard for every inch. But the tragedy of the whole situation is this: that I played then just as well as I play now." Asked what his present success means, Kreisler said:

"It means an opportunity to serve humanity. I receive messages from men and women located in many quarters of the globe telling me that my music gives them happiness. If that is so, then I am happy—happy that I can bring cheer to a few at least in this sad world of ours. As for the financial end of my art—to be quite truthful, I must admit that, as my dear father did not believe in selling his medical knowledge, so it nauseates me to have to sell my musical ability.

"I was born with music in my system. I knew musical scores instinctively before I knew my ABC's. It was a gift of Providence. I did not acquire it. So I do not even deserve thanks for my music.

"Do you thank birds for flying in the sky, or do the birds charge you fees for singing in the woods? Music is too sacred to be sold. And the outrageous prices the musical celebrities charge to-day! Truly, it is a crime against society.

"Well, I have my own way to solve this problem for myself, and to keep my conscience free from contamination: I never look upon the money I earn as my own. It is public money. It belongs to the public. It is only a fund entrusted to my care for proper disbursement.

"So I never spend the money I earn in high living or for my personal pleasure. If I did, I should feel guilty of a heinous crime. How can I squander money on myself while there is so much misery, so much hunger in the world? As a matter of fact, to be perfectly healthy the human body does not need much. We artificially create and increase our needs; develop costly habits; then feel miserable when we can not have things.

"I am constantly endeavoring to reduce my needs to the minimum. I feel morally guilty in ordering a costly meal, for it deprives some one else of a slice of bread—some child perhaps, of a bottle of milk. So many people go hungry in the world, every day—yes, even in this big, bountiful America! You know where I live; you know what I eat; you know what I wear. My beloved wife feels exactly the same way about these things as I do.

"In all these years of my so-called success in music, we have not built a home for ourselves. Between it and us stand all the homeless in the world!

"I have played in many lands, but I have earned the most in America. So I thank America for what little good I have been

The New York Times Magazine Section

Section 4

NEW YORK, SUNDAY, MARCH 16, 1924 — SIXTEEN PAGES

(Copyright, 1924, by The New York Times Company.)

WHAT THE PUBLIC WANTS

A Jury of Experts Faces the Problem and—Disagrees

The Jury Disagrees.

By GEORGE MacADAM

GO into Times Square any evening at 8:30, again at 10:30, and you will see one of the wonders of the world—compact masses of people, like slow-moving ribbons, covering the sidewalks, stretching out on to the roadways, near a mile long—the theatregoing crowd in the amusement hub of America.

Watch how it passes by the doors of one theatre and, at the doors of another, masses like bees at the entrance of a hive.

What is it that influences the tides of popularity? Has the public definite, though elusive, desires? Can the experienced person reduce the matter to a formula? Or is the public a fickle jade who likes what she likes simply because she likes it?

Whenever criticism is made of the stage or the screen it is inevitable that some one makes answer: "The public is simply getting what it wants."

Is it?

THE TIMES has submitted the question to a jury of eight experts—David Belasco, dean of American theatrical producers; David W. Griffith, producer of that classic of the screen, "The Birth of a Nation"; George M. Cohan, actor, playwright, producer, often called "Broadway's favorite son"; John Golden, the producer who gave us "Lightnin'"; Morris Gest, the man who stakes fortunes on the production of great spectacles like "The Miracle"; Harry Lauder, whose popularity is such that he can make a "farewell tour" every year; Fannie Hurst, popular short-story writer, and Irving Berlin, the song writer who gave us "Alexander's Ragtime Band," music publisher, popularly known as "The King of Tin Pan Alley."

The jury disagrees.

Judgment 1.

DAVID BELASCO

IF I wanted to treat the theatre as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a restaurant offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, I could make more than a million a year.

There is the formula for a popular success:

'Love interest.
'Have as heroine, or both, prevaricated.
'A villain that outrages all intelligence.
'Anything and everything done to hold the interest in suspense until after the end of the first act.
'Now here and heroine (though the villain gained at roulette).
'Let villain almost succeed in his diabolical efforts.
'Then, just before the final curtain, show virtue triumphant, the hero and heroine left in such a situation that there is every indication they will live happily forever after.

'To these ingredients add:

"Machine-made dialogue. Whenever the audience laughs, immediately squeeze in a tear. Whenever the audience weeps, make them laugh. The public enjoys nothing so much as an emotional alternating current.

"Female morality is an excellent theme. All the world loves a reformed woman. Have the Scarlet Woman turn lily white, let Little Eva blush before the curtain; and (put emphasis on this) if it has all been done with good stagecraft, the 'Standing Room Only' sign can be hung out.

"But if a producer treats the theatre as (though it were) a somewhat different place from a delicatessen shop, then the problem becomes more difficult.

"My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the public fancy. We may say, 'This play has a fine love interest.' 'This play has suspense.' 'This play has strong human interest,' &c., but the real test is the play itself and not our discussion of it.

"Before a play is submitted to the public the best producer can only make a possible success. Success is only a matter of conjecture. No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure. To produce a play properly costs a small fortune. When a man puts up that stake, it is needless to say he hopes for the best. We miss many times. There are more failures than there are successes. Sensational successes are few and far between. It is an unusual season that sees more than one.

"Unfortunately, a sensational success always breeds a flock of sheep—the imitators, the trailers. The effort to climb aboard the bandwagon is just as popular a sport in the theatrical field as it is in the political. Milk is good, but it isn't good when it is watered—neither is whisky. The producers who imitate only give watered goods.

"My test of a play is: Does this strike my fancy? Then come the practical questions: Has it acting possibilities? Does it suit one of my stars, or can I bring together a group of actors that it will suit?

"Let a play meet these conditions; it may be on any subject, the scene laid in any land. I'll produce it."

* * *

Judgment 2.

DAVID W. GRIFFITH

NOT one knows what the public wants. Go the public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food—one time he takes fish, another time meat—it's all a question of mood.

"But, with I do not think any one can be specific in answering the question, 'What does the public want?' I think there is a basic desire (if I may use so formal a phrase in giving my very informal thoughts). People want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book or go to the theatre or to the movies.

"It's a workaday world, and few, if any, are able to play the part in it they would like to, or think they would like to. We are all dreamers; if the world doesn't give us our dream, then we want to find it in the world that the book, the stage or the screen gives us. There we want to have pictured for us the romances, the adventures, that life has denied us.

"I think that all normal people have the same dreams, the same ideals. I don't think there is a human being who, dimly, hasn't thought the same things that Shakespeare did. That's why he has his universal appeal. A writer is great in the ratio that, with his stronger mind, he makes the average man see what otherwise he sees dimly.

"Despite the cynics, the underlying thing that makes for enduring success is wholesomeness. The reason for this was well put by a poet. He said that though our feet are in the mud, our eyes are on the stars. Take the plays and the books that have won enduring popularity, or what we call 'fame'—their drift is wholesome.

"There is more contentment in doing right than in doing wrong. That may sound like a phrase from a copybook; but don't blame the copybook: it has been said over and over again, from time immemorial, by men whom the world regards as its greatest. Confucius and Dickens say the same thing. All of which means that humanity recognizes it as a truth.

"And so, when we turn to our ideal world, whether we seek it in a book or on the stage or screen, we find a satisfaction in seeing the decent thing. The book or play that presents something else may have a flash success, but it will never find a place among the books or the plays that humanity refuses to let die.

"To my way of thinking 'Lightnin'' is one of the greatest plays ever written. You much did you cry with 'Lightnin'.' He brings your fellow-humans closer to you, makes you feel somehow that the world, after all, isn't such a hard, cold world.

"No, I have no formula—at least, I've never been conscious of having one. If I read or hear or see something that interests me as a story, it may make a good theme for a play. Success is only a matter of conjecture. No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure. To produce a play properly costs a small fortune. When a man puts up that stake, it is needless to say he hopes for the best. We miss many times. There are more failures than there are successes. Sensational successes are few and far between. It is an unusual season that sees more than one.

"Unfortunately, a sensational success always breeds a flock of sheep—the imitators, the trailers. The effort to climb aboard the bandwagon is just as popular a sport in the theatrical field as it is in the political. Milk is good, but it isn't good when it is watered—neither is whisky. The producers who imitate only give watered goods.

"My test of a play is: Does this strike my fancy? Then come the practical questions: Has it acting possibilities? Does it suit one of my stars, or can I bring together a group of actors that it will suit?

"Let a play meet these conditions; it may be on any subject, the scene laid in any land. I'll produce it."

* * *

Judgment 3.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

Iowa in Great Photoplay

By FREDERICK ROCHE

Miss Zinita Graf, Iowa girl, as a court lady of King George Third in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, recently completed for the D. A. R.

Fourth Street Theatre, New York, on February 21, marked her debut in pictures.

A duchess, three countesses, and numerous "Ladies" of European title were among the applicants for the role given Miss Graf, that of a duchess at the royal court of King George Third. As practically everyone taking part in the film is of American revolutionary extraction, however, Griffith preferred to have an American girl in the role.

"America," tells in dramatic form of the early struggles of this country for freedom, and is intended by the D. A. R. to be one of the big features of the ten-year celebration of the sesquicentennial of the Revolution. In making the picture, in which hundreds of Revolutionary descendants appear, Griffith has enjoyed the aid of leading historians and patriotic societies, which aided in the difficult research work, and also provided invaluable relics as properties, and of the United States Army, several units of which, costumed and made up as British grenadiers, Indians, Minutemen and members of the Colonial Army, took part in the massive battle scenes.

a Filmed

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH.

thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of lace vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

DREAMY GRIFFITH MAKES REALISTIC FILM OF "AMERICA"

"The Sacrifice" Faithful Reproduction of Events Before Country's Birth.

By MAURICE HENLE

NEW YORK, March 8.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America" — Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the 44th Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer of aid, which gave him their endorsement and help, he needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator sense it is no longer the 20th century. The spectators begin once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plunge his camera on the banks of the Cherise river across from Old North church (the top of the spire scene at sunset on the exact location.)

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning lights flash from the belfry tower.

Then commences the most dramatic episode this writer has seen on a screen. He will never forget the band of Minutemen hurrying from a free plot across a meadow, through woods and over high embankments to Concord.

The story of America is written in Robert W. Chambers' novel and in the Revolution, it is not the story of a people rising as one man against a tyrant, but of a people being forced into the Revolution by the tyranny of Great Britain.

The story of America is written in the blood of Nathan Hale, Paul Revere, Ethan Allen, Francis Marion, Daniel Morgan, Nathanael Greene, Lafayette, Pulaski, Kosciusko, Washington, Lee, Jackson, Sherman, Grant, Sheridan, Pershing and Foch.

The story of America is written in the Revolution, in the Civil War, in the World War, and in the Peace of Nine Powers

Ft Wayne (Ind) News & Gazette March 9 1924

Cleveland (Ohio) Times 3/13/24

Passaic (N.J.) March 13 1924

Mich Christian Science Monitor (Mass) March 7 1924

Journal March 2 1924

DREAMY GRIFFITH COMES OUT WITH REALISTIC FILM

Sticks to Facts in His Long Awaited Picture, "America."

By NEA Service.

NEW YORK, March 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o-the-wisp director.

* * *

SOME months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from the Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location.)

* * *

IT is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Paul Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

THE midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has dramatically reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aid.

The photographs was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

MOTION PICTURES

D. W. Griffith's "America"

If all directors were honest with their material as often as D. W. Griffith, the art of the motion picture, about which so much has been said and so little has been seen, would soon arrive. He knows the difference between truthfulness and fake, but most of the others do not. Hokum is their only stock in trade. Griffith, Seastrom, Lubitsch (in "The Marriage Circle") and Chaplin (in "A Woman of Paris") are pulling against the sheer weight of the bunk that most of the others regularly indie out. Mr. Griffith has compromised neatly between truthfulness and movie conventions in his latest picture, "America," which began a Boston engagement last evening at the Majestic Theater. Compared to the work most other directors are doing it is a masterpiece.

Mr. Griffith, using a story provided by Robert W. Chambers, with historical verifications by John L. E. Pell, has set forth some of the main incidents of the American Revolution, illustrating the sacrifices that were made in the struggle to form the new Nation. Through the whole runs the thread of romance provided by the story of the love of Nathan Holden, an American soldier, for Nancy Montague, daughter of a Virginia royalist.

The efforts of Nancy and Nathan are so closely woven into the first half of the film, which deals with the rise of George Washington to leadership, the Patrick Henry speech, Pitt's plea, the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, that the audience must perforce accept the last half of the film, which is "just another movie" in itself, depicting the conclusion of the love story among the encampments of battles with the British-Mohawk allies who are seeking to cut off grain supplies for Washington's army. The leader of these allies is Captain Butler (acted by Lionel Barrymore), who, like all his henchmen—Indians and Hessians alike—behave in regulation movie fashion. Now and then the impish idea crops up among one's impressions, that the Revolutionary War was fought that Nancy might be cured of automatic Toryism and so made to feel free to marry Nathan. For this impression Mr. Griffith is not to blame. He is doing the best he can with an existing convention, and is only waiting at the next corner for other directors to catch up. Then he will be off again, surpassing anything he has done in "America," as this film for two-thirds of the way surpasses his previous pictures.

History is made real in the first two hours of this picture. The audience applauded almost every one of the subtitles, which are patriotic without flapdoodle, and followed the course of Paul Revere's ride with handclapping and cheers. There were shouts and whistling when his steeplechaser leaped a four-barred gate that the pursuing British horsemen could not top and a continuous murmur of approving excitement as he jumped walls, brooks, and ravines, escaping across fields and through underbrush on his way to warn the countryside that the British were coming. Here is a thrill to match the parting of the ways in "The Covered Wagon," a thrill with the thrust of a nation's history behind it, the sort of universal throb one gets hardly once a year in a house of entertainment.

The scenes of the gathering of the undrilled continentals, their brave but hopeless stand against the well-schooled British soldiers at Lexington, and their victory at Concord bridge, when they drove the invaders back, are told with a scrupulousness for probable fact and an avoidance of claptrap horror that are altogether admirable. So, too, the Battle of Bunker Hill, the winter scenes at Valley Forge, and the episode of Cornwallis' surrender. There is dignity in the scenes in the House of Commons, in the Virginia courthouse where Henry makes his incendiary speech, and in Independence Hall when the Declaration is signed. The role of Washington is discreetly handled, with Arthur Dewey looking the part strikingly. The other patriot leaders are as satisfyingly represented, and no-fleet pains have been taken to clothe the hundreds of extra people appropriately, and make them behave as though they were makers of history, not mugging before a camera.

Mr. Griffith knows all sides of his job. The photography in this show probably betters anything yet shown on the screen. By means of skillful camera work and manipulation of the film in development, the artificial settings are blended with the real scenery to reality. By the use of multiple exposures, the sky and the landscape backgrounds are made to take their due place in the picture, so that all the human actors, in every scene, are kept centralized and perfect, while the necessary settings are created all into one. The marvelous art is heightened by the unrestricted artistic fact that you have the country of old Virginia, the city of old Boston, the fields that Paul Revere rode, the woods through which Washington's army marched, the banks of old Charles River, the Old North Church, the Old State House, the Old South Church, the Old Hancock House, the Old Faneuil Hall, the Old Independence Hall, the Old Capitol, the Old Mount Vernon, the Old Valley Forge, the Old Yorktown, the Old Bunker Hill, the Old Concord Bridge, the Old Lexington Green, the Old Boston Common, the Old Boston Harbor, the Old Boston Tea Party, the Old Boston Massacre, the Old Boston Massacre, the Old Boston Massacre

Piqua (Ohio) Call-Press Dispatch March 12 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of the first war were fought, and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the film. Some idea of the interest with an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

Griffith is now known as an author of love stories, has written a number of historical novels, and is generally regarded as one of the best posted men in the country on the Revolutionary period. He as an exact reproduction of the with Lexington Common, the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of Seven miles up the valley horsemen are groomed, saddled and ready to ride; watch fires wait for the match on distant hilltops; out of sight thousands of British redcoats, Minutemen, Indians, early colonists, and members of the Continental Army stamp impatiently.

Generalissimo Griffith, surrounded by his staff, some in the smart uniforms of U. S. regulars, some

And another scene has been added to "America."

Although, because the march of years and events, bringing modern surroundings to the battlefields of the Revolution, forced Griffith to take many of his larger scenes in this manner, he and his company have travelled through the country in special cars, taking the less massive scenes on the actual sites.

Thus he and his company visited Lexington and Concord, where members of the Minutemen, descendants of the original heroes, clad in their picturesque costumes were used as extra people. Paul Revere's ride was restaged on the road over which Revere actually made his famous nocturnal journey. The hanging of the lanterns in the Old North Church was redone in its original settings, and John Adams and Hancock revisited the Hancock-Clarke home.

Thence Griffith and his players sped by special train southward through New York to the principal

Piqua (Ohio) Call March 12 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Christian Science Monitor (Mass) March 7 1924

Ft Wayne (Ind) News & Gazette March 9 1924

Cleveland (Ohio) Times 3/13/24

Passaic (N J) Herald March 13 1924

DREAMY GRIFFITH COMES OUT WITH REALISTIC FILM

Sticks to Facts in His Long Awaited Picture, "America."

By NEA Service.

NEW YORK, March 1.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o-the-wisp director.

* * *

SOME months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

When Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles River across from the Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location.)

* * *

IT is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Paul Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

THE midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has actually reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aid.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

MOTION PICTURES

D. W. Griffith's "America"

If all directors were honest with their material as often as D. W. Griffith, the art of the motion picture, about which so much has been said and so little has been seen, would soon arrive. He knows the difference between truthfulness and fake, but most of the others do not. Hokum is their only stock in trade. Griffith, Seastrom, Lubitsch (in "The Marriage Circle") and Chaplin (in "A Woman of Paris") are pulling against the sheer weight of the bunk that most of the others regularly ladle out. Mr. Griffith has compromised neatly between truthfulness and movie conventions in his latest picture, "America," which began a Boston engagement last evening at the Majestic Theater. Compared to the work most other directors are doing it is a masterpiece.

Mr. Griffith, using a story provided by Robert W. Chambers, with historical verifications by John L. E. Pell, has set forth some of the main incidents of the American Revolution, illustrating the sacrifices that were made in the struggle to form the new Nation. Through the whole runs the thread of romance provided by the story of the love of Nathan Holden, an American soldier, for Nancy Montague, daughter of a Virginia royalist.

The scenes of Nancy and Nathan are so closely woven into the first half of the film, which deals with the rise of George Washington to leadership, the Patrick Henry speech, Pitt's plea, the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, that the audience must perforce accept the last half of the film, which is "just another movie" in itself, depicting the conclusion of the love story among the excitements of battles with the British-Mohawk allies who are seeking to cut off grain supplies for Washington's army. The leader of these allies is Captain Butler (acted by Lionel Barrymore), who, like all his henchmen—Indians and Hessians alike—behave in regulation movie fashion. Now and then the impish idea crops up among one's impressions, that the Revolutionary War was fought that Nancy might be cured of automatic Toryism and so made to feel free to marry Nathan. For this impression Mr. Griffith is not to blame. He is doing the best he can with an existing convention, and is only waiting at the next corner for other directors to catch up. Then he will be off again, surpassing anything he has done in "America," as this film for two-thirds of the way surpasses his previous pictures.

History is made real in the first two hours of this picture. The audience applauded almost every one of the subtitles, which are patriotic without flapdoodle, and followed the course of Paul Revere's ride with handclapping and cheers. There were shouts and whistling when his steeplechaser leaped a four-barred gate that the pursuing British horsemen could not top, and a continuous murmur of approving excitement as he jumped walls, brooks, and ravines, escaping across fields and through underbrush on his way to warn the countryside that the British were coming. Here is a thrill to match the parting of the ways in "The Covered Wagon," a thrill with the thrust of a nation's history behind it, the sort of universal throb one gets hardly once a year in a house of entertainment.

The scenes of the gathering of the undrilled continentals, their brave but hopeless stand against the well-schooled British soldiers at Lexington, and their victory at Concord bridge, when they drove the invaders back, are told with a scrupulousness for probable fact and an avoidance of claptrap horror that are altogether admirable. So, too, the Battle of Bunker Hill, the winter scenes at Valley Forge, and the episode of Cornwallis' surrender. There is dignity in the scenes in the House of Commons, in the Virginia courthouse where Henry makes his incendiary speech, and in Independence Hall when the Declaration is signed. The role of Washington is dignified, handled with Arthur Dewey looking the part strikingly. The other patriot leaders are as authentically represented, and so that none have been taken to clothe the kindredly extra people appropriately, and make them behave as though they were makers of history, not mugging before a camera.

Mr. Griffith knows at odds of [illegible] The photography in this picture is [illegible] anything we have seen on the screen. By means of skillful lighting and manipulation of the lens he has produced effects [illegible] the middle west in terror, [illegible] there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore [illegible] splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide. The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Dreamy D. W. Griffith Comes Forth with Realistic Film of "America"

By MAURICE HENLE
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, Mar. 8.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

* * *

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their indorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffin plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

* * *

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has actually reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aid.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Regular sailings from New York, Boston, Montreal. WEDNESDAY'S Fastest mail service to Southampton and Cherbourg. SATURDAYS to Cobh (Queenstown), Londonderry, Liverpool, Glasgow, Plymouth, London and Hamburg.

See your local agent

Cunard & ANCHOR LINES

Randolph & Dearborn Streets, Chicago, Ill.

D. W. Griffith Honored by Minute Men for "America"

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common, when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater luster to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Griffith Produces a New Star

GRIFFITH'S NEWEST FIND.—Famous for ability to dig up embryonic film stars, D. W. Griffith has added another to his discoveries in Neil Hamilton, who does much to make "America" the spectacle it is. Hamilton (above with wife) had posed for toothpaste and collar ads until Griffith found him.

Watertown (Mass) Sun March 13 1924

THURSDAY, MARCH 13, 1924

WATERTOWN FAVORED BY MR. GRIFFITH

Watertown is signally honored by being chosen as one of the few communities in which David Wark Griffith, the famous motion picture producer, will seek to stimulate an interest in American history among the younger generation.

Fifty tickets are to be given away each week through THE WATERTOWN SUN to the boys and girls who prove they know something of our nation's history by writing a 400-word essay. Perhaps you have a young American in your home. If so we trust he will be stirred by a desire to be one of the winners of an honorary seat in the big auditorium which are now applauding "America" at the Majestic theatre in Boston.

There are no strings of any sort attached to this contest. Every boy or girl in the Watertown schools can take part. It is a great opportunity for youth to "tell the world" the imperishable facts connected with the founding of this great Republic.

NEW YORK EVENING JOURNAL America's Greatest

Emotional Motion Picture Audience Saw Thrills in "America"

Paul Revere's Ride, Exciting Battles and Love Scenes Stirred Spectators.

By ROSE PELSWICK.

Children whistled and shouted; flappers cheered; men and women laughed, wept and applauded. Paul Revere jumped over hedges and fences, dashed through towns, galloped over roads and rivers; Lexington was warned—and an emotional motion picture audience saw the thrill of a nation.

"You see," said D. W. Griffith, who was standing in back of the theatre, watching the reaction of his latest picture, "America," upon the audience, "what appeals to everyone, always, is romantic sweep of action. And the beauty of romance—all romance—is that it is based on truth. Every incident in this picture is taken from fact—and it is by sheer, compelling force of fact, that the theme becomes romantic."

The story unfolded on the screen. Carol Dempster, with the piquant, wistful expression of all Griffith heroines, went through a love scene with Neil Hamilton that, by its delicacy and restraint, brought sighs from the audience—sighs and tears and memories that no hoodlum movie drama love scene ever could bring. A throbbing silence gripped over the men and women in the theatre. Girls gazed sidelong at and rightnearly at Hamilton, whose profile, breathless reader, hundred are standing up through the entire picture.

A lot of practical people, though, [illegible] to the house and rode away. Carol looked out after him and sighed transparently. People signed and moved in their chairs. The curtain gathered.

Talk about magnificent acts! Paul Revere's ride—thrilling enough—but all the sentiment in the world didn't do any good. Paul Revere's ride was good, very good, but it was not romance in the Paul Dempster sense of the word and in the place of that one of the scenes, Carol in the arms of Neil Hamilton, Carol in the arms of Neil Hamilton, Carol in the arms of Neil Hamilton

Piqua (Ohio) Call-Press Dispatch March 12 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of the first war were fought, and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making it.

Some idea of the interest with an opportunity to see a dozen cameras in action, and to learn through watching a faithful reproduction of scenes in the struggle for liberty something of the stuff of which the Minutemen were made.

most widely known as an author of love stories, has written a number of historical novels, and is generally regarded as one of the best posted men in the country on the Revolutionary period. He as an exact reproduction of the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of with Lexington Common, the Seven miles up the valley horsemen are groomed, saddled and ready to ride; watch fires wait for the match on distant hilltops; out of sight thousands of British redcoats, Minutemen, Indians, early colonists, and members of the Continental Army stamp impatiently.

Generalissimo Griffith, surrounded by his staff, some in the smart uniforms of U. S. regulars, some

And another scene has been added to "America."

Although, because the march of years and events, bringing modern surroundings to the battlefields of the Revolution, forced Griffith to take many of his larger scenes in this manner, he and his company have travelled through the country in special cars, taking the less massive scenes on the actual sites.

Thus he and his company visited Lexington and Concord, where members of the Minutemen, descendants of the original heroes, clad in their picturesque costumes were used as extra people. Paul Revere's ride was restaged on the road over which Revere actually made his famous nocturnal journey. The hanging of the lanterns in the Old North Church was redone in its original settings, and John Adams and Hancock revisited the Hancock-Clarke home.

Thence Griffith and his players sped by special train southward through New York to the principal

Piqua (Ohio) Call March 12. 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Boston American 3/8/24 Jewish Daily News March 13 1924 Jewish Freiheit March 14 1924 Arlington (Mass) Advocate 3/14/24

MR. GRIFFITH, IN "AMERICA," GIVES HOME FOLK GLIMPSE OF REVOLUTIONARY BOSTON

THERE is probably no greater faith in the glory of the film than that nursed by David Wark Griffith, whose newest spectacle of love, intrigue and war, "America," enters upon its first full week at the Majestic on Monday. Among the notables in the field of motion picture directing, and there are many of high artistic quality, Mr. Griffith unquestionably holds a firmer grip on his public than any of his companions in the field. It is easy to trace this public confidence back to its beginning, for it was not until Griffith produced "The Birth of a Nation" that feature photoplays moved into distinguished society. Griffith, the pioneer in big pictures and in good pictures, set a fashion that will be followed for some time to come. Mr. Griffith's place in filmdom is assured, for through his own efforts he has pointed the way to others. His own triumphs have been the inspiration that has brought forth many notable screen creations. In "America" Mr. Griffith has visualized the romance and drama of the Revolutionary War; he has given Boston and its surrounding regions the dress and color of the early days of the nation's history and has done it with that deft dramatic touch that made "The Birth of a Nation" and "Way Down East" productions of gripping power and marvelous beauty. "America" shows the nation at its beginning, and no good American can afford to miss it.

D. W. GRIFFITH

N.Y. Sun March 12 1924

Humor, Vital as the Air We Breathe, Elusive as Quicksilver

"But Women as a Whole Have Not Learned to Appreciate It," Says David Wark Griffith.

"HUMOR—few powers in life are so great—few so little understood and appreciated," David Wark Griffith prefaced his remarks on women's sense of humor by saying. "It is as vital as the air you breathe, and the elements of which it is made up are as intangible as the air. It is everywhere around us, but to the person who wishes to capture and display it, say in motion picture or on the stage, it is as elusive and uncertain as quicksilver.

"Women as a whole have not learned to appreciate humor justly. Here I make the exception of the women of the stage because the greatest actresses know that an appreciation of humor is as necessary to them as any phase of their art.

"Paradoxical though it may seem, humor is more necessary to the tragedienne than to any other actress. There will never be a great tragedienne who has not a sense of humor. There has never been one who has not had a vast capacity for humor, because it has been this sense of humor which has helped to make her great. It is her humor which teaches the great actress restraint, which warns her of the peril of carrying her tragic scenes over the border into melodrama.

Too True, Alas.

"One of the great failings of the European actresses, from our standpoint, is that they carry their tragedy too far. They heave their chests, roll their eyes and clench their hands and carry on with a lot of heavy, melodramatic stuff which an American audience simply will not take seriously. If these Europeans there with us expect before an American audience they will have to look at the developments of this sense of humor, which will have them to contend, this fine, wholesome humor.

productions will be directed toward the feminine element of the audience, and the comedy toward the masculine. So it is to be expected that slapstick and other varieties of horseplay will remain because men enjoy them. In regard to genuine humor on the screen, leaving out slapstick, exaggerated burlesque and comedies, there is no positive distinction that can be made between what amuses men and what amuses women. However, if it is genuine humor its appeal will be universal.

"To women in general I would say, cultivate a sense of humor. Unfortunately, it is lacking in most women now, but it is a quality which can be developed with the inclination to do so. Cultivate it for your own enjoyment; cultivate it for the sake of men.

"She" Takes Life Seriously.

"No man is attracted to the solemn woman who takes life with unvaried and intellectual earnestness. The conversation which is devoted entirely to a discussion of Liszt's rhapsodies as rendered as the last Symphony, or what the public can see in So-and-So's latest essays, or what the Woman's Club is planning for the lecture course this season, is a conversation which will die young, and there will be no coming back for more from the man.

"It is quite natural that men should prefer a woman who has smiles and wit as well as ideas; cleverness, humor and charm as well as intellect. These qualities combined produce a woman who will attract any man who is looking for a companion who will never become tiresome to him.

"Cultivate humor not only for men but for your own enjoyment and profit. The perfectly balanced woman is the one in whom seriousness and humor are equally combined. Seriousness is the foundation of her character, giving her depth, thoughtfulness and poise. Humor gives to her character mobility, widening her range of interest and capacity for sympathetic understanding. Humor is lovely color against a shadow. Combine these two elements, seriousness and humor and you have the union of extremes; two natures blend in one; two women, the thoughtful and the gay become one; the perfect whole, the woman woman."

דער אנגריף פון די ענגלענדער אויף אמעריקאנער ארמיי

געשילדערט אין "אמעריקא"

דאס בילד וואס איהר זעהט דא פאר זיך איז איינע פון די פיעלע סצענען מיט וועלכע עס איז פול "אמעריקא", גריפיט'ס גרויסע פראדאקשאן, וואס ווערט איצט געוויזען אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער, 44טע סטרים, וועסט פון בראדוויי.

עס בעוויזט אן אנפאל פון דער ענגלישער ארמיי אויף א טייל פון דער אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציאנערער ארמיי. דער אנפאל איז צוריקגעשלאגען גווארען מיט גרויסע פאלגסטען פאר די ענגלענדער.

עס איז א בולט, פארבאפעלד בילד. עס איז אין "אמעריקא" פארן פיעלע אוויינע סצענען.

"אמעריקא" שטעלט פאר אונזער לאנד אין דער צייט פון דער גרויסער רעוואלוציע וואס אונזער לאנד האט געפיהרט פאר איהר אונאבהענגיגקייט.

"אמעריקא" ס'אויפרייצענדסטע וואס מאווים האבן געשאפן

דאס בילד, וואס מיר ווייזען אויך דא שטעלט פאר ווי פאול רעווירס לאזט זיך לויפען, אויפצוהעלפן דעם עולם צום קאמפף נעגען ענגלאנד. דאס בילד איז געגומען פון "אמעריקא", גריפיט'ס לעצטע פראדאקשאן, וועלכע באוויזט מיט וואונדערליכער קלארקייט די סצענען פון דעם גרויסען קאמפף, וואס אונזער לאנד האט געפיהרט מיט איבער הונדערט יאהר צוריק נעגען ענגלאנד.

ווענען דער סצענע אליין זאגט דער קריטיקער פון דעם "העראלד": פאול רעווירס גאלאפירען, איז דאס אויפרייצענדסטע און פערבאפענדסטע, וואס די מאווים האבען ווען עס איז בעשאפען. דאס בילד איז אונפערגלייכבאר.

"אמעריקא" איז די גרעסטע פראדאשאן, וואס ניו יארק האט געזעהען פאר יאהרען.

Indianapolis (Ind) Star March 14 1924 The Day March 14 1924

The SCREEN

OHIO	"Icebound"
COLONIAL	"The Next Corner"
CIRCLE	"A Woman of Paris"
APOLLO	"Mothers-in-Law"
CRYSTAL	"Shadows of Paris"
MR. SMITH'S	"The Song of Love"
IRIS	"A Breathless Moment"
REGENT	"The Cub Reporter"

FOR his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Boston Advertiser March 13 1924

WHY THE KING'S REDCOATS WERE BLUE

Jewish Morning Journal March 13 1924

Cambridge (Mass) Tribune March 15 1924

CAMBRIDGE SCHOOL CHILDREN CAN SEE "AMERICA" FREE

The Cambridge Tribune Will Give Fifty Tickets to the Majestic Theatre Each Week For the Best Essays by the Youth of This City on "The High Lights of American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country"—Contest Open to All the School Children of Cambridge.

Commencing with this week's run at the Majestic, of "America," the thrilling picture by David Wark Griffith, tracing the American Revolution from its inception to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, the Cambridge Tribune will give fifty tickets a week to Cambridge school youth who send to this paper the best essays—not exceeding 500 words—on "The High Lights in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country."

This gives Cambridge school youth a chance to see the best American picture yet made, at its only showing in New England for some time, at the finest theatre in Boston—all orchestra seats.

Unless the Tribune is mistaken the note struck by the school children of Cambridge in these essays on Griffith's play "America," and the reviews by these youths run in this publication will result in some serious thinking

THE MINUTE MEN IN UNI[FORM] ATTEND FIRST PERFORM[ANCE] OF "AMERICA"

Lexington was represented [at the] opening night of the D. W. Gr[iffith] "America," photo-dramatic [story of the] war of Independence, which wa[s shown] Thursday evening of last week [at the] Majestic Theatre. Residents [were] interested in the production a[nd many] of them helped to make the s[cenes] of the picture, which dealt wi[th the] Hancock-Clarke house and the [events] enacted there on that mem[orable] 19th of April, 1775. Twelve [Minute] Minute Men of Lexington, at[tired] in uniform, headed by Captain [Parker,] Breed and occupied a box a[t the] right of the stage. Previous [to the] picture, Mr. Griffith entertaine[d the] Minute Men at dinner at [the] Touraine.

Edwin B. Worthen, preside[nt of] the Lexington Historical Society [was] among the interested spectato[rs. In] fact Mr. Worthen has enjoye[d the] performance so much that he h[as at]tended several times already. [Be]sides those already mentioned, [there] were fully twenty others who [were] present. The assistant editor o[f the] "Lexington Minute-Man" was ex[tend]ed the courtesy of a box by the [man]agement of the theatre for the [per]formance, and was proud of [the] group present from our fine old t[own] that holds so much of interest [and] importance of those first few [days] in the struggle for liberty which [the] colonists went through, before [victo]ry was theirs.

At the first night's performa[nce] Mr. Griffith came before the audi[ence] and made a speech. Captain Br[eed,] in the uniform of the original M[in]ute Man, planned the official bu[sines]s of the organization on the lapel [of] Mr. Griffith's coat, at the close of [the] picture. If one looks sharply [he] will discover in the picture, Edwin [B.] Worthen, Jr., and Virginia Lamon [in] the scene where Hancock and Ad[ams] figure at the Hancock-Clarke ho[use.] The picture will no doubt be seen [by] many of our readers.

Miami Fla Miami Metropolis 3/15/24

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country. At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership. The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendents of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington. In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Springfield Ohio Sun March 15 1924

Griffith Will Film Last Days of Pompeii

New York, March 14.—It is reliably reported that D. W. Griffith's next production will be the Bulwer-Lytton "Last Days of Pompeii." The director leaves for Rome April 1. Several of his staff will accompany him.

This adds rumors that his next production would be a follow-up of the current "America," and also that he would direct a Marion Davies film. With several other historical films issued for early release, it is said that a flood of them will inundate.

It is also rumored rumors abound that the backers of the Italian film are anxious to be rivalry.

Thomas Ince showed an Italian production of "Pompeii" some years ago successfully. It was not based upon the first long novel and was a big success. Exh.

Cleveland Post Telegram March 15 1924

GRIFFITH HONORED BY THE MINUTE MEN

W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Refight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something. As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America," as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during the making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making his picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special cars, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as players."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual making of a motion picture is turning out admirably, even though in several cases—notably the reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie camera men attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in theatres as pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by the censors in New York, and director cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can, perhaps, best be understood by the fact that he aims to reproduce the entire sector of the War of Independence with every ability to the actual historical authority that exists. Thus, for example, that famous battle of Bunker Hill, which occurred in Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1775, and which was the first battle of the Revolutionary War, which lasted three days, and which cost the British 1,054 men killed and wounded, and the Americans 449 killed and wounded, and which was the first battle in which the Americans showed that they could stand up against the British regulars, and which was the battle which made George Washington, who was present, but not actually in command, realize that he had an army which could fight, and which was the battle which made the Americans realize that they could fight, and which was the battle which made the British realize that they could not fight, and which was the battle which made the world realize that a revolution was on, and which was the battle which made the Continental Congress realize that it was time to appoint a commander-in-chief, and which was the battle which made

Bakersfield (Cal) Californian 3/15/24

Brooklyn (NY) Herald March 15 1924

EMBATTLED FARMERS WHOSE SHOTS WERE HEARD AROUND THE WORLD.—Desperate struggle of the American colonists against the final charge of the red coated British at Bunker Hill as portrayed in one of the thrilling scenes of Griffith's historic photoplay "America."

Morning Telegraph March 15 1924

ALL THAT IS NEWS IN GRIFFITH TO DISCUSS PICTURE WITH RICH ITALIAN SYNDICATE

Director Sails on April 2 on Berengaria for Rome to Confer Over Epochal Photo-Drama Designed to Rehabilitate Industry Stricken by War.

A. SERRAO WON HIS CONSENT

By THOS. B. HANLY.

NEGOTIATIONS were completed yesterday and steamship passage booked whereby D. W. Griffith will sail for Rome on the Berengaria on April 2 to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. The Italian group, which is headed by Comm. G. Andrea Serrao, K. C. B. E.—prominent in the municipal government at Rome and an attorney for the British embassy in Italy—has been engaged in consultation with Mr. Griffith for several months through A. Serrao, his nephew, who has been in this country.

Mr. Griffith is expected to be in Rome on the 15th of April to begin the conferences. He has been assured already of ample financial support, which some rumors place as high as $1,000,000 American gold. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is not to make a profit so much as it is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy, which was so badly crippled by the war. It is believed that an American director of the prominence of Mr. Griffith, working with an American staff of principals, in the perfectly equipped studios of the country will be able to restore the prestige of Italian films throughout the world.

While no definite story has been issued for Mr. Griffith's show abroad, it is known that a number of films are in contemplation, namely "Faith," "Legend," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Romany Love," "Hearts of the World," "The Idol Dancer," "The Mysterious Lady" and "The Birth of a Nation." The last three of these pictures will be started during the visit of Mr. Griffith in Europe.

The first of Mr. Griffith's productions will be "Faith" for which a number of Italian and American actors will be cast. "Faith" is a story of the Last Days of Pompeii, the Roman Empire and Christian Rome. The Idol Dancer" and "The Mysterious Lady" will be filmed during the stay of Mr. Griffith in Rome.

The idea of Mr. Griffith in producing these pictures is to make the world know that the Italian film industry is not dead, but that it is capable of producing films which will compare favorably with those of any other country. Mr. Griffith is known throughout the world as the greatest producer of motion pictures, and his name is a guarantee of success.

WILL MAKE FILM FOR ITALY.

D. W. Griffith, who sails on April 2 for Rome to confer over the Italian Epochal Photo Drama which will portray Italian Ideals in the world.

Morning Telegraph March 3, 1924

The Magic Lantern

by Sophie Merritt

Cast of Film Favorites Added to Griffith's Cast of 'America'

Denver (Colo) Post March 14 1924

Chattanooga Tenn. News March 15 1924

SPIRIT OF 177[illegible] IS PORTRAYED IN FILM

D. W. Griffith Uses Authentic History for Picture of Revolution

By MAURICE HENLE

(Special to The Californian)

NEW YORK, March 15.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Is Authentic

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

Paul Revere's Ride

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

Portrays Famous Battles

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. Griffith has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Griffith To Film Italian Story.

D. W. Griffith seems to get along splendid with the officials of the Italian government. It is now reported that he will have the co-operation of that body in the filming of "The Last Days of Pompeii," which he intends to present in early fall.

GRIFFITH PICTURE CALLED "AMERICA"

Tale of Revolutionary War Romance Told on Screen at Opera House.

DIRECTOR MAKES SPEECH

Actors Among Spectators—Fox Theatre Has "The Heritage of the Desert."

D. W. Griffith's latest creation, "America," had initial Philadelphia showing last evening at the Chestnut Street Opera House. At the Fox Theatre there was seen "The Heritage of the Desert."

"AMERICA" IS TRIUMPH FOR PICTURE DIRECTOR

Griffith Acclaimed by Mayor and First Night Audience.

Mayor Kendrick, rising in his place in a box at the Chestnut Street Opera House last evening, voiced emphatically the sentiment of the large audience when he declared that D. W. Griffith's new picture, "America," which had just been shown upon the screen, spelled a greater Americanism and that in turn spelled a better world. At every hand were heard expressions of enthusiasm at this new triumph. "masterpiece" the Mayor called it—and there was not a dissenting voice. "America" presents the famous Griffith at the zenith of his powers, and, above all else, it is a worthy spectacle to associate forever with his fame. He has woven deftly into a background of the Revolutionary war a romantic story of the love of a heart-winning couple, and in masterly fashion has utilized history to present concisely and to advantage outstanding events in the early history of the nation. At all times there is the idea to be impressed that a great sacrifice was unhesitatingly made by every one of the founders of the nation, and, if one is willing to draw a lesson, there is a splendid example in that sacrifice for all those who today enjoy the blessings of the freest country of the earth.

Griffith has done big things in pictures, but it is doubtful if he has ever had so firm a grasp of his subject as in this instance—the creation of "America." Thrills abound. Where is there a person who will not respond to the midnight ride of Paul Revere? On the screen we see the doughty silversmith on his great mission, dashing at terrific pace along roads, across fields, then urging his fery steed over stone walls and rail fences, over a stream and upon the verandas of farmhouses, with the sleepy-eyed farmers and their families coming in amazement to the door. That is but one of the stirring happenings. They are cumulative. There is the battle of Lexington and that of Concord with "the shot that was heard round the world." Then there is the battle of Bunker Hill. It might have occurred but yesterday, so real and vital is it all. Yet the uniforms are of the British of 1777 and the Americans in the trenches are but noodescript in their clothing. The suffering of patriots at Valley Forge is vividly set forth and later, in a section that has a wealth of detail, there comes a succession of scenes of heart-breaking experience of settlers along the frontier. All in the power of these people was done to safeguard the supplies for the Continental army, but with the villainous Captain Walter Butler as leader, there were successful attacks upon the settlers and it was necessary for Morgan's riders to come to the rescue. [illegible] in dashing style, and with that sort of Griffith touch that had everyone cheering. That was a good sign that wrongs would be righted.

All through the play there is a romance of Nathan Holden, valiant soldier, for the Montague girl, daughter of a Tory who would not relinquish his faith in the King of England. The roles are admirably conceived, their characterizations are perfect, actions and gestures are the too done for the stage. Nor is there any end scene and there is an unexpected turn in unexpected and natural. The [illegible] always a "picture" in whatever garb or whatever situation she may be found. Then there is Neil Hamilton as Nathan. He is bound to become a big favorite among devotees of pictures. There is fire and earnestness in all he does and romantically he will appeal strongly to womankind. Charles Emmett Mack as the brother of Nancy Montague gives an especially fine portrayal, appearing in a strong role that is not without its pathos. The heroism of the lad at the field of Bunker Hill will long remain in memory. Lionel Barrymore is the hated Butler, playing with sardonic sufficiency, and there are other players in the large cast who bring distinction upon themselves and upon the presentation. Miss Dempster and Mack were in the audience of last evening and had the satisfaction of a most flattering reception from the crowd.

"America" is a big picture done in a big way. There is a theme that is of appeal to all the world, and Griffith unquestionably has done his best with his offering. It is dramatic, with touches of humor, stirring and of that verity that means sincerity of the producer. He was obliged to respond to demands for a speech and in it he pleaded for a spread of Americanism and a feeling of gratefulness for the blessings of this land. Prominent members of historical and other societies and public officials in the audience, including General Butler, doubtless approved heartily of all his sentiments.

Newark (NJ) Ledger March 16 1924

D. W. Griffith Is Now Minute Man

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Captain E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation Captain Breed said: "With your film "America" you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

South Bend (Ind) Tribune 3/16/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times March 16 1924

Baltimore Sun March 16 1924

GRIFFITH COMES FORTH WITH FILM OF "AMERICA"

By MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK.—D. W. Griffith has brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater it is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their indorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. Griffith has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Helden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here and that's that.

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Capt. Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Griffith Given Honor For His 'America' Film

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation Capt. Breed said: "With your film "America" you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Baltimore Sun March 16 1924

Griffith Now A Minuteman

Film Director Is Made Honorary Member Of Old Military Organization

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minutemen of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minutemen were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

[illegible]

Omaha (Neb) Bee March 16 1924

Studios Open Hunting Season For Wild Rumors

THE motion picture industry is starting an educational campaign amongst the studios to suppress silly and harmful rumors which, despite their falsity, gain the dignity of facts through wide and repeated circulation.

Talks will be given in all studios by representatives of the Will Hays organization, pointing out that motion picture people are by nature imaginative and therefore receptive to interesting, rather than accurate, news.

In illustration, it is pointed out that recently a story gained circulation in the press that D. W. Griffith was forced to spend $200,000 in retakes in making "America" because of some complication in costume period. The basis for this report was the fact that during the taking of a scene, Mr. Griffith asked the studio costumer to make a change in one costume because a certain panel in the skirt was typical of a period other than the colonial period which prevails in the picture.

When that incident reached the press, it had swollen into a $200,000 catastrophe, all through idle gossip.

Another incident occurred in taking the Revolutionary battle scenes at Lexington, when two cases containing 5,000 feet of negative were mislaid for five hours. The story later appeared that 150,000 feet of negative had been stolen and secretly sold.

Lou Holtz's story, told at Keith's last illustrates just how far wrong a rumor can be. Two

New Orleans (La) States 3/16/24

Griffith Is Honored By Famed Minute Men

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation Capt. Breed said: "With your film "America" you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Boston Herald March 16 1924

FRENCH WARFARE IN AMERICA

Lincoln (Neb) Journal 3/16/24

Harrisburg (Pa) Patriot 3-16-24

Fresno (Cal) Bee March 16 1924

Atlanta (Ga) Journal 3/16/24

Portland (Ore) Telegram March 16 1924

Kansas City (Mo) Star 3/16/24

"AMERICA" and ITS MAKING

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS

CONCERNING the making of "America," I am asked to say something "from my angle"—whatever that means.

In the making of any work of art one faces it squarely and tries to avoid squinting at it from eccentric angles or peeping furtively at it upside down.

To take America as a subject and do anything with it in fourteen reels, or in fourteen hundred reels, is impossible, because the prehistoric and historic eras stretch across too many aeons.

Nor is it possible to say very much about a single phase of our history in the space of time allotted for an evening's entertainment.

Our picture is not a history of the English occupation of America, not even a narrative of the Revolutionary struggle for liberty.

What Mr. Griffith and I have attempted to do is to show something of the devotion and self-sacrifice of those who established our Republic.

We believe that in the present era of unrest we Americans ought to remember what it cost to win our freedom and establish this Government.

We believe that our liberty, won through years of untold suffering and self-sacrifice, is worth preserving, worth guarding from secret and insidious attacks at home, worth defending against treachery and overt aggression from without our gates.

"Lest we forget" is the keynote of our picture. "Be it remembered" its summing up.

From the very beginning it was plain to Mr. Griffith that no one picture could begin to cover the story of the eight years' war known as the American Revolution.

It takes sheer genius to look over so vast a mass of material and select essentials which must be framed by the limits of an evening's entertainment. Mr. Griffith made his selections, and within that frame we began the picture of the sacrifice offered by our forefathers upon the bloody altar of liberty.

Because some among us, and within the borders of the Republic as well as outside, had drifted away from belief in and devotion to those simple early principles upon which our Government was formed our picture was contrived and designed to reawaken dormant patriotism by visible reminder of what it cost to make us the free people that we are to-day.

Now, when it became known what were our purposes in making this picture we began to receive cordial encouragement from Federal and State authorities and from patriotic societies everywhere throughout the Nation.

The United States Army authorities generously offered us a regular regiment—a superb one—to aid us.

"AMERICA" and ITS MAKING

(Continued from Third Page.)

This splendid regiment arrived in Westchester where we were on location, and with their disciplined ranks and under their own live officers we staged and fought the battles of Bunker Hill and of Johnson Hall.

They looked superb in their British and Continental uniforms and after a few rehearsals became so thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the scene that they seemed no longer modern regulars acting parts in a play but the men of the Revolution themselves.

It was a thrilling sight to see those long lines of scarlet marching doggedly up Bunker Hill, halting now and then to deliver a volley—out of real flintlocks—then, drums beating, plod on upward toward that silent, sinister redoubt of raw earth above, only to reel down hill again enveloped in the flame and smoke of the devastating American musketry.

All this in brightest sunshine—just as it had been that terrible day a hundred and fifty odd years ago—and in the same formation, same uniforms, and marching over the same sort of ground toward exact replicas of trenches and redoubts behind which our ancestors waited and held their fire until they could see "the whites of their eyes."

And at the Battle of Johnson Hall in Northern New York there was the famous hedge fence held by Butler's Rangers, Sir John's Greens, McDonald's kilted Highlanders, and the naked, painted Indians of the great Iroquois Confederacy. And there, as on that fateful day so long ago, Col. Willett led his militia, riflemen, regulars, lorries, and rangers against these American Tory partizans of England. There was one single field piece; then came our men up the hill from Johnstown, sweeping all before them; there ensued the hand-to-hand combat at the hedge fence.

Then, as it happened so long ago, a senseless panic seized the Americans and they ran from a victory already gained—ran, despite the curses and entreaties of their galloping officers—ran all the way to Johnstown village a mile away.

And again, as it once happened, Willett and his officers halted them, argued, pleaded, ridiculed, shamed them until, drums beating, back they marched, broke into a yelling charge, drove the enemy, hurled them back into the wilderness, and broke their power forever.

Here the scourge of the North, Walter Butler, died as he had died beside that little spring of water on the banks of the stream—which still is called Butler's Ford—where he crossed.

Well, only such a genius as master of his profession as Mr. Griffith ever could have designed and executed so perfectly this vast picture of the past.

Griffith is the head, brains, inception, executive of everything. Without this really great artist there would have been only a caricature, not an authentic and magnificently dramatic picture representing the sacrifice our ancestors offered as the price of liberty of mind and body.

It is because he is every inch an artist, a born leader, and every inch a man, that Griffith accomplishes what he does and stands alone at the very peak of pictorial achievement.

In pictured the staff and company are what the director is. Respect, confidence, belief in him make them efficient. I never have heard Mr. Griffith's voice raised in anger or reproach. I never heard him blame anybody except himself for any mishap or accident. He shoulders everything with a boyish laugh or gay and humorous comment. He is the effortless courage, generosity and smiling equanimity that inspires—that gets good work out of mediocrity, that heartens and encourages self-distrust, that never asks of anybody anything which he is not ready to do himself. This man has no vanity; his modesty is real; he is the hardest worker I have ever known; he is both kind and exactly just; and, though always he spares others, he never spares himself.

Where, in this picture, he and I have not agreed, usually I find that he is right. Often he generously yields his judgment to mine—which never, however, convinces me that I am entirely right.

The staff he has gathered are devoted to him and reflect honor upon him as a judge of ability—men like Mr. Such, his assistant director, or like Mr. Pell, to whose historical research and energy so much is due.

As for everybody's favorite, William J. Bantel, known affectionately as "Blondy," he is a worker of miracles. I have seen exterior sets erected in record-breaking time which were so deceptive, so utterly real, that even in brightest sunshine and at the distance of a few feet I could not tell whether these really were Blondy's sets or actual old houses of the Revolutionary period.

Mrs. Such, also, is invaluable with her amazing knowledge and ability—and her swift, accurate grasp of any subject—fabrics, designs, period fashions—she absorbs all the minutest details of these and makes them practical. The art director, also, Charles M. Kirk, is thoroughly fitted by education and cultivation to understand his important part in the making of pictures, and to him is due the fine accuracy of interior sets, and the minute reproduction of period details without which no period picture is worth looking at.

All these people, together with the highly trained and specialized mechanical staff are devoted to Mr. Griffith because he is a real artist and a real man, and they believe in him.

As for the camera men, Mr. Griffith has chosen those at the very top of the profession—such men as Hendrick Sartov, G. W. Bitzer, Marcel Le Picard and H. S. Sintzenich.

The casting of the picture was done by Mr. Griffith.

One has only to watch Miss Dempster's work in Buckman's Tavern and in Fort Sacrifice to understand why she was chosen to portray Nancy Montague. Only a gunman could watch her dry-eyed.

The modesty, intelligence and fine artistry of Mr. Hamilton make him not only an ideal hero but, which is very rare, a convincing one.

As for Mr. Barrymore, one expects perfection of him—and gets it. He is Walter Butler, and nobody who sees him in this picture ever again can think of Walter Butler in any other terms excepting Lionel Barrymore.

And did ever anybody look upon a nobler picture than that of Mr. Dewey as the Excellency Gen. Washington?—or on a more terrible one than Mr. Wolheim as Capt. Hare?

In all that cast, no more convincing work was done than Mr. Mack's portrayal of young Montague, and Mr. Alderson's fine performance in the character of Judge Montague. They were of the period—looked their parts, acted them to perfection.

Others may not agree, but to me there seemed to be nobody in all that cast inadequate—from highest to lowest—including Miss Dempster's cat.

The reason it was a good ensemble was, first, because Mr. Griffith cast the picture; next, because everybody believed in Mr. Griffith. It is the director who makes everything and anything possible. He is the miracle man. And if there is anything the matter with him—any lack of confidence, respect, belief in him—then the picture is rather certain to go to pieces.

Never have I known anybody like Mr. Griffith who was endowed with such a patient capacity for accuracy and detail. He spares no efforts. Those little touches which make a scene convincing never escape his observation or imagination—as for example, on that hot day in Independence Hall, there were the delegates mopping their heads with handkerchiefs and flicking away nonexistent flies in the tremendous imminence of the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

And that group of frightened poultry in the stockade crouching under the eaves. And the offense taken by the plain folk on the steps of Buckman's Tavern in Lexington when the young fop scatters his powder and snuff! And the petty temper of that minute man when reprimanded by the old Louisburg drill sergeant! And a thousand other almost unnoticed yet convincing details which go to make up a picture of life as it is!

As for me, my impression of the making of America is a wholly delightful one—and, even now, scarcely a memory remains of fatigue, anxiety, disappointment, effort, apprehension, suspense, and the myriad petty vexations common to all creative efforts.

We were a gay, enthusiastic, loyal, hard-working company of people, with absolute faith in Mr. Griffith and in the picture and in each other. During all those months I, personally, saw no rifts in the lute—no jealousies, no clacking, no discontent, nothing unworthy. And the more I remember this the more astonished I am at such harmony and devotion, because it is not usual in any profession.

I think I never before have seen so many people in such accord; and I knew it was due to the gay, witty, kindly, and courageous character of the man who was swinging the whole thing—one of the most unselfish men I ever have known—and one of the greatest in any profession.—David Wark Griffith.

Portland (Me) Press-Herald 3/17/24

Mary Carvel, the feminine star of Griffith's "America," cherishes ambitions to become an operatic star. When she is not engaged in screen work, she practices diligently with her voice.

Toledo (Ohio) News-Bee 3/17/24

SOME lead. Some fellow. Griffith filmed "America." Down at Potsdam, N. Y., a lot of soldiers are appearing in a film, "Janice Meredith," from the Colonial-day story of that name. And the title of "Swords and Ploughshares" has just been changed to "The Spirit of America." Competition [illegible] here.

Chicago Tribune 3/17/24

Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington because of his work in making "America."

The Freiheit New York March 17 1924

פאר‌ליבט זיך אין א פרוי און אין זיין לאנד

ער איז געווען פארליבט אין זיין געליבטער, ער האט זי ליב געהאט מיט א הייליקער, מיט א גרויסער ליבע. אבער אין מיטן מון זיין שעפטיגן אויר די ליבליכסטע ווערטער, האט מיט אמאל אנגעהויבן שווענקן מאר זיינע אויגן זיין לאנד, זיין בלילכם מאטערלאנד, וואס האט אים געגעבן האבן, אים אינגאנצן.

וואס זאל ער טון? וואס וואלט איר געווען אויף זיין ארט? אם וויל ער פארזן זיך זיין געליבטע און צוזעק נאכן רוף מון זיין לאנד, אבער מיט אמאל ווער מער קלאר, אין דער מיטן, וואס ער פארלאזט זיין ליבסט אין זי אין נעמאר אריינגעזאמלט אין תענס מון א מאן וואס זי האט מיינט, אבער עלכער האט דיר מאכט זי צו צווייגנען דערצו. אם די פרוילעכע האט מאר זיך דער עלר ון „אמעריקע" גרייטס לעבעדיג גרויסע פרא‌ון אמעריקע וואס הערט אייגע נעווען אין 44טע ארים מאאסער, 44טע סטרים וועקס מון בראדר ...

Dallas (Texas) Motion Pictures Journal March 18 1924

Griffith Invited by Italy To Restore Picture Art

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the mayor's cabinet of Rome.

The action on the part of the bankers has the consent and approval of the Italian government.

In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate, it says: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much towards restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is the first time an American artist ever has been sought by another people to re-establish an art activity. In many instances American financiers and business men have been invited to reorganize a country's industries or economics, but this seems to be the first time an artist has been sought for that purpose.

Mr. Griffith may visit Russia to confer regarding possibilities of making a picture there, before he returns.

Philadelphia (Pa) Eve. Pub. Ledger 3/18/24

"America" Coming to Chestnut

On the eve of March 31 "America," the photoplay of the War of Independence, by D. W. Griffith, will have its premiere at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers and D. W. Griffith.

Virtually every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days has a part in the film, the filming of which necessitated Mr. Griffith and his company visiting the leading shrines of American liberty on special trains to take scenes.

Among those in the cast are Miss Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton, Charles Mack, Erville Alderson, Sidney Dean, Louis Wolheim, Lucille La Verne, Arthur Dewey, Henry O'Neill, Edwin Holland and hundreds of others well known to patrons of the silent drama.

"The Gingham Girl" announces its last two weeks at the Chestnut Street Opera House, and will terminate its Philadelphia engagement with two performances on Saturday, March 29.

Boston Post 3/18/24

Griffith to Italy

On April 2, David W. Griffith sails for Rome to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers in regard to a pretentious motion picture production to be made in that country. The Italian syndicate is headed by Comm. G. Andrea Sereo, K. C. B. E., prominent in the municipal government at Rome, and an attorney for the British embassy in Italy. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is not to make money on the proposed film, but to rehabilitate the motion picture industry in Italy. It is believed that an American director of the prominence of Mr. Griffith will be able to make Italian films world-known again.

"Faust," "L'Aiglon," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Antony and Cleopatra" and "The Quest of the Holy Grail" are said to be some of the material under consideration for the Griffith picture.

If the contemplated plans are consummated, Mr. Griffith will begin work at once in the Italian studios, using his own cameraman and American players for the leading roles.

Another "Romeo!"

Phila (Pa) Record 3/18/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" DUE HERE IN TWO WEEKS

On evening of March 31, "America," drama of the War of Independence, by D. W. Griffith, will have its premiere at the Chestnut Street Opera House. The story was written by Robert W. Chambers and D. W. Griffith.

[illegible] was written by Robert W. Chambers and D. W. Griffith and a large force of the best Griffith players and technicians, subalterns and theatrical [illegible] of [illegible] days are a part in the [illegible] of which accompanied the company during the road [illegible] of America's history in [illegible] of Revolutionary days are a part in the [illegible] of the Revolution. The [illegible] of the Revolution [illegible] the [illegible] of the Revolution [illegible] the [illegible] of the Revolution [illegible] the

Boston (Mass) American March 18/24

SCENE FROM 'AMERICA' AT MAJESTIC THEATRE

CAROL DEMPSTER AND LIONEL BARRYMORE

Newark Ohio Telegraph 3/19/24

Newcombe Again With Griffith.

Warren A. Newcombe, art designer for D. W. Griffith's "America," has been engaged by Mr. Griffith as an art director for the coming year. Mr. Newcombe has produced two of his own pictures, "Sea of Dreams," and "City of Enchantment," which were notable for their paintings. It is probable that Mr. Newcombe will join Mr. Griffith in Italy later.

Buffalo (NY) News 3/19/24

Diary of a Movie Fan.

Written for the Buffalo Evening News.

By GLADYS HALL

What Will Radio Do to Reels?

I HAVE heard considerable agitation lately to the effect that radio will "do" for motion pictures; that the fans of the reels will turn from their old, their first allegiance to a newer interest. That people will prefer to sit at home "listening in" than they will to sally forth on dark and gloomy nights to be regaled by Mary Pickford, Doug or Charlie.

I can scarcely believe it.

After all, the eyes must be feasted as well as the ears; and the screen people and the fans are friends, it has always seemed to me. One does not go back on one's friends. Just because one can tune in and hear the presidential speeches at Washington, someone singing the aria of something or other in Pittsburgh, etc., etc., one does not necessarily have to forego the dissimilar but surely, equal pleasure of seeing Valentino or Barthelmess, or such soul-stirring things as D. W. Griffith's "America."

The other day when B. P. Schulberg, producer of Preferred Pictures, was on from the coast, he was talking about this very thing, and this is what he said:

"It is ridiculous to suppose that a medium so totally different in its appeal would make any inroads whatever on the attendance at film theaters. It would never occur to anyone to say that the phonograph—which like the radio makes its appeal entirely to the ear—would ever prove a rival to the opera, which carries also the appeal of the spectacle.

"Likewise tennis has never been considered a detriment to the baseball season, for the simple reason that they are two entirely different types of diversion and, as such, interest two distinct followings.

"This argument about radio affecting motion pictures recalls to my mind a similar discussion that came up when it first became plain that the films were to stay. The cry then was that they would hurt the stage attractions, but today there are neither enough picture houses, nor enough legitimate theaters on Broadway to accommodate the vast crowds that want to be entertained.

"The introduction of a new diversion does not endanger other amusements in the least. The pleasure seeker finds time for them all. The average film fan goes to moving pictures two or three times a week. If he is also a radio enthusiast, there's ample time for the new hobby.

"But if none of these arguments stands, the fact still remains that the motion pictures will continue with the same degree of prosperity because they make a far greater play on the imagination than the radio. The charm of the story-teller's art is as old as history, and the screen offers a medium for it that has fewer limitations than any other.

"And where all other proofs fail, statistics will answer the whole question. In the two years that radio has become popular, attendance at motion picture theaters has been on the steadily upward grade and is greater today than ever.

"In many ways, as a matter of fact, the radio is helping the film industry. In New York city Marcus Loew, one of the best known motion picture executives, controls a station through which his chain of New York houses becomes known to thousands. B. L. Rothafel, managing director of the Capitol theater, by broadcasting the programs from that house, has brought increased patronage to it.

"From the stations in Los Angeles the screen stars speak to thousands, and from scores of other points photoplay reviews and news are sent out on the air, gaining new friends for the motion picture."

Radio fans, deny that, if you can! But why should you, for, after all, if the arts, the pleasures, are not friends, tips one to the other what then—what indeed.

What do you all think abou it?

Lacton (Pa) Press March 19 1924

GRIFFITH MADE HONORARY MEMBER OF MILITARY ORGANIZATION

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When the convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 17 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership. The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of The Battle [illegible]"

Lon (Ont) Evening Telegram 3/19/24

Actors in United Artists.

Speculation [illegible] whether the United Artists' Corporation was to go the way of many another film organization through disintegration from the inside was set at rest through a formal statement, issued by Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, D. W. Griffith and Charles Chaplin, to the effect that the union will stand until further notice. The statement followed the several meeting of the stockholders and account of United Artists, at which the above four mentioned artists were present and Chaplin represented officially.

Washington (DC) Herald 3/20/24

Country In Film.

[illegible] Twenty-third Infantry, U. S. A., which received as Morgan's Rangers in the Dixieh film "America," will also be seen in the new Marion Davies picture, "Janice Meredith." The regiment has adopted a marching song, [illegible]

Boston Advertiser 3/20/24

Indianapolis (Ind) Star 3/20/24

Duncan Finnigan To Have Showing At New Theater

OLD STATE ST. OF 1775 IN 'AMERICA'

There is a scene in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, at the Majestic Theatre, which shows State street—then King street—Boston, as it appeared in 1775. It lasts but a minute. But it took six months to take it.

To begin with Griffith's research department had to search through voluminous masses of old documents to find an accurate description of the street and its stores. Griffith insisted that the signs over the shop windows be the same as they were in 1775, and that the windows be stocked with the same merchandise.

When the research department had finished, the construction department began. First an exact replica of the old State House was built, and then the balance of the street and the shops. Antiquarians who have seen "America," are agreed that the result, which cost thousands of dollars and months of labor for a few second of picture, leaves nothing to be desired in the way of accuracy.

Probably no motion picture ever made employed so many experts in the making as "America." In order to insure historical accuracy more than 100 eminent historical authorities were consulted.

In restaging scenes in Lexington and Concord, Griffith enjoyed the aid of President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington Historical Society.

Charles K. Bolton, president of the Boston Athenaeum and senior warden of the Old North Church advised on the scenes of that noted edifice

GIRL VAGRANT GIVES

At the Screen Door

From stock actor in Brooklyn to a featured player at a salary of $1,000 a week is the year's achievement of Neil Hamilton, hero of D. W. Griffith's "America," now playing at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre. Through his work as captain of Morgan's Riders Hamilton will appear in a new production in a short time.

HIS GOING TO ROME.

D. W. Griffith May Make Patriotic Motion Picture in Italy.

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate was headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the mayor's cabinet, of Rome.

The action on the part of the bankers has the consent and approval of the Italian government.

In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate, it says: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much towards restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is the first time an American artist ever has been sought by another people to re-establish an art activity. In many instances American financiers and business men have been invited to reorganize a country's industries or economics, but this seems to be the first time an artist has been sought for that purpose.

No definite plans have been made regarding the nature of the story, but the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America," which has proven one of Griffith's greatest successes in popularity. This picture of the Revolutionary war is now breaking all house records at the Forty-fourth Street theatre in New York and at the Majestic theatre in Boston.

Mr. Griffith may visit Russia to confer regarding possibilities of making a picture there, before he returns.

Buffalo (NY) News 3/19/24

News of Screen

Member of Oldest Military Society.

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film at Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event. When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 17 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership. The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington. In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of The Battle [illegible]"

Variety (Myatt) 3/19/24

"AMERICA" FOR LONDON?

London, March 18.

A representative of D. W. Griffith is reported to be looking for a house in which to present "America."

A certain degree of curiosity is prevalent concerning just how the picture will be received here, due to the Revolutionary War period which the film covers.

Tulsa (Okla) Tribune 3/20/24

James W. Blake Remembers—

[illegible]

Duncan (Ill) Philig Journal March 19/24

Rotarians Are Told Big Part Accuracy Plays in Historical Movie Films

Members of Club Urged to Help Make World Better Place in Which to Live—Value to Banks of Service Told.

Interesting incidents connected with the historical research conducted in the production of the motion picture "America," made by David W. Griffith, were related at some length to the members of the New Rochelle Rotary Club at their regular meeting at Brown Lodge last night.

John L. E. Pell associated with Mr. Griffith in the compilation of the historical data necessary to an accurate representation of the life and incidents connected with the Revolutionary War, was the speaker. He was presented by Harvey Lapp.

The meeting last night was well attended. In the attendance contest Team No. 3 had a 100 per cent record. Team No. 1 had two absentees. Team No. 2 had three absentees, and Team No. 4 had one absentee.

Vice-President Walter G. C. Otto was chosen by President George Davis as delegate to the district conference to be held at Long Beach in April, while George Flandreau was named as alternate. Several guests were introduced among them being James Marlborough, a noted horticulturist of Boston, Mass., the guest of John Troy, and Donald Wood, of the Birmingham, Ala., Rotary Club, the guest of Joseph Chapman.

It was anounced last night that Rotary International had voted to elect the Hamilton, Bermuda, Rotary club to membership and had assigned as the club number, 1674. This news was contained in a letter to John Troy from international headquarters which thanked Mr. Troy for his work in connection with the establishment of the club.

George Watson spoke on the matter of Rotary education and gave figures in connection with America's supremacy in the world. In closing he said that every Rotarian can help re-make the world into a better place to live, if he will but live up to Rotary principles, but if a rotarian "falls down on his job" he is retarding the growth of the world in better fellowship and brotherhood.

Marshall Perley read a paper on "The Application of Rotary Principles Between a Bank and its Customer and Clients." Mr. Marshall's paper follows.

"The bank that is to succeed well in developing and maintaining profitable and satisfactory relations with its customers must first put its house in order. An attitude too reserved and austere, coupled with old-fashioned methods and practices cannot longer prevail in a modern institution which expects to advance. Business relations between a bank and its customers do not differ in principle from those of other concerns serving in various ways a large number of people. In every case, they depend upon a full utilisation of the two great forces characteristic of industry today—Service and Publicity. Good serve creates a good reputation that is advertised by satisfied customers.

"To properly succeed in applying the best in Rotary principles, it is first necessary to arouse the enthusiastic efforts of everybody in the entire organization, from stockholders, directors and officers down to the office boy! It must be done by implanting in them ideas adapted to win their personal interest and a sense of individual responsibility.

"No bank is better or stronger than its directors, officers and staff make it. As confidence form so large a part in the business of a bank, it devolves first upon those in authority to set a high standard of service which should permeate the whole atmosphere of the institution and should never be missing, even in the smallest transaction.

"As I have [illegible] confidence as a most important asset, but it should not be limited to that phase which alone implies honesty. A bank's customers has a right to expect that the personal feeling that [illegible] and politicians should be set aside in a business, all the finer sentiments [illegible] a bank. Its transacts requires more than that. That is to put [illegible] for time to discuss of the [illegible] a thorough understanding of the principles of banking, a knowledge of the needs and requirements of the community generally, and of the departments particularly, and the organization to conduct [illegible] business to supply those needs. The friendly phase [illegible] to solve things to banking [illegible] of the original [illegible] of business are [illegible] of time. Brains and [illegible] have their place in business [illegible] that [illegible] is [illegible] business [illegible] different people to work [illegible] of many, and to work [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] of the [illegible] of

Fostoria Ohio Review March 19 1924

Washington (D.C.) Herald 4/20/24

W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—pirate movie cameramen attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in outdoors pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by State troopers in New York, and the pirated cameras and films confiscated until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The magnitude of Griffith's undertaking in "America" can perhaps best be estimated by the fact that he plans to reproduce the entire battle of the War of Independence with great fidelity to historical accuracy. But it was not of this that he was afraid at first, and more than 10,000 people have assembled in the Bronx that thousands of miles Griffith rented for the purpose, through the courtesy of Major Theodore Roosevelt, and the Knickerbocker Greys, the crack crack crack

Jewish Daily News March 21 1924

Boston American 3/21/24

Jewish Day (NYC) March 21 1924

Movie Weekly (NY) March 22 1924

NY Tribune 3/23/24

"אמעריקא", אן אויסערן וועהנליכע מאווינג פיקטי

גריפיט'ס נייע מאוויינג פארשטעלונג "אמעריקא" וואס ווערט געציינט יעצט אין דעם 44טן סטריט מחאטער ווערט אויף דער פראגראם בעצייכענט אלס עדסטע סעריע. דאס איז די נעשיכטע פון דער אמעריקאנער מלחמה פאר פרייהייט. די נעשיכטע ווי אזוי אמעריקא האט זיך בעפרייט פון דעם יאך פון ענגלאנד. איז די עדסטע סעריע איז געציינט פון די עדסטע פראבעל איז באסטאן בי די מלחמות וואס וואשינגטאן האט געפיהרט ארום בי יארק. איז די שפעטערע סעריעס וועגן וואהרשיינליך די נעשיכטע פון די אמעריקאנער רעפובליק פארגעזעצט ווערן.

די יעצטיגע פארשטעלונג איז נעבאט געווארן אויף א ערהר נריפיטס מאסשטאב. אויף דעם זעלבן מאס שטאב ווי די "בוירט אוו עי נייישן" און אנדערע גריפיטס אונטערנעהמונגען. עס איז פון יעדען שטאנדפונקט א גרויסער ארטיגע פארשטעלונג געשפיעלט פון א גוטע קאמפאניע מיט ליאנעל באריטמאר אין די ראלע פון באנדיט קעפטין וואלטער באסלער, אין די בעסטע ראלע פון די גאנצע פליס.

עס זיינען בעפאר נעציינט געווארן אין מואוויס די נעשיכטע פון די אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע. יעצט בילדער זיינען אבער נעווען שלעכט נעמאכט פון שטאנדפונקט פון דער מלחמה ווי דער ראיישע העלדענטהאטען. דער מאכער פיט די פאהנען און די אנדערע זאכען וואס די מלחמה פריינד ווילען ציינען און פערדעקען די נים געקוועטהעט זאך כען. אין דיעזע מואוי ווערען מעהר פאאיי גענעבען מאר די העסליכע זייטען פון דער מלחמה. איהר זעהט די באר־פוטע, נאקעטע און הונגעריגע סאלדאטען פון וואשינגטאן'ס ארמעע. איהר זעהט ווי ענגלישע סאלדאטען ווערען ווייך, נעהען ארום מארדען אן בעהנען, און קליבען נים אויס צוויי־ען שטאנגען און פרייהייט.

אין דער פראגראם ווערט דער צעהלט אז אין איינע פון די שלאכטען וואס ווערען נעציינט זיינען פון בייד זייטען נעבריידט געווארן פונקט דער יעכער צאהל מענשען ווי אין דער דאזיגער שלאכט. דאס איז אהנע צווייפעל אמת. אבער נים אין צאהל מענשען אין די קראוט לינס די ריכטיגע קיים אדער מאלשיים פון א היסטאר־ישען בילד.

צו די לויב פון מר. גריפיטס פון גע־וואנט ווערען אז דער ריכטיגער גייסט פון דער נעשיכטע ווערט דא ריכטיג גע־האלטען, נים קוקענדיג אויף דעם וואס דא־יעצטיגע פרייהייט פון אמעריקא די אנגלענדער קענען זיך דא געציינען בע־ליידיגט. דער אמת איז ווייטער פון אלעם, און דער אמת פארדרעט אז די העלדען וואס האבען זיך בעמהייליגט אין די היסטאר־ישע מלחמה פון וועלטע אמעריקא האט ארויסגעוואקסען יאלאן ריכטיג איבערגעגעבען ווערען.

דער אויצייכער מיגור וואס מיגור אויף אין גראדע דער אין וועמען יעד דערער אינטערעסירט זיך, דאס אין דזשארדזש וואשינגטאן. ער ווערט גע־ציינט בלויז איינינע מאל און אויך דאן בלויז עפעס צו זאגען א ווארט אדער צוויי אום צו קריגען אן אפלאז. דער וואשינגטאן וואס האט געלעבט אין גע־ווירקט, וואס האט נעפיהרט די שלאכט און איז געווען דער ערסטער פרעזידענט ווערט דא נים געציינט, נאר א שטאנדער שאטען פון איהם.

אויף די מואוי "בוירט אוו די נייי־שען" פון מר. גריפיטס איז פריהער אויסגעדריקט געווארן. דערפאר וואס

TOUCHING SCENE IN 'THROUGH THE DARK'

MARGARET SEDDON, GEORGE COOPER

'AMERICA' HERO NEARING GOAL TO STARDOM

Neil Hamilton on Way to Becoming Second Valentino, Says Griffith

Two years ago Neil Hamilton, the handsome and brilliant young actor who plays the hero in D. W. Griffith's "America," at the Majestic Theatre, was an extra man working in a New Jersey studio at $5 a day.

Today, according to Griffith, and to the newspaper critics, he stands on the threshold of becoming a second Valentino.

"I had some strange experiences," said Hamilton, discussing his meteoric career, "but none which impressed me more than the first day I went out to Fort Lee to look for a job as an extra.

"I went into a little lunch room out there to get a cup of coffee to rouse my drooping spirits. There was a fatherly looking clergyman eating there and I touched my hat and said: 'Good morning, Father.'

"But paying no attention to me the clergyman kept right on eating, while the lunchroom attendant gave me the laugh. The 'clergyman' was a movie actor at lunch. Which didn't save me from being laughed at all over the lot.

"You see I had studied theology for four years and so knew a lot more about the respect due the clergy than I did about motion pictures.

"After being an extra for a couple of years and deciding that's all I ever would be, I joined a stock company. I was promised $75 a week, but actually got $25. Nevertheless I stuck it out a whole season and gained some mighty valuable experience."

Philadelphia (Pa) 3/22/24

GRIFFITH HAS BEEN INVITED

To Make A Series Of Pictures In Italy-- A Notable Tribute

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the Mayor's cabinet of Rome.

The action on the part of the bankers has the consent and approval of the Italian government.

In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate, it says: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much towards restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is the first time an American artist ever has been sought by another people to re-establish an art activity. In many instances American financiers and business men have been invited to reorganize a country's industries or economies, but this seems to be the first time an artist has been sought for that purpose.

No definite plans have been made regarding the nature of the story, but the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America" which has proven one of Griffith's greatest successes in popularity. This picture of the Revolutionary War is now breaking all house records at the Forty-Fourth street Theatre in New York and at the Majestic Theatre in Boston.

Mr. Griffith may visit Russian to confer regarding possibilities of making a picture there, before the return.

Director Is To Go to Rome To Consule With Syndicate Who Are Backing Venture

די פילם בילדער, די מואווי מאגנאטען און דער עולם

פון ב. י. גאלדשטיין

דער מואווי מאגנאט און דער פארפאסער

צוריקקומענדיג פון א רייזע אין דער באריטער מואווי־קאלאניע האליוואוד, האט דער שריפטשטעלער און דירעקטאר מ. דבליו. גריפיטס, אן אמעריקאנער מאכט א שטארקען איינדרוק אויף דעם רייזענדען מיט אירהר רחבת, גדולה און רייכקייט. מען טרעפט דאר־טען אלע פראמינענטע שושפילער, אלע רייכסטע אונטערנעמער און אלע באריה־מטע שרייבער און דראמאטורגען פון אמע־ריקע און אויסלאנד.

עס איז א פלוכה.

א פולשטענדיגע מלוכה.

אבער עס פעהלט איהר דער עיקר: דא האלט, וואס קאן און דארף פארוואנ־טען מלוכות.

די מאגיי אינדוסטריע האט זיך אויסגעלערנט אלץ, וואס זי האט באר־דאוסט זיך אויסלערנען, כדי צו ווערען אן ערפאלגרייכע אינדוסטריע; זי שטעהט אבער אויף איין אדם אין באר־צוג צו איהר מאראלישער אויפגאבע אויף וועלכער זי פרעטענדירט.

אינדיר מיינע א גאוועלע, אדער ער־צעהלונג קומט אריין אין די הענט פון א מואווי־פראדוצירער — קלאנג זיך היג, אז עס נעהמט מיך נישט קיין שלאף".

די פראדוצירער פון מואוויס, נישט קוקענדיג אויף זייערע גרויסע פארמע־נגען, וואס זיי מאכען פון די בילדער, וואנען נישט צו אונטערנעמען א ליטע־ראריש שטיק פאר'ן לייזאר. די האבען מורא — זאגען זיי — איינצושטעלען די קאסע.

ברוטאל אמת זעגען זיי אין דעם פאל. אן אמעריקע נוטיגט זיך איצט אין אזעלכע אונטערנעמער, וואס זאלען יא וואגען.

אן אזעלכע וועלען זיך אפזוכען.

„איך גלויב — זאגט פעני הוירסט — אין דער אלטמעדטיגער מיגאריטעט, וועלכע באזיצט עטפהיז עסטעטישע משפט איידער אלע מואווי צענזורען און נעשעפטסלייט".

וועגען דעם מעאטער און מואווי עולם האט זי געזאגט:

„דאס רוב פון דעם מעאטער־עולם האט נאר אין זינען דעם נחת פון אויס־נעבען געלד. אבער ווען עס קומט צום אויסגעבען געלד, וויל מען פונדעסטוועג נען באקומען דאס בעסטע. ווען מען דערט אבער וועגען מואוויס, ווערט די הנאה דערפון פון זיי באפאלט פאר בעסטען מעהר, אדער בעסערס. די ווייער, וואס ביי זיי איז א קליינע מסבע אויך א קרן, זענען שוין מעהר איבערקלייבע־ריש אין מיט זיי וועט די מיגאריטעט, סוף כל סוף, באזיגען די פארנאר־ישטע און דומע מאיאריטעט".

פעני הוירסט איז ברוטו אויף דער פרעגע, וואס העלפט דירעקט מיט זייע־רע, אז אמילי אוכינסטיג רעצענזיעס, צו פארשפריטען די נארישע מאוויס אין נאכמעהר פארנארישען דעם עולם. די מעהרהייט מואווי אונטערנעמער מחאן אונטערנעהן, אן ערשט רעמאלט, מיינט זי, וועט מען מעגען ערוואהרטען ערנסטע באאיהנונג אין האליוואוד.

מיט וואס אמעריקאנער מו־ויי מאגנאטען שפייזען דעם אריינגאנג

כדי צו ווייסען מיט וואסערע מואווי בילדער די אמעריקאנער אונטערנעמער האבען בין אצינד נעהערשעווט דעם עולם אין אריינגאנג, וועט נעגען זיין אן צוי מורען די ערפלערונג פון א כינעשישן מילם פארוואלטער.

דער ראיזינער כינעזער איז נעשעפטן פיין אמעריקע מיטן צוויק צו איינגעהן זיך אויב דאס הייגע לעבען אין נעברעכט פיין כינע, שילדערען, אז די מעשה דא פארגעהט שולכע תיקע מוריגען „הייסל־פרעזעריס", ווי מען ווייסט אויף די בילדער, ווען מען באזוכט די מאאוי פאלאנגען השלישיות, ווען מען אויהם נעם־אנע אן באלאנגס די אמעריקאנס. דאס דער כינעזער ווענטסטרעס!

מיר זענען א רוהיג אין מיט פאלס. די אמעריקאנער בילדער הערען אין אויגען דיקע נען באזיטען אין אמעריקע. דאס לעבען אויגען אויסגעבען געלד, ווייל מען פונדעסטוועג דערט אבער וועגען מואוויס, ווערט די הנאה דערפון פון זיי באפאלט פאר בעסטען מעהר, אדער בעסערס. די ווייער, וואס ביי זיי איז א קליינע מסבע אויך א קרן, זענען שוין מעהר איבערקלייבע־ריש אין מיט זיי וועט די מיגאריטעט, סוף כל סוף, באזיגען די פארנאר־ישטע און דומע מאיאריטעט".

פעני הוירסט איז ברוטו אויף דער פרעגע, וואס העלפט דירעקט מיט זייע־רע, אז אמילי אוכינסטיג רעצענזיעס, צו פארשפריטען די נארישע מאוויס אין נאכמעהר פארנארישען דעם עולם. די מעהרהייט מואווי אונטערנעמער מחאן אונטערנעהן, אן ערשט רעמאלט, מיינט זי, וועט מען מעגען ערוואהרטען ערנסטע באאיהנונג אין האליוואוד.

'CLEOPATRA' MAY BE SELECTED FOR FILM GRIFFITH WILL MAKE

Subject of Italian Picture Not Yet Settled, but Director Favors It

'AMERICA' IS HISTORY IN MAKING

Reviewed by John W. Vandercook

"AMERICA"

Griffith Re-creates a Nation's Drama

Presented at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, New York, with a cast including Coral Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton, Erville Alderson, Charles Emmet Mack, Harry O'Neill, Riley Hatch, Louis Wolheim, Lucille LaVerne and Arthur Dewey. Directed and produced by D. W. Griffith. Story and titles by Robert W. Chambers.

The motion picture, "America," ranks among the three or four truly great films of the cinema's brief history. D. W. Griffith has again reminded the world with an emphatic gesture that he is the chief of all American directors, and supreme artist of great canvases.

It is no coincidence that "The Birth of a Nation," "The Covered Wagon" and "America," have all dealt with epochal periods in this nation's history. The screen is ideally fitted for the portrayal of gigantic themes, and American directorial genius is naturally superlatively inspired by that which is greatly American.

The Revolution and the troublous times which preceded and followed it was one of the most dramatic eras in all man's annals. It was a time of passions, tragedies and the vast, stern gaiety of the liberated human spirit.

With extraordinary force Griffith has brought that national emotion to the screen. The Revolution has been reproduced with such perfection of mood and detail that the spectator feels himself literally experiencing much of the action and sentiment that accompanied it.

An unbelievable wealth of material and incid[illegible] has been spe[illegible] to make the [illegible] really epic [illegible] quality. There [illegible] of necessity, occasional frailty of continuity, but the marvel on the whole, is that "America" holds together at all. For it does.

A charming romance between a Virginia patrician girl and a Boston plough-boy, winds its way indissolubly through the sequence of historical scenes. The Battle of Lexington and Concord, Bunker Hill, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Cornwallis' surrender, and the storming of Fort Sacrifice, are but a few of the events which have been brought, with marvelous fidelity and drama, to the screen.

Nothing, however, is introduced with the crudity of a pageant. Each historic occurrence is brought forward only as it concerns the characters of the story. Their human, poignantly personal tragedies serve as allegories of the nation's woes.

But it is vain to attempt to do justice to the perfection of Griffith's direction, whether demonstrated in the performance of a delicate love scene or a mighty battle.

The spectator is caught up in an emotional cyclone which deposits him three hours later, gasping, back again in a time which, for the nonce, has ceased to exist—the present.

The acting responsibilities fall upon Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and Neil Hamilton. Each is incomparably fine. Barrymore, in a remarkably interesting part, is brilliantly decisive and forceful. Miss Dempster convinces us, after duly calm consideration, that she is the one finely gifted and really beautiful woman on the screen.

It is needless to advise you to see "America." We might make ourselves useful, however, by suggesting a second and a third, and perhaps, a fourth trip to it. You will tire of it only when you tire of romance in its greatest sense.

Denver (Colo) Times 3/22/24

Boston American 3/22/24

Fresno (Cal) Bee 3/22/24

D. W. Griffith Made Minute Man In Honor Of Picture, America

NEW YORK, March 22.—For his work in making America, D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Captain E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Captain Breed said: "With your film, America, you have done the apparently impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater luster to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Toledo (O) Blade 3/22/24

NEIL HAMILTON, juvenile with last season's Toledo Theater Company, seems to have arrived as a screen star of importance. He had an important role in D. W. Griffith's "The White Rose," a leading part in the same producer's big historical film, "America," and now has been "farmed out" to Famous Players to appear in "The Mountebank."

'America' Wins Membership for Griffith in Minute Men

For his work in making "America" D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Captain Breed said: "With your film 'America,' you have done the apparently impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater lustre to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Boston American 3/22/24

Chicago (Ill) American Daily

GRIFFITH TO MAKE PICTURES IN ITALY

Minneapolis Journal 3/22/24

NY Tribune 3/23/24

גריפיטס פארט אם קיין אייראָפּע; דעם שאפן אן אימאָליגנישע „אמעריקע"

דער גרויסער פארטיגער פיקטשור דירעקטאר ד. וו. גריפיטס האט הערטיג נעטאן די ריכטיגע צייט זיינען פול אין צוזעמענהאנג מיט זיין גרויסן אינטערעסאנטן פארטיגע „אמעריקע", וואס ווערט פאר א כבוד געגעבן אין אייניגע 44טע סטריט מחאטער. דער פארטיגער פארטיגער פון דער בלוטיגער שלאכט פון בעסטאן, ווען דער אמעריקאנער פאלק האט זיך אפגעריסן פון דער יאך פון ענגלאנד. אין די ערסטע סעריע אין געציינט פון די ערסטע פראבעל אין באסטאן בי די מלחמות וואס וואשינגטאן האט געפיהרט ארום בי יארק. אין די שפעטערע סעריעס וועגן וואהרשיינליך די נעשיכטע פון די אמעריקאנער רעפובליק פארגעזעצט ווערען.

די יעצטיגע פארשטעלונג איז נעבאט געווארן אויף א ערהר נריפיטס מאס שטאב ווי די "בוירט אוו עי נייישן" און אנדערע נריפיטס אונטערנעהמונגען. עס איז פון יעדען שטאנדפונקט א גרויסער ארטיגע פארשטעלונג געשפיעלט פון א גוטע קאמפאניע מיט ליאנעל באריטמאר אין די ראלע פון באנדיט קעפטין וואלטער באסלער, אין די בעסטע ראלע פון די גאנצע פליס.

עס זיינען בעפאר נעציינט געווארן אין מואוויס די נעשיכטע פון די אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע. יעצט בילדער זיינען אבער נעווען שלעכט נעמאכט פון שטאנדפונקט פון דער מלחמה ווי דער ראיישע העלדענטהאטען. דער מאכער פיט די פאהנען און די אנדערע זאכען וואס די מלחמה פריינד ווילען ציינען און פערדעקען די נים געקוועטהעט זאך כען. אין דיעזע מואווי ווערען מעהר פאאיי גענעבען מאר די העסליכע זייטען פון דער מלחמה. איהר זעהט די באר־פוטע, נאקעטע און הונגעריגע סאלדאטען פון וואשינגטאן'ס ארמעע. איהר זעהט ווי ענגלישע סאלדאטען ווערען ווייך, נעהען ארום מארדען אן בעהנען, און קליבען נים אויס צוויי־ען שטאנגען און פרייהייט.

אין דער פראגראם ווערט דער צעהלט אז אין איינע פון די שלאכטען וואס ווערען נעציינט זיינען פון בייד זייטען נעבריידט געווארן פונקט דער יעכער צאהל מענשען ווי אין דער דאזיגער שלאכט. דאס איז אהנע צוויי־פעל אמת. אבער נים אין צאהל מענ־שען אין די ריכטיגע קיים אדער מאלשיים פון א היסטאר־ישען בילד.

צו די לויב פון מר. גריפיטס פון גע־וואנט ווערען אז דער ריכטיגער גייסט פון דער נעשיכטע ווערט דא ריכטיג גע־האלטען, נים קוקענדיג אויף דעם וואס דא־יעצטיגע פרייהייט פון אמעריקא די אנגלענדער קענען זיך דא געציינען בע־ליידיגט. דער אמת איז ווייטער פון אלעם, און דער אמת פארדרעט אז די העלדען וואס האבען זיך בעמהייליגט אין די היסטאר־ישע מלחמה פון וועלטע אמעריקא האט ארויסגעוואקסען יאלאן ריכטיג איבערגעגעבען ווערען.

דער אויצייכער מיגור וואס מיגור אויף אין גראדע דער אין וועמען יעד דערער אינטערעסירט זיך, דאס אין דזשארדזש וואשינגטאן. ער ווערט גע־ציינט בלויז איינינע מאל און אויך דאן בלויז עפעס צו זאגען א ווארט אדער צוויי אום צו קריגען אן אפלאז. דער וואשינגטאן וואס האט געלעבט אין גע־ווירקט, וואס האט נעפיהרט די שלאכט און איז געווען דער ערסטער פרעזידענט ווערט דא נים געציינט, נאר א שטאנדער שאטען פון איהם.

אויף די מואווי "בוירט אוו די נייי־שען" פון מר. גריפיטס איז פריהער אויסגעדריקט געווארן. דערפאר וואס

Fresno (Cal) Bee 3/22/24

NY Freiheit 3/23/24

Denver (Colo) Times 3/22/24

Boston American 3/22/24

Chicago (Ill) American Daily

NY Tribune 3/23/24

NY Review March 22 1924

Minneapolis Journal 3/22/24

NY Freiheit March 22 1924

Cosmopolitan Daily 3/22/24

Director Is To Go to Rome To Consule With Syndicate Who Are Backing Venture

Boston Traveler 3/22/24

Carol Dempster in "America" Majestic

New Britain Herald 3/22/24 Lons Boston (Mass) Traveler

D. W. Griffith has been invited by a syndicate of Italian bankers to visit Rome and confer on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The Italian government has approved the movement. It is understood that the plan calls for a picture dealing with Italian history, similar to Mr. Griffith's "America," which is proving one of his greatest successes.

My Herald 3/22/24

David Wark Griffith is preparing to leave New York April 2 for Rome, where he will confer with Italian film men and bankers concerning the making of at least one large picture dealing with Italian history. Meanwhile, "America" continues turning crowds away at the 44th Street Theatre.

Duluth (Minn) Herald 3/22/24

"America" in London.

LONDON, March 22.—A. D. W. Griffith's representative is reported booking for a London house to show "America," Griffith's latest and historical picture of early American days. There is curiosity as to how the English will receive a picture that dates back to the Revolutionary days with their defeat over there.

My Telegraph 3/23/24

PHILADELPHIA SOON WILL SEE "AMERICA"

Plans Under Way to Open Griffith Spectacle at Chestnut Street Opera House, March 31.

WEEK'S CHANGES TOTAL SIX

PHILADELPHIA, March 22.

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America" will have its Philadelphia premiere at the Chestnut Street Opera House on the evening of March 31. Albert H. Sims, general manager of D. W. Griffith, Inc., accompanied by Patrick Campbell, business manager, was in this city Friday and Thursday to complete the arrangements necessary to be made preparatory to the opening performance. This is a distinct feat to be handled quite much in the same manner as it is being done now in New York. There will be a large orchestra to furnish the music with the film specially scored to accompany the showing of the picture. It is understood that the Philadelphia production will be staged in the same manner as the New York one, with the exception of the orchestra. The cast of the production will be the same as that of the Griffith production now playing in New York. The Philadelphia production will be staged under the direct supervision of Joseph Plunkett, who has charge of staging the production in New York. Mr. Plunkett is a former Philadelphia boy and is well known in this city. The Philadelphia production will be staged in the Chestnut Street Opera House for a period of three weeks, beginning March 31.

Philadelphia (Pa) Record March 23 1924

Philadelphia (Pa) North American March 23/24

'AMERICA,' GRIFFITH FILM, DUE MARCH 31

Production Will Have a Run at Chestnut Street Opera House

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 3/23/24

"America" Griffith's Great Film

Romance With Historical Background Is in New Picture—Carol Dempster in Leading Female Role.

WHAT is believed to be the peer of any of his previous achievements as the foremost director in motion pictures is D. W. Griffith's "America," now the hit of the season at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre in New York, and, in duplicate, to be offered in this city beginning Monday, March 31, at the Chestnut Street Opera House for an indefinite engagement. The picture has brought the most enthusiastic praise from the leading commentators upon picture productions, and it is regarded as a genuine contribution to visual records of history. However, the picture is not a historical pageant, but rather is concerned with the telling of a tale of personal sacrifices, at the same time that a tender romance develops. Griffith, with that mastery for which he is noted, has made his players stand forth with a great realism and in situations of amusing or of tragic tenor, and he has likewise achieved some tremendously effective scenes that include important and significant happenings of the Revolutionary War. Indeed, the Revolution is the background for the story, and one sees Paul Revere in a thrilling ride at night to awaken the sleeping people of the countryside, the Minute Men at their patriotic duty, battles of Lexington and Concord, of Bunker Hill, of Princeton, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the Americans in that dread winter at Valley Forge and, ultimately, following some tremendous scenes of Mohawk attack upon settlers along the frontiers, the firm establishment of a nation—the United States.

Griffith created his new play from a story written by Robert W. Chambers, the famous American novelist, with arrangement by John E. Pell. Care was exercised to have historical accuracy in each detail of presentation, and at every hand there was helpfulness on the part of historians and of historical societies. Some of the scenes were taken at the actual place of happening and, where this was not possible because of changed conditions, faithful reproduction of the original environment, was accomplished. The historical characters stand forth as actual human beings, and there is interweaving of the fictional characters so that the story has great realism. Griffith has brought to the fore in this new creation Carol Dempster, who has the most important role of her screen career. Lionel Barrymore as Captain Walter Butler, the villain of the play; Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack, Lucille LeVerne, Louis Wolheim and others are in the long and distinguished cast. The picture has a special musical setting that has plenty of appropriate and inspiriting melodies. That music will be played by a large orchestra, and, of course, "effects" such as Griffith never neglects, will enhance the picture's value as entertainment.

Carol Dempster has "arrived." She must now be considered as among the leading women of the screen. Her rise has come in "America." Critics have placed upon her brow the laurel wreath of praise and the public likewise has endorsed her work in this picture by flocks of eager patrons.

Miss Dempster is a pupil of Miss Minnie Dupree, who has been under his direction during the entire time of her stage career, and all the honors of the talented actress of course be for other drama has come through sitting at the feet of the master. Miss Dempster has been in the Griffith school of acting and is a graduate of the Griffith school of acting. Her first appearance before the public was in the role of Dorothy Gish's sister in "Orphans of the Storm." Then she was cast in a leading role in "Isn't Life Wonderful," and in "Dream Street" she made her appearance before the public. Then she was cast in a leading role in "Sally of the Sawdust," and in "Sally

Boston Advertiser 3/23/24

Boston (Mass) Post March 23 1924

Kansas City (Mo) Journal 3/23/24

Springfield Mass News March 25 1924

Capital Comes to Rome

D. W. GRIFFITH has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the mayor's cabinet of Rome.

In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate it says: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is the first time an American artist has ever been sought by another people to re-establish an art activity. In many instances American financiers and business men have been invited to reorganize a country's industries or economics, but this seems to be the first time an artist has been sought for that purpose.

Rochester (N.Y.) Dem. & Chronicle 3/23/24

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the Mayor's Cabinet of Rome. No definite plans have been made regarding the nature of the story, but the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America." This picture of the Revolutionary War is now breaking all house records at the Forty-fourth Street Theater in New York and at the Majestic Theater in Boston.

Jack Horne has been outfitted with two

Carol Dempster "America" Majestic

Dayton (O) News March 23 24

Philadelphia (Pa) Inquirer March 23 1924

The wild ride of Paul Revere, which has been made immortal through the brilliant genius of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, has been given added fame by the picture in "America," now at the Majestic, of this self-same gallop through Middlesex County on the night of April 18, 1775. There is such a thing as dramatic and poetic license and, I presume, there is or should be movie license, and in the case of Mr. Revere's midnight trip to Lexington, the makers of the picture have adopted much latitude. In the real episode there were no stone walls to jump, no rivers to leap over, no crashing through underbrush to escape detection, just a straightaway run against time, up what is now Broadway to Arlington, and thence along Massachusetts avenue to the Bedford road.

But why be finicky? The picture is a thrilling one, and all the impedimenta above referred to, while not historical, are effective, and cause the pulses to quicken. We all know that when Mr. Revere had warned Sam Adams and his friend, Hancock, of their peril, he started for Concord, but was captured by the British at the point where three townships come together—Lincoln, Bedford and Lexington. Next time you are driving over the State road to Concord, pause for a moment at the huge boulder which marks the spot and read the tablet which will tell the whole story.

The Forward 3/24/24

גריפיט פאר ראפא; וועם שאפען אן אר־מאליענשע "אמעריקא"

דער גרויסער מואווינג פיקטשור דיי־רעקטאר, ד. וו. גריפיט, מיט וועמעס נאמען די ציימונגען זיינען פול אין צו־זאמענהאנג מיט זיין גרויסען, איבער־ראשענדען ספעקטאקעל "אמעריקא", וואס ווערט פאר די לעצטע וואכען גע־וויזען אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער, פער־לאזט אין איינינע טעג ארום אמעריקא.

דער בעריהמטער מואווי דירעקטאר וועט זיך אפשטעלען אין פערשיעדענע לענ־דער, אבער די גרעסטע ציים וועט ער פערברענגען אין איטאליען. וואו ער איז איינגעלאדען געווארען צוצוגרייטען א נייע גרויסע איטאליעניש נאציאנאלע בילד, אויפ'ן מוסטער פון "אמעריקא".

ווען עס איז געוויזען געווארען "אמע־ריקא", דאס בילד וואס פערהערליכט די גרויסע אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע, האט מען זיך־געווענדעט צו מר. גריפיט אז עס וואלט געווען א גרויסער פערדינסט פון זיין זייט, ווען ער זאל אויפלעבען אויפ'ן לייוועגס די וויכטיג־סטע עפיזאדען אויך פון אנדערע פעל־קער. ער האט זיך פערטראכט איבער דעם און האט אנגענומען דעם פארשלאג. זיין נעפסט בילד וועט זיין פון דער אר־מאליענישער געשיכטע און ער פארדינט אוועק קיין איטאליען כדי צו מאכען דאס בילד אויפ'ן פלאץ, וואו די נעשי־הענישען זיינען פארגעקומען.

"אמעריקא" איז א ספעקטאקעל פון אזא פארנעם, וואס מיר האבען נאך ביז איצט נים געהאט ביי אונז אויפ'ן ליכט־וועגס. עס פערכאפט אייך מיט זיין רייכקייט און אינטערעסאנטקייט.

D. W. GRIFFITH TO ITALY TO MAKE BIG PHOTOPLAYS

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the mayor's cabinet of Rome.

The action on the part of the bankers has the consent and approval of the Italian givernment.

No definite plans have been made regarding the nature of the story, but the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America," Mr. Griffith's latest masterpiece. This picture of the Revolutionary war is now breaking all house records at the Forty-fourth street theater in New York and at the Majestic theater in Boston.

Mr. Griffith may visit Russia to confer regarding possibilities of making a picture there before he returns.

Walter Hiers has left the Paramount fold and is now playing opposite Dorothy Devore in a Christy comedy.

Jersey City (N.J.) Journal 3/24/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"

BY MAURICE HENLE

A few years back, D. W. Griffith swept the country with "The Birth of a Nation," after Paramount let loose a broadside with "The Covered Wagon." Both were epics.

Now these same two—Griffith and Paramount—are once more knocking at the door of the screen's Hall of Fame—Paramount's "The Ten Commandments," and Griffith's "America."

The possibilities for "America" drain the imagination as no other subject possibly can. The film is not only a lesson in history—one that will be shown to every school-child in the country—but a film that binds the adult public more closely to the picture world than ever before.

"America" was begun under the inspiration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who urged Griffith to immortalize the war for American independence. Not only the D. A. R., but all big patriotic societies co-operated with the producer with the enthusiasm of school children in a commencement day play.

Secretary of War Weeks placed thousands of soldiers at Griffith's command and these troops, in costume, re-enacted the principal battles of the Revolution.

But that isn't all. In a special train, Griffith and his company toured the shrines of American liberty, staged scenes on actual sites of the picturesque scenes of the war.

Old homes, those that have been standing since the Revolution were turned over for Griffith's use by enthusiastic citizens, and relics, priceless relics, that have been handed down from one generation to another, were surrendered to the director for use in the picture.

Just as "The Covered Wagon" drew a striking contrast between our West of the early eighteens and that of today, just so "America" brings home to the public the vast growth since 1776.

519 Main Street, one 2-story frame, alteration, $8,000.

West New York—Casimiro Capozzi, south side Eleventh Street, 35 feet east of Madison Street, one 4-story brick, $50,000; Biagio Perrone, 520 Ninth Street, one 3-story brick, $20,000.

Jewish Morning Journal 3/24/24

גריפיט פאר־ם אף קין איראפא; וועם שאפען א אימאליענישע "אמעריקא"

דער גרויסער מואווינג פיקטשור דיי־רעקטאר ד. וו. גריפיט, מיט וועמעס נאמען די ציימונגען זיינען פול אין צו־זאמענהאנג מיט זיין גרויסען, איבערראש־שענדען ספעקטאקל "אמעריקא", וואס ווערט פאר די לעצטע וואכען געוויזען אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער, פארלאזט אין איינינע טעג ארום אמעריקא. דער בע־ריהמטער מואווי דירעקטאר וועט זיך אפשטעלען אין פערשיעדענע לענדער, אבער די גרעסטע ציים וועט פארברענגען אין איטאליען, וואו ער איז געווארען צוגרייטען א נייע גרויסע איטאליעניש נאציאנאלע בילד, אויפ'ן מוסטער פון "אמעריקא".

ווען עס איז געוויזען געווארען "אמע־ריקא", דאס בילד וואס פערהערליכט די גרויסע אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע, האט מען זיך־געווענדעט צו מר. גריפיט אז עס וואלט געווען א גרויסער פערדינסט פון זיין זייט, ווען ער זאל אויפלעבען אויפ'ן לייוועגס די וויכטיג־סטע עפיזאדען אויך פון אנדערע פעל־קער. ער האט זיך פערטראכט איבער דעם און האט אנגענומען דעם פארשלאג. זיין נעפסט בילד וועט זיין דער אר־מאליענישער געשיכטע און ער פארדינט אוועק קיין איטאליען כדי צו מאכען דאס בילד אויפ'ן פלאץ, וואו די נעשי־הענישען זיינען פארגעקומען.

Boston Telegram 3/24/24

Griffith has accepted an Invitation from an Italian syndicate of backers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. While no definite plans have been made regarding the nature of the story it is said the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America."

BOSTON ENTHUSES OVER FILM "AMERICA"

It is a long time since Boston has had a theater pleasure like that provided by D. W. Griffith in his latest picture, "America," at the Majestic theater. It is a true and beautiful story of the romance and sacrifice of the early days of New England. When the aristocrat of power and id[illegible] on milk, wine and money, and [illegible] more lowly worked hard and long to provide a living. This situation could not last and when the break came, the colonists of Massachusetts and Virginia proved themselves worthy of the freeman's title they so bravely fought to win.

The love story which is between a Tory maid and a patriot soldier flows through the swiftly changing and thrilling scenes like the gentle light of an early May morning. And, by the way, it is a fact that in all of Mr Griffith's picture creations, it is the first love of the heroine that gives charm and interest to the narrative. In the "Birth of a Nation," "Way Down East" "Hearts of the World," "Broken Blossoms" and "Orphans of the Storm" you may remark it in characteristic.

In the huge romance of America in the making he has thrown around the wonderful scenes that have moved the critics to say "unbelievable perfection" and turned a new page in the book of D. W. Griffith's success in directing genius. With photography which often resembles delicate etchings, he has shown now in Virginia now in Massachusetts, now in Philadelphia great men and events. You see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty, Boston; George Washington, John Hancock, Sam Adams, John Adams, and on the other side the place of King George, in [illegible] and the House of Parliament, and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies. Then there is Paul Revere's famous ride and the fights at Concord and Lexington, the first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence and Valley Forge, and finally the march of the Washington army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

Boston Post 3/24/24

Baltimore American March 23 1924

WJZ

David Wark Griffith, the most famous director and producer of motion pictures in the world, will speak to the radio fans through station WJZ tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock. Mr. Griffith has chosen as his subject "What Makes a Good Movie," and his views on that subject will be eagerly awaited by every movie-goer in the country who has wondered just what the intangible something is which lifts Griffith pictures above the ordinary run of movies and makes every one a great one.

* * *

Listeners-in on WJZ during Tuesday evening will find themselves suddenly transported to the center of the Dark Continent, for that station will broadcast 15 minutes of Akeley's "In Darkest Africa." A more vivid verbal picture of the life and country which has always been linked with tragic romance and weird adventure will be hard to find, and to those to whom the radio has several times before been a magic carpet of travel Tuesday's prog. is will find a warm welcome.

* * *

As a feature of the United States Navy Night program from Station WJZ on Tuesday night, Admiral Hugh Rodman, United States Navy, will address the radio listeners. Admiral Rodman was formerly commander-in-chief of the [illegible] the Nineteenth Century. That [illegible] and jazz do not depend upon [illegible] by the popularity of [illegible] last radio performance, for both of them are over twenty years of age, and yet their condition of the song site of yesterday and today brought forth an unusual number of letters from the listeners-in.

Oakland (Cal) Tribune 3/23/24

Oakland Tribune

Griffith Taken Into Ranks of The Minute Men

For his work of making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, The Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Captain E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Captain Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater luster to the memory of the Battle of Lexington."

Lexington (Ky) Herald 3/23/24

D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men at Lexington, Mass., for his work in making "America." At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to determine the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event. The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented to Mr. Griffith by Capt. E. F. Breed, of Lexington. The Minute Men is the oldest military organization in the country.

Omaha (Nebr) Bee 3/23/24

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger March 23/24

Ottawa (Can) Rep.-Times 3/24/24

Kansas City Star 3/24/24

Springfield (Mass) News 3/24/24

Boston Post 3/24/24

Manchester News 3/24/24

Serbian Daily March 25 1924

"AMERICA"

Једна друга кинематографска представа не може тако интересирати иностранце, забављати их и дати им поуке као што Грифитова "Америка" која је изазвала пану сензацију. Сада се даје у позоришту на 44. улици.

Она кинематографија показује покрштавање раних Американаца који су се борили да ова земља буде слободна.

Г. Грифит је улазе у историјску драму дубоких романа једног младића и једне девојке који су прошли кроз страхоте и историјске догађаје године 1776.

Амерички критичари Њујорка и Бостона изјавили су да је ово најинтересанија и најзанимљивија представа у задње време. Грифит иде на свих других позоришних редитеља чији приказивати драму и романтичност дубоких и историских догађаја.

Поред тога, када говоре о старог пријатеља у Америци и страних држава из Европе у вези ових зона. Буш говори против европске земље чији су се борили за слободу и у Америци. Приказе који приказују у тим покрајинама борбе и у борби за слободу. У приказивању [illegible] у историјске догађаје. Прво [illegible] Бостон. Прво [illegible] Бостон. Тада [illegible] Бостон. Тада [illegible] Бостон. Тада

New Bedford (Mass) Mercury 3/25/24

FINANCING PHOTOPLAYS.

Emphasize some producers have emphasized the financial outlay involved in the productions, and in a number of cases the figures given out were staggering. There were days when $100,000 was a huge sum to spend on a production, but we have had million-dollar pictures, and quite recently,
"The Ten Commandments," on which Cecil B. De Mille is said to have spent nearly $2,000,000. Apropos of this cost of production and the borrowing of money, we went over to see David Wark Griffith, who consented to talk on the subject, although he is a believer in the artistic worth of the picture and not in favor of exploiting its cost. He is known by his colleagues to be an artist who studies the desires of the public, and not a business man.

As it happened, we interrupted Mr.
Griffith at a moment when he was going over the orchestration of "America." He was actually telling the orchestra in la-da-das what he wanted, but in his usual good-natured way he kept the appointment he had made with us.

With him it is always a fight between gold and art when making a production, and, curiously enough, new angles concerning his work were revealed in the course of the interview. De had heard a good deal about borrowing money for the purpose of producing pictures, and were aware that some well-known stars not only manage to get amounts at a not unusual rate of interest, but pay themselves huge salaries while they are working on the films, which is consented to by the banks or the financiers. We also knew that a little while before "America" was finished Mr. Griffith had to borrow more money, for which he was charged the apparently exorbitant interest of 30 per cent.

Mr. Griffith admitted that he had been forced to pay this high rate of interest, and he explained that it was not unusual, taking into consideration the risk the lenders took in advancing money on a production. He said that it never would have been diff-cult to obtain the usual interest on their money in a venture without any risk. But in a film production there is usually a great risk, as one never can tell whether a picture will be successful.

"The Birth of a Nation," Mr. Griffith's great film success of years ago, met with instant favor, but there are others of his productions that are slow in bringing in the money. It so happened, however, that Mr.
Griffith's financial interest in "The Birth of a Nation" was quite small.
One man, who afterward reaped a fortune of nearly $750,000 from "The Birth of a Nation," was willing at one time to dispose of his share of the film for $10,000.

Another picture which was a speedy hit was "Way Down East," which has not only been a marvelous success in this country but also in England and other parts of the world.
However, before the interest on the money advanced has been paid, and the cost of distribution, it is a long while before the producer begins to reap any financial benefits from his months of concentrated work.

"Orphans of the Storm" is a slow moving film in the market, and "Intolerance" is said to have been sadly handicapped on its presentation at a inopportune period. "One Exciting Night" cannot be judged properly so far, any more than "The White Rose."
The former cost about $700,000 and the latter about $600,00. The expense attached to the producing of "America," Mr. Griffith's last picture, which I now running in the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, is in the neighborhood of $1,300,000.

Mr. Griffith emphasized the point that at such cost no picture maker could afford to make failures, as there would come a time when he would not be able to borrow money and would have to cease his producing.

"Nobody is sure about a picture," observed Mr. Griffith. "One may think that it is good, but whether it is going to meet popular favor is always problematical. 'America' has opened with success in New York and Boston. I did have an idea that this picture would go well, but really only after trial exhibitions in small towns. I am always in trepidation before a picture is presented. In the small town where we first showed 'America' I was more sanguine about it when the audience arose in their seats and howled with excitement at Paul Revere's ride. I then knew that it had a chance.

"A man producing a picture has got to do his utmost to make as certain as he possibly can that the investors are going to get back their money.
The business end has its notion of commercial or popular appeal, and it stands to reason that they have to be humored. You have the costs of some film productions, and can therefore get an idea of the fortunes risked. In stage productions they spend from $5,000 to $25,000, and they do not have to pay the players during rehearsals.

"I live for my work. It is a pleasure to me. I am wrapped up in it while it is going on. Nevertheless, at every thought of the great risk a red light comes up before me. You must please the majority with a film production.
As a matter of personal opinion, I believe that with the right sort of picture one can please most people. I am opposed to the idea that one type of picture has to be made for highbrows and another for the great mass of people. If your picture is really good,
I believe it will please everybody. Remember Kiplings lines: "The Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady are sisters under their skins.'"

One interesting statement which
Mr. Griffith dropped casually was to the effect that he must produce big pictures. They are expected of him, and if for the sake of economy he makes an ordinary type of programme picture, no matter how well it is produced, it will be disappointing to many thousands who expect big things when Griffith's name is attached to a film. He declared, with emphatic modesty, that what motion picture enthusiasts all over the country want from him is something on the order of "America".

It is the general opinion that this producer, who to the average man who goes and sees one of his pictures is a wealthy genius, is one of the few in the motion picture industry who sacrifices gold for the sake of his art.
He has had many successes and is considered without a peer in the direction of really big productions, but

Boston Telegram March 26 1924

Our Movie Fans

GEO. F. PARKER, THE MOVIE MAN IN "AMERICA"

Denver (Colo) Post 3/27/24

GRIFFITH INVITED TO REVIVE MOVIES FOR ITALIANS

Big Show American Artists Sought by Europe to Re-Establish Art.

Boston (Mass) Herald March 25 1924

Last Night on the Radio—By Pioneer

"Dear Sir: I observe among the notes by Mrs. Albert Holcomb, in your issue of the 19th inst., that no mention was made of the announcer of 'WEAF.'

"The article was devoted to comments on the announcers of the various radio stations.

"Have heard them all and consider that 'WEAF' is by far the most distinctive.

"His enunciation, in addition to his pronunciation of foreign words, is simply perfect. It would be a great relief to radio listeners if the others would take some points from our 'WEAF.'

Very truly,
V. COBLENTZ."

* * *

While listening to many of the announcers, we recall the "morning-glory-horn days of the phonograph, when those weak, nasal voices struggled with the scratchy noises in an effort to tell us that it was an "—— record, played by, etc., etc." They were unromantic preludes, no warmth, no life and just as mechanical as the machines that pushed them into the offended ears of the listeners.

* * *

"Otium cum dignitate" (ease with dignity) is the three-word rule that we believe our announcers will do well to follow. The WEAF announcers emphasize dignity and carry it far beyond the limits of ordinary conduct. They reduce announcing to the matter of uncolorful recitation. Although they are not affectatious, there is little feeling in what they have to say. We can also see the blue pencil of the censor. They appeal to us as men who have been given a very narrow path to follow, and they follow it doggedly, never daring to call upon their imagination to introduce a little freedom into their otherwise dry remarks. We do not point to Roxy as our polished idol, but he approaches our ideal in so far as he permits his true self, his natural personality, to reign. Is our logic in this matter substantiated by Roxy's appalling popularity? Can we point to any announcer who can eclipse him?

Bright Spots for To-day

Debate—"Resolved, that Capital Punishment Should Be Apolished," Lewis E. Lawes, agent and warden of Sing Sing prison, affirmative, and Dr. William Lathrop Love, chairman of the committee on penal institutions of the New York Senate, negative, WEAF, 9:45 p. m.

Sascha Jacobson, violinist, WEAF, 9:30 p. m.

"Trial by Jury," by Brooklyn Light Opera Society, WJY, 8:15 p. m.

U. S. Navy Yard Band, WJZ, 9:15 p. m.

"Woodrow Wilson and His Cabinet," by William C. Redfield, 9:15 p. m. from WOR.

Some day, when we have more time, we are going to publish the standard list of phrases used so religiously by our announcers, and then dare them to break the rules!

* * *

We have been trying to answer the question: "Why is it that our other broadcasters cannot match the superb piano recitals that come from WEAF?" We refer not alone to the artists, but to the exquisite reproduction. When Edgar Fairchild played "The World Is Waiting for the Sunshine" the piano was a living instrument. We understand that WEAF has studied this matter. The result is certainly worth the effort.

* * *

We welcome D. W. Griffith to broadcasting. He was soothing after listening to the dashing "Thief of Bagdad" and the demure "Rosita." Griffith did say something about his new picture, but if there was anything obnoxious about it it was swallowed up in the personality of the man. And how pleased we were when he exposed the announcer by accusing him of "reading of those nice things which were not true." Griffith shot a dart straight to the weak spot in our armor when he said that. While we are sure that he was not "bored to death," as he professed, we surmise that he was more serious when he said, "But I'm sure you have been bored to death before."

So Mr. Griffith is a radio fan. We also welcome him to fandom. (We shall have to send him the details of our Cookoodyne.) "I'll suffer at this end and you will suffer at the other end," he added, proving that he is the artist that knows how to break out of his shell. Griffith was altogether different, and his cheerful words reached us like fresh air in a stuffy place. Although he was going to tell us "What Makes a Good Picture," he said there was "no such thing," and if there was, "we knew as much about it as he did." Griffith was refreshingly good. We feel like calling him Dave.

* * *

On the one hand:

"Sir: In this morning's issue you severely take to task the announcer at WEAF in connection with his description of the Goldstein-Lynch prizefight, and, while not an expert radio listener like yourself, I thought that this announcer reported the fight exceptionally well, despite the fact that he said Bernstein once or twice instead of Goldstein, and it may be that this gentleman does not claim to be infallible, and he probably knows, or thinks, that the only place where an infallible individual may be found is in the radio department of a daily newspaper.

"W. R. PADEN."

And on the other:

"My Dear Friend: I want to congratulate you on your criticism of the announcer who broadcast last night's fight. Such criticism is constructive and helpful and every word of it truthful, and those in charge of selecting announcers in future events may profit by your suggestions.

"Your 'Last Night on the Radio' is certainly interesting and eagerly sought for every morning and favorably commented upon by many friends, who all agree it is the best review of its kind published.

"With sincerest wishes, cordially,
"CHARLES H. GESSNER."

Boston (Mass) advertiser March 25 1924

Indian Massacre scene from "America" (Majestic). D. W. Griffith's master-film

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 3/27/24

"AMERICA" IS COMING TO LOCAL THEATER

Sam Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's greatest triumph, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" have its local premiere at the Pitt theater on Monday night, April 7. This throbbing romance of this country's struggles for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the war department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story, has woven a beautiful love story on the background of authentic history.

Carol Dempster, who plays the role of Nancy Montague, the belle of Virginia; Neil Hamilton, the latest Griffith "find" whom the master of cinema art says will become the greatest "great lover" of the screen; Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim and numerous other luminaries of the film world will come here in person to attend the premiere, according to Blair.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 3/27/24

"AMERICA" IS COMING TO LOCAL THEATER

Sam Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's greatest triumph, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" have its local premiere at the Pitt theater on Monday night, April 7. This throbbing romance of this country's struggles for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the war department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story, has woven a beautiful love story on the background of authentic history.

Carol Dempster, who plays the role of Nancy Montague, the belle of Virginia; Neil Hamilton, the latest Griffith "find" whom the master of cinema art says will become the greatest "great lover" of the screen; Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim and numerous other luminaries of the film world will come here in person to attend the premiere, according to Blair.

Greek Paper Atlantis 3/26/24

ΘΕΑΤΡΙΚΑ

"America".

Εἰς τὸ θέατρον «44th Street Theatre» παίζεται τὸ ἑξαίσιον κινηματόδραμα «America» τὸ ὁποῖον ἐκινηματογραφήθη ὑπὸ τὴν ἐπίβλεψιν τοῦ κ. D. W. Griffith. Ἡ ὑπόθεσις τοῦ ἔργου τούτου βασίζεται ἐπὶ διαφόρων πατριωτικῶν καὶ ρομαντικῶν ἐπεισοδίων τῆς Ἀμερικανικῆς Ἱστορίας. Ἐν τῷ κινηματοδράματι τούτῳ βλέπουν οἱ ἐνδιαφερόμενοι καὶ δὴ οἱ μὴ γεννηθέντες ἐν Ἀμερικῇ, τὰς θυσίας τῶν πρώτων Ἀμερικανῶν Ἀποίκων ὑπὲρ τῆς θεμελιώσεως τῆς μεγίστης τῶν Δημοκρατιῶν τοῦ κόσμου. Οἱ κριτικοὶ τῶν σπουδαιοτέρων ἐφημερίδων τῆς χώρας ἀνεκήρυξαν τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο ὡς τὸ μεγαλείτερον εἰς τὸ εἶδός του. Πρὸ τῶν ὀμμάτων τοῦ θεατοῦ παρελαύνουν αἱ σκηναὶ τῆς κηρύξεως τῆς Ἀνεξαρτησίας τῆς Ἀμερικῆς, διάφοροι μάχαι τοῦ Ἀγγλο-Ἀμερικανικοῦ πολέμου καὶ διάφορα ἄλλα ἐνδιαφέροντα καὶ κατὰ τὸ πλεῖστον ἱστορικὰ ἐπεισόδια. Διὰ τὴν λῆψιν τῆς ἐξέχου ταύτης κινηματογραφικῆς ταινίας, συνειργάσθη ὁ στρατὸς τῆς χώρας καὶ πολλὰ ἐπίσημα γροφεῖα. Ἡ ταινία αὕτη δὲν θὰ ἀπιδειχθῇ διαρκοῦντος τοῦ 1924 εἰς ἄλλο τι θέατρον ἐκτὸς τοῦ προειρημένου.

Atlanta 26

Boston advertiser 3/26/24

GRIFFITH'S PATRIOTIC CLASSIC

Carol Dempster, heroine in "America," the D. W. Griffith photo-play epic of our War for Independence. The production, now at the Majestic Theatre, is giving Boston a tremendous thrill in the way it brings to life the heroism and drama of the American Revolution.

Atlantic National Daily Greek Newspaper 3/26/24

ΘΕΑΤΡΙΚΑ

"America".

Εἰς τὸ θέατρον «44th Street Theatre» παίζεται τὸ ἑξαίσιον κινηματόδραμα «America» τὸ ὁποῖον ἐκινηματογραφήθη ὑπὸ τὴν ἐπίβλεψιν τοῦ κ. D. W. Griffith. Ἡ ὑπόθεσις τοῦ ἔργου τούτου βασίζεται ἐπὶ διαφόρων πατριωτικῶν καὶ ρομαντικῶν ἐπεισοδίων τῆς Ἀμερικανικῆς Ἱστορίας. Ἐν τῷ κινηματοδράματι τούτῳ βλέπουν οἱ ἐνδιαφερόμενοι καὶ δὴ οἱ μὴ γεννηθέντες ἐν Ἀμερικῇ, τὰς θυσίας τῶν πρώτων Ἀμερικανῶν Ἀποίκων ὑπὲρ τῆς θεμελιώσεως τῆς μεγίστης τῶν Δημοκρατιῶν τοῦ κόσμου. Οἱ κριτικοὶ τῶν σπουδαιοτέρων ἐφημερίδων τῆς χώρας ἀνεκήρυξαν τὸ ἔργον τοῦτο ὡς τὸ μεγαλείτερον εἰς τὸ εἶδός του. Πρὸ τῶν ὀμμάτων τοῦ θεατοῦ παρελαύνουν αἱ σκηναὶ τῆς κηρύξεως τῆς Ἀνεξαρτησίας τῆς Ἀμερικῆς, διάφοροι μάχαι τοῦ Ἀγγλο-Ἀμερικανικοῦ πολέμου καὶ διάφορα ἄλλα ἐνδιαφέροντα καὶ κατὰ τὸ πλεῖστον ἱστορικὰ ἐπεισόδια. Διὰ τὴν λῆψιν τῆς ἐξέχου ταύτης κινηματογραφικῆς ταινίας, συνειργάσθη ὁ στρατὸς τῆς χώρας καὶ πολλὰ ἐπίσημα γροφεῖα. Ἡ ταινία αὕτη δὲν θὰ ἀπιδειχθῇ διαρκοῦντος τοῦ 1924 εἰς ἄλλο τι θέατρον ἐκτὸς τοῦ προειρημένου.

Atlanta 26

Chron-Tel 3/27/24

My Post 3/26/24

My Telegraph March 27 1924

Edwards Called to Italy.

Apparently the revival of motion picture production in Italy is to extend beyond D. W. Griffith. It was reported yesterday that J. Gordon Edwards, for years director general of the Fox Film Corporation, accompanied by Mrs. Edwards, will leave for Rome on the steamship Paris on April 2 for a conference with directors of one of the largest Italian film companies. Although Mr. Edwards would not discuss the details of his mission, it is understood that the cable concerning him was for the purpose of completing arrangements for the production of a feature picture in that country. They want him as exclusive director with an American cast, so that the picture when completed can be marketed in this country.

Mr. Edwards has worked in several enterprises in Italy. He spent nearly a year in Rome on "Ben" for Fox, and later made part of the "Shepherd King" there after his return from Egypt. He does not for the most of the picture, but it is understood that he will have charge of some several more productions. He has not yet finished his contract with the Fox company.

Boston (Mass) american March 27 1924

HAMILTON NEAR DEATH UNDER HORSE'S HOOF

Lasting Joy Has Won His Success in Four Years

Albany Times 3/27/24

My Telegraph March 27 1924

Women Phil Chronicle March 27 1924

Chicago Tribune March 27 1924

Chicago Herald Examiner March 27 1924

Detroit Telegram March 27 1924

Chicago Herald Examiner March 27 1924

Boston Advertiser 3/26/24

Albany (NY) Times-Union 3/28/24

Chicago (Ill) News 3/28/24

Behind the Screen.

BY GLADYS HALL.

D. W. Griffith's "America" is one of the most stirring pictures I have ever seen.

Taking, as he does, a series of familiarly named battles, battles we all conned, perhaps with a vague resentment and with little imaginary fervor, from history tomes in the four or fifth grades of grammar school—Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill—and stringing them on the thin thread of a love story, he still manages to make the heart beat faster and the pulses hum throughout.

The ride of Paul Revere and his famous and valiant cry: "To arms! To arms! The British are coming!" The gathering together of the gallant Minute men, the shot that rang 'round the world, the splendid portrayals given by Charles Emmett Mack and Lionel Barrymore, all of these are unforgettable things.

Louis Wolheim's face, as Captain Hare, is another unforgettable thing, but that is, really, another story.

In a brief word on the theater program, Mr. Griffith explains that the picture play is "merely an attempt to suggest in a small way the great sacrifice made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. It is in no sense an attempt to portray the story of the revolutionary war; as that story is too tremendous to be told fully by many picture plays, much less by one."

Perhaps that is so. But whether it was "the story of the revolutionary war," in toto or in part, the house was full of children, boys and girls ranging from 4 to 14, all leaning forward with hushed intent faces, all clapping loudly when the stately, dignified figure of George Washington stepped on to the scene, when Revere made his marvelous midnight ride, when the signals flashed out from the Old North church, when the splendid little body of seventy-seven Americans stood up against the uniformed, 800 Britishers. Those boys and those girls were seeing, for the first time, history living, breathing, moving, vitalized by a touch that was as sensitive as it was authentic, as painstaking as it was fired with passion and pain—the unforgotten passion and pain of the sacrifice our forefathers had made. Never again would the battles of Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill be mere names and dates to them. Never again would George Washington be "the Father of His Country" or the little boy who "never told a lie," but a man of inspiration and idealism and courage upon whose shoulders a mighty trust was laid.

Whatever you, here and there, may think of the picture as a performance, whatever flaws or splendors you may find in it, certainly the ideal back of it, the thought, the work, the research, endeavor that gave it birth is deserving of the heartiest commendation, the most sincere thanks.

Every child who can see "America" should do so. Whether or not they follow the story fully, they cannot fail to come away animated by a love of country, a new and great perception of what has gone before them that will remain with them always, and always to their betterment.

[All rights reserved. The Metropolitan Newspaper Service.]

Norristown (Pa) Herald Times 3/29/24

MOVIE PRODUCERS AT VALLEY FORGE

D. W. Griffith and John L. E. Pell to Be Guests of Dr. W. Herbert Burk

Dr. and Mrs. W. Herbert Burk will entertain D. W. Griffith and John L. E. Pell at luncheon tomorrow in the Martha Washington Log Cabin at Valley Forge. Mr. Griffith's greatest production "America" will be shown for the first time in this neighborhood in the Chestnut Street Opera House, Philadelphia, on Monday evening.

Mr. Pell who has been associated with Mr. Griffith in this great historic production produced the famous whaling picture, "They that Go Down to the Sea in Ships."

Mr. Griffith is coming to Valley Forge to pay tribute to the men of Washington's army, whom he has represented in his great historical production. He will place a wreath on the Waterman grave, as a tribute to the soldiers of Valley Forge, and will place flowers in front of the statue of Washington. "Valley Forge," in the Washington Memorial Chapel.

Tomorrow morning the service will be the reunion of Dr. Burk's confirmation classes. The afternoon service at 3.15 will be under the auspices of the Colonial Dames of Rhode Island. Dr. Burk will preach at both services.

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 3/28/24

First in Line for Forum Seats

ALTHOUGH tickets have not been placed on sale, Virginia Valli is among the first of the motion picture stars to have expressed a desire for reservations the opening night of the new Forum Theater with D. W. Griffith's latest production, "America." Virginia saw the Griffith picture in New York recently and says it out ranks "The Birth of a Nation."

The management of the new house is taking the necessary precautions against ticket speculators. The Forum, located at Pico and Norton streets, opens about May 1 and is said to be the finest residential theater in California.

Denver (Colo) Post March 29 1924

UNITED ARTISTS WILL CONTINUE

New York, March 29. — Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and D. W. Griffith at a stockholders meeting Friday agreed to carry out their existing contracts with the United Artists corporation, which distributes their motion pictures, it was announced Friday night.

Miss Pickford, Fairbanks and Griffith, it was announced, also signed new three-year contracts, Chaplin not doing so because he had eight pictures yet to make on existing contracts. All officers of the corporation were re-elected.

Catholic Bulletin Cleveland Ohio 3/28/24

Stage and Screen

IN his latest production, "America," D. W. Griffith has given to the America people the greatest picture of his career. The picture carries a secondary title, "The Sacrifice for Freedom," which explains the attempt which the photoplay makes to suggest the great sacrifice made by America's Revolutionary patriots in order that America might become a free and independent nation. Other pictures have presented the more dramatic incidents of certain wars, but this is the first time, so far as this writer recalls, that a serious effort has been made to picture a great national movement and at the same time to portray the causes and events in connection therewith.

"America" is divided into two parts representing two distinct periods. The first deals mainly with the dramatic ride of Paul Revere, which furnishes some of the most thrilling episodes which the camera art has yet produced.

The love story running through the photoplay introduces characters of the period preceding the Revolutionary War when the Colonies were beginning to resent the tyrannical rule of England.

At the beginning of the second part, where the scenes shift to the struggle of the Continental Army in New York State, there is a drop in dramatic interest although some stirring scenes take place in carrying both the historical and love romance to a satisfactory conclusion. The struggles of Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the rescue of Fort Sacrifice by Morgan's Raiders, and the defeat of Butler and his Indians enliven the unfolding of the story in the second part, which finally terminates with the surrender of Cornwallis to Washington and the inaugural ceremony of Washington as first President of the United States. Real Americans cannot complain of the manner in which Griffith has visualized the causes of the war. He makes it clear that the tyranny of an alien king precipitated the conflict and that this same king prosecuted it with relentless animosity. On the other hand, Griffith, with great fairness, shows the figure of Pitt defending the rights of the American people before the British Parliament and pleading with his king against the policy of taxation without representation.

Chicago (Ill) American March 28 1924

GRIFFITH FINDS NEW VALENTINO

A second Valentino, a new "great lover" of the screen, is declared to have been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" many of the present-day movie stars. The new luminary is Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the war of American independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston.

LOOK, MY CHILDREN, AND YOU SHALL SEE—The ride of Paul Revere. Here is Paul riding madly to warn Lexington and Concord of the coming of the British—in "America," the romantic history of the revolt of the thirteen colonies filmed by D. W. Griffith.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chronicle-Telegraph 3/28/24

"AMERICA," NEW FILM PLAY, COMING HERE

Samuel Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's film play, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday night, April 17. This romance of the struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the story and has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping

Men who suffer with indigesting have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

Jewish Daily News 3/28/24

אמעריקא אין 44טע סטרים

איין 44טע סטרים אין בראדוויי ווערט איצט יעדען טאג אלס אלס האלב גאר עוויי אין אלס אכט אין אויעבר זעהן פילע מענשען. דאס איילען זיי זיך אין 44טע סטרים טעאטער, וואס נעמינט זיך וועגען פון בראדוויי אויף גריפיטס וואונדערבארע פראדאקשען, "אמעריקא".

Jewish Daily News 3/28/24

אידען פעראינטערעסירט אין "אמעריקא"

דאס אינטערעס לאזער איז גרויס בעקאנט אין דיא איינס פון דיא נעוויסטן צייטונגען אין 44טע סטרים פון דיא טעאטער גריפיטס לעצטע שאנזון "אמעריקא", א בילד, וואס האט אין מהאן פון דער צייט הון אומעטום גאר האט זיך כפרוים פון גאלאנטר.

Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph 3/28/24

Hartford (Conn) Times 3/28/24

Patchogue (NY) Advance 3/28/24

New Haven (Conn) Journal-Courier March 29/24

Motion Picture News NY City 3/29/24

IN recognition of his work in making "America" David Wark Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in the country. The New York members of the Minute Men were on hand at the premiere of the picture to pass on the question of historical accuracy of the production.

After seeing the picture, the organization voted the honorary membership for Mr. Griffith, and the famous bronze button, worn only by descendants of the men who fought on Boston Common, was presented to him.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chron-Tel. 3/28/24

"AMERICA," NEW FILM PLAY, COMING HERE

Samuel Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's film play, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday night, April 17. This romance of the struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the story and has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping the Grumps.

Men who suffer with indigesting have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

NEW SCREEN LOVER FOUND BY PRODUCER

A second and greater new "great lover" of the screen has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present-day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae March, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude. "That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Hoddom in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have only had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton." Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies, through the "extra" ranks. He made his first appearance in Griffith's production of "Hearts of the World" and later included a couple of Paul Revere's rangers and Indian raiders, which, strangely enough, was his first part.

A second and greater Valentino—a "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars. The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success. Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae March, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude. "That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Hoddom in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have only had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton." Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies, through the "extra" ranks. He made his first appearance in Griffith's production of "Hearts of the World" and later included a couple of Paul Revere's rangers and Indian raiders, which, strangely enough, was his first part.

gratefully remembered.

We remember last year that the road was closed for months.

"America," a picture now showing in New York, brings back recollections of our school days' study of Amtrican history. The skirmishes at Lexington, Concord and the Battle of Bunker Hill are fought before your eyes. The ride of Paul Revere brings an unmistakable thrill to young and old. And the tribulations of our beloved Washington at Valley Forge will recall the fiery patriotism that overcame all obstacles and made us free.

All the way to New York many of

DOUG AND MARY SIGN CONTRACTS

New York, March 28.—Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and D. W. Griffith, at stockholders' meeting today agreed to carry out their existing contracts with the United Artists corporation, which distributes their motion pictures, it was announced tonight.

Miss Pickford, Fairbanks and Griffith, it was announced, also signed new three year contracts, Chaplin not doin so because he had eight pictures yet to make on existin contracts.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post March 28 1924

Pitt Theater to Show New Griffith Picture

D. W. Griffith's great production, "America," made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday evening, April 1. This romance of this country's struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the Metropolitan, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story, has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping the Grumps.

Men who suffer with indigesting have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

"AMERICA" TO SHOW HERE

D. W. Griffith's "America," the romance of the war of American independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday evening, April 1. This romance of this country's struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the Metropolitan, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story, has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping the Grumps.

Men who suffer with indigesting have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times 3/28/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 3/28/24

D. W. Griffith's greatest triumph, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater Monday evening, April 1.

Lawrence (Mass) Telegram 3/29/24

D. W. Griffith's greatest production, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater Monday evening, April 1.

Evening Mail March 29 1924

Evening World March 29 1924

America" Is a Great Panorama of Revolutionary Struggle

By CHARLES A. McMAHON

(By N. C. W. C. News Service)

Washington, D. C., March 19.—In his latest production, "America," now showing at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York, D. W. Griffith has given to the American people the greatest picture of his career. "America" is in every way superior to his "Birth of a Nation," "Intolerance," "Orphans of the Storm," and "Way Down East," which is indeed saying it a considerable compliment. The picture carries a secondary title, "The Sacrifice for Freedom," which explains the attempt which the photoplay makes to suggest the great sacrifice made by American patriots in order that America might become a free and independent nation. Other pictures have presented the more dramatic incidents of certain wars, but this is the first time, so far as this writer recalls, that a serious effort has been made to picture a great national movement and at the same time to portray the causes and events in connection therewith.

"America" is divided into two parts representing two distinct periods. The first deals mainly with the dramatic ride of Paul Revere, which furnishes some of the most thrilling episodes which the camera art has yet produced.

The love story running through the photoplay introduces characters of the period preceding the Revolutionary War when the Colonies were beginning to resent the tyrannical rule of England.

At the beginning of the second part, where the scenes shift to the struggle of the Continental Army in New York State, there is a drop in dramatic interest although some stirring scenes take place in carrying both the historical and love romance to a satisfactory conclusion. The struggles of Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the rescue of Fort Sacrifice by Morgan's Raiders, and the defeat of Butler and his Indians enliven the unfolding of the story in the second part, which finally terminates with the surrender of Cornwallis to Washington and the inaugural ceremony of Washington as first President of the United States. Real Americans cannot complain of the manner in which Griffith has visualized the causes of the war. He makes it clear that the tyranny of an alien king precipitated the conflict and that this same king prosecuted it with relentless animosity. On the other hand, Griffith, with great fairness, shows the figure of Pitt defending the rights of the American people before the British Parliament and pleading with his king against the policy of taxation without representation.

CONTINUED ON TWO PAGES

Evening Telegraph March 28 1924

Fall River (Mass) Globe March 28 1924

Philadelphia Press March 28 1924

Italian Interests Aim to Produce

Philadelphia Ledger March 28 1924

Motion Picture News March 29 1924

Griffith Accepts Bankers' Invitation to Rome

D.

My Motion Picture News March 29 1924

Experts Discuss What Public Wants

N. Y. Times Gathers Opinions

WHAT does the public want? This question, perennial in stage and screen history, was given an interesting airing in an article by George MacAdam in last Sunday's Magazine Section of The New York Times. The Times consulted a group of eight experts, and submitted the question to them, with the result that the jury disagreed.

The experts were: David Belasco; D. W. Griffith; George M. Cohan; John Golden; Morris Gest; Harry Lauder; Fannie Hurst and Irving Berlin.

"If I wanted to treat the theatre as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, I could make more than a million a year," declared Mr. Belasco . . . "But if the producer treats the theatre as though it were on a somewhat different plane from the delicatessen shop, then the problem becomes more difficult.

"My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public the best producer can only make a guess. Success is only a matter of conjecture. No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure.

Belasco's Test of a Play

"My test of a play is: Does this strike my fancy? Then came the practical questions: Has it acting possibilities? Does it suit one of my stars, or can I bring together a group of actors that it will suit? Let a play meet these conditions; it may be on any subject, the scene laid in any land, I'll produce it."

An interesting viewpoint is contributed by D. W. Griffith. "No one knows what the public wants, for the public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food — one time he takes fish, another time meat — it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think any one can be specific in answering the question, 'What does the public want?' I think there is a basic desire (if I may use so formal a phrase in giving my very informal thoughts). People want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book or go to the theatre or to the movies.

"It's a workaday world, and few, if any, are able to play the part in it they would like to, or think they would like to. We are all dreamers; if the world doesn't give us our dream, then we want to find it in the world that the book, the stage or the screen gives us. There we want to have pictured for us the romances, the adventures, that life has denied us.

"I think that all normal people have the same dreams, the same ideals. I don't think there is a human being who, dimly, hasn't thought the same things that Shakespeare did. That's why he has his universal appeal. A writer is great in the ratio that with his stronger mind, he makes the average man see what otherwise he sees dimly.

"If you have no formula, Mr. Griffith, if the only thing that guides you is the 'feel' of a story then a man to be a successful producer must be a synthesis of popular emotions?"

"I haven't succeeded yet. When I have, come back and ask me that question again."

George M. Cohan agreed with Mr. Griffith that the "public has a mixed appetite." "The only secret I know about the theatre," he commented, "is that there isn't any secret. It's just plain horse sense. Don't waste the audience's time. Make it say: 'This fellow is a good story teller; he gossips well.' You know how it is in a club, how the crowd will audience's time. Make it say: 'This fellow and then the other fellow comes in, and they say 'Oh, gosh, look who's coming now', and there's a general fade-away. Well, it's just the same with an audience—there's no mystery about it."

Tough on the Re-hash

Asked whether he had noticed any change in the taste of audiences, Mr. Cohan replied: "The present-day audience is tough on the re-hash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything that you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

John Golden gave a crisp answer to the question "What does the public want?" He answered: "To forget their troubles."

"People have plenty of dullness, plenty of problems in their lives," he explained. "They don't want more of the same thing when they go to the theatre. No; what they want is something that will change their mental attitude, something that will give them contentment. . . . . What the American people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for.

"The rooting impulse is elemental; we're all natural-born rooters—we take sides and shout for the side we want to see win. A play ought to make the audience feel that urge; there ought to be some character in it that will make the audience say: 'I want to see that fellow get his.'

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or the screen, ought to begin that its beginning, and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have appreciated that fact. The 'Party'—sometimes a dinner party, more often a dance—is the greatest offender. Occasionally the party adjourns to the swimming pool—that's what makes the movie a 'super picture.' The party is all right if it is an essential cog in the development of the story; but, as a rule, you sit and watch the party for fifteen minutes, your mind trying to figure out just where the thread of the story comes in and then you discover that it doesn't come in at all.

"Contrast those movies with 'The Covered Wagon;' the people in that caravan want to

(Continued on page 1414)

Censorship Bill Before Oklahoma Senate

A BILL providing a state board for censoring motion pictures was introduced in the Oklahoma State Senate, at Oklahoma City, March 5.

The board would be composed of three members to be appointed by the Governor. The chairman would receive $2,100 a year and the other members $1,800. A secretary would be paid $1,500. Members would serve three years with terms overlapping.

"Despite the cynics, the underlying thing that makes for enduring success is wholesomeness. The reason for this was well put by a poet. He said that though our feet are in the mud, our eyes are on the stars. Take the plays and the books that have won enduring popularity, or what we call 'fame'—their drift is wholesome

"There is more contentment in doing right than in doing wrong. That may sound like a phrase from a copybook; but don't blame the copybook; it has been said over and over again, from time immemorial, by men whom the world regards as its greatest. Confucius and Dickens said the same thing. All of which means that humanity recognizes it as a truth.

"And so, when we turn to our ideal world, whether we seek it in a book or on the stage or screen, we find a satisfaction in seeing the decent thing. The book or play that presents something else may have a flash success, but it will never find a place among the books or the plays that humanity refuses to let die.

"To my way of thinking 'Lightnin'' is one of the greatest plays ever written. You laugh and you cry with 'Lightnin'.' He brings your fellow-humans closer to you, makes you feel somehow that the world, after all, isn't such a hard, cold world.

Griffith Gives Views

"No, I have no formula—at least, I've never been conscious of having one. If I read or hear or see something that interests me as a story, it may make a good theme for me. I just have the feel, 'That's a good story.'

"I think that 'Old Bill' is one of the best movies ever made. No love interest in it; no mystery; no suspense; nothing of what is ordinarily called 'plot.' It's just the story of an old cab driver who is arrested for delaying traffic, and who is sentenced to jail, and when he gets there finds that he rather likes it, for he's never before lived in such comfort. Anatole France wrote the story.

"It's just the feel, the touch of it, that I like. You love Old Bill from the beginning a harmless, kindly old fellow.

"Of course," added Mr. Griffith quickly, "the screen version is beautifully done, beautifully acted."

Stockton (Cal) Record 3/29/24 Boston Mass American 3/29/24 Hollywood (Cal) Screen News 3/29/24

Dreamy Griffith Comes Forth With Realistic Film "America"

By MAURICE HENLE
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, March 29.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to the facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horseflesh, tearing along a lonely moonbathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

That midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

David Wark Griffith

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here, and that's that.

As this film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the Middle West in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photograph was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Wednesdays—Saturdays
We Dance the Old
We Dance the New
Come to "Hasse's"
You'll Never Be Blue

REAL HISTORY SHOWN IN 'AMERICA'

Nothing so thrilling as the midnight ride of Paul Revere, now a heart pounding feature of D. W. Griffith's latest film production, America, has been seen in Boston since the chariot race of Ben Hur. The terrific pace of the rider on his sacred errand, jumping walls and ditches that upset or blocked his pursuers, is portrayed with a nerve shooting effect one will long remember.

At the time of this famous ride Paul Revere was in his forties, and lived in North square, Boston, and working at the trade of silversmith. He was strongly against the British ways and laws, and as hardy as a pine tree. Like all boys of his day he was apprenticed to his work in precious metals at an early age, but gave up that job for dentistry before he was well established, and later turned back to his first love as a silversmith. The well-to-do families did not please Revere by their preference for imported luxuries and silver vessels not made at home.

Paul Revere was really an "out from the shoulder" kind of man, bodily vigorous and absolutely without fear. But his greatest fortune was in having one greatest of press agents. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, who wrote the poem immortalizing the ride.

Paul Revere's daring ride covered thirteen miles, and warned Hancock and Adams whom the British wanted to capture above all others.

David W. Griffith is enjoying a brand new shower of unrestrained encomiums. His latest spectacular production, "America," is the cause. New York critics, who have had the first glimpses of this master's attempt to further immortalize the American Revolution, seem quite unanimous in conceding him another triumph extraordinary, and, it is freely predicted he has made a picture which will prove more universally popular, than even his incomparable photodramatic success, "The Birth of a Nation." One very prominent savant among the corps sans critical in old Gotham says he is very sure that ere another year has completely followed the present one, fully ninety per cent of the whole populace of Uncle Sam's proud domain will have viewed this screen version of the early beginnings of this republic. "It is the kind of a picture everybody must and will see if for no other reason than to be reminded of the precepts upon which we have built such a wonderful, happy ship of state," is the way he enthuses. Several other critics venture to call this "the great American picture" while others assure us that for whatever it lacks in entertaining value as fiction, it more than makes up the difference in real, unalloyed historical interest since it gives us some visual insights as to what kind of a man George Washington was in real life just as it presents to our very eyesight John Hancock, Nathan Holden, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Paul Revere and many other celebrities of those stirring times. Although it is likely residents of California and the Pacific coast will have to be patient for some time, it would seem certain that "America" is well worth waiting for. It is fourteen reels of Griffithonia.

Boston (Mass) Traveler 3/29/24

Manchester (N-H) Union 3/29/24

NEIL HAMILTON HAILED AS NEW SCREEN STAR

A new luminary in the film world is Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffiths's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and Minuteman, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Griffith Film at the Majestic

D. W. Griffith's historical romance, "America," now at the Majestic, has been called "a roaring echo of the shot heard round the world." That shot is, of course, a particularly hallowed tradition of New England, for it was here that the bonfire of liberty was started by the aggrieved patriots of 1775. The scheming patriots, led by Samuel Adams and John Hancock; the British raid of which Paul Revere rode to warn the countryside; the embattled farmers making their stand at Lexington and at Concord, and the defeat at Bunker Hill, which was never really acknowledged a defeat—all this has given Boston a prominent place in history books, a place that it also holds in the Griffith film of the revolution.

Griffith has made something more than a mere re-telling of history, however. He has attempted to accentuate the sacrifices that were made by the colonists in order to achieve their ideal of liberty. He has also interwoven a romance which binds Boston and Virginia together as they were bound in that day by a common cause. Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack and Lionel Barrymore are principals in the large cast. Such figures of history as Washington, Patrick Henry, King George III, Thomas Jefferson, Lord North and, of course, Paul Revere, lend the distinction of their presence.

Bible Film

Toledo (O) Blade 3/29/24

BY V. B. MCHAPE

THE DISCOVERY OF A "GREAT LOVER."

D. W. GRIFFITH'S publicity bureau has broadcast a bulletin which is of collected interest to Toledo patrons of stage and screen to be quoted at length, since it concerns a young actor who is well known here through his work with last season's Toledo Theater company.

"A second and greater Valentino—a new 'great lover' of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and 'made' a majority of the present day movie stars.

"The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's 'America,' the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

"Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an 'extra' into a star of the first magnitude.

"'That boy,' exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in 'America,' 'will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton.'"

Camden (N J) Courier 3/29/24 Easton (Pa) Press 3/29/24

My Exhibitors Trade Review March 29 1924

What the Public Wants

IN the New York Times of March 16 is printed the varying views of eight experts in the art of entertaining the public. They were asked to give their versions as to what the public wants.

On the jury in the order named by George MacAdam, the writer of the story, are David Belasco, David W. Griffith, George M. Cohan, John Golden, Morris Gest, Sir Harry Lauder, Fannie Hurst and Irving Berlin.

With the exception of possibly Sir Harry and Mr. Berlin all these have had experience in the motion picture field in one way or another.

Mr. Belasco declares that before a play is submitted to the public the best producer can only make a guess and that success is only a matter of conjecture.

That briefly summarizes practically the views of the others. Mr. Griffith says no one knows what the public likes, that the desire of the public for entertainment is like a man's desire for food, for fish at one time and meat at another—that it's a question of mood.

The producer admits that he leans heavily on what to him is the "feel" of a story, but that he has no hard and fast formula. It is of interest to note that he says "Old Bill" in his view is "one of the best movies ever made."

It is true, he concedes, that it has no love interest, no suspense, nothing of what is ordinarily called plot—three elements which as a rule are believed vital to success.

Mr. Cohan diverges from the majority in that he believes the public expects certain things of certain producers and actors. This, of course, is true on the stage would be true in pictures, and we are inclined in a measure to agree with Mr. Cohan.

Mr. Golden, who has had a string of some of the most remarkable successes the stage has known—"Lightnin'" to name just one—declared first of all that the public wants to forget its troubles. When men and women go to the theatre he says they want to be diverted.

Standing out through the messages from the eight jurymen is one thing—wholesomeness.

For genuine success it will be agreed that that quality must be present in any entertainment.

My Judge 3/29/24

Boston (Mass) Globe 3/29/24

Monte Weekly Mirror March 29 1924

"It isn't the Cost of Clothes that Counts!" says Carol DEMPSTER

It's their appropriate selection and choice for the personality of the individual wearer—Study your own style

An Interview with Ruth Mulroy

MOVIE WEEKLY

Boston Advertiser 3/26/24 · Albany (NY) Times-Union 3/28/24 · Chicago (Ill) News 3/28/24 · Norristown (Pa) Herald Times 3/29/24

LOOK, MY CHILDREN, AND YOU SHALL SEE—The ride of Paul Revere. Here is Paul riding madly to warn Lexington and Concord of the coming of the British—in "America," the romantic history of the revolt of the thirteen colonies filmed by D. W. Griffith.

Behind the Screen.

BY GLADYS HALL.

D. W. Griffith's "America" is one of the most stirring pictures I have ever seen.

Taking, as he does, a series of familiarly named battles, battles we all conned, perhaps with a vague resentment and with little imaginary fervor, from history tomes in the four or fifth grades of grammar school—Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill—and stringing them on the thin thread of a love story, he still manages to make the heart beat faster and the pulses hum throughout.

The ride of Paul Revere and his famous and valiant cry: "To arms! To arms! The British are coming!" The gathering together of the gallant Minute men, the shot that rang 'round the world, the splendid portrayals given by Charles Emmett Mack and Lionel Barrymore, all of these are unforgettable things.

Louis Wolheim's face, as Captain Hare, is another unforgettable thing, but that is, really, another story.

In a brief word on the theater program, Mr. Griffith explains that the picture play is "merely an attempt to suggest in a small way the great sacrifice made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. It is in no sense an attempt to portray the story of the revolutionary war; as that story is too tremendous to be told fully by many picture plays, much less by one."

Perhaps that is so. But whether it was "the story of the revolutionary war," in toto or in part, the house was full of children, boys and girls ranging from 4 to 14, all leaning forward with hushed intent faces, all clapping loudly when the stately, dignified figure of George Washington stepped on to the scene, when Revere made his marvelous midnight ride, when the signals flashed out from the Old North church, when the splendid little body of seventy-seven Americans stood up against the uniformed, 800 Britishers. Those boys and those girls were seeing, for the first time, history living, breathing, moving, vitalized by a touch that was as sensitive as it was authentic, as painstaking as it was fired with passion and pain—the unforgotten passion and pain of the sacrifice our forefathers had made. Never again would the battles of Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill be mere names and dates to them. Never again would George Washington be "the Father of His Country" or the little boy who "never told a lie," but a man of inspiration and idealism and courage upon whose shoulders a mighty trust was laid.

Whatever you, here and there, may think of the picture as a performance, whatever flaws or splendors you may find in it, certainly the ideal back of it, the thought, the work, the research, endeavor that gave it birth is deserving of the heartiest commendation, the most sincere thanks.

Every child who can see "America" should do so. Whether or not they follow the story fully, they cannot fail to come away animated by a love of country, a new and great perception of what has gone before them that will remain with them always, and always to their betterment.

[All rights reserved. The Metropolitan Newspaper Service.]

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 3/28/24

First in Line for Forum Seats

ALTHOUGH tickets have not been placed on sale, Virginia Valli is among the first of the motion picture stars to have expressed a desire for reservations the opening night of the new Forum Theater with D. W. Griffith's latest production, "America." Virginia saw the Griffith picture in New York recently and says it out ranks "The Birth of a Nation."

The management of the new house is taking the necessary precautions against ticket speculators. The Forum, located at Pico and Norton streets, opens about May 1 and is said to be the finest residential theater in California.

MOVIE PRODUCERS AT VALLEY FORGE

D. W. Griffith and John L. E. Pell to Be Guests of Dr. W. Herbert Burk

Dr. and Mrs. W. Herbert Burk will entertain D. W. Griffith and John L. E. Pell at luncheon tomorrow in the Martha Washington Log Cabin at Valley Forge. Mr. Griffith's greatest production "America" will be shown for the first time in this neighborhood in the Chestnut Street Opera House, Philadelphia, on Monday evening.

Mr. Pell who has been associated with Mr. Griffith in this great historic production produced the famous whaling picture, "They that Go Down to the Sea in Ships."

Mr. Griffith is coming to Valley Forge to pay tribute to the men of Washington's army, whom he has represented in his great historical production. He will place a wreath on the Waterman grave, as a tribute to the soldiers of Valley Forge, and will place flowers in front of the statue of Washington. "Valley Forge," in the Washington Memorial Chapel.

Tomorrow morning the service will be the reunion of Dr. Burk's confirmation classes. The afternoon service at 3.15 will be under the auspices of the Colonial Dames of Rhode Island. Dr. Burk will preach at both services.

Denver (Colo) Post March 29 1924

Catholic Bulletin Cleveland (Ohio) 3/28/24 · Chicago (Ill) American March 28 1924

18 Stage and Screen

IN his latest production, "America," D. W. Griffith has given to the American people the greatest picture of his career. The picture carries a secondary title, "The Sacrifice for Freedom," which explains the attempt which the photoplay makes to suggest the great sacrifice made by America's Revolutionary patriots in order that America might become a free and independent nation. Other pictures have presented the more dramatic incidents of certain wars, but this is the first time, so far as this writer recalls, that a serious effort has been made to picture a great national movement and at the same time to portray the causes and events in connection therewith.

"America" is divided into two parts representing two distinct periods. The first deals mainly with the dramatic ride of Paul Revere, which furnishes some of the most thrilling episodes which the camera art has yet produced.

The love story running through the photoplay introduces characters of the period preceding the Revolutionary War when the Colonies were beginning to resent the tyrannical rule of England.

At the beginning of the second part, where the scenes shift to the struggle of the Continental Army in New York State, there is a drop in dramatic interest although some stirring scenes take place in carrying both the historical and love romance to a satisfactory conclusion. The struggles of Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the rescue of Fort Sacrifice by Morgan's Raiders, and the defeat of Butler and his Indians enliven the unfolding of the story in the second part, which finally terminates with the surrender of Cornwallis to Washington and the inaugural ceremony of Washington as first President of the United States. Real Americans cannot complain of the manner in which Griffith has visualized the causes of the war. He makes it clear that the tyranny of an alien king precipitated the conflict and that this same king prosecuted it with relentless animosity. On the other hand, Griffith, with great fairness, shows the figure of Pitt defending the rights of the American people before the British Parliament and pleading with his king against the policy of taxation without representation.

GRIFFITH FINDS NEW VALENTINO

A second Valentino, a new "great lover" of the screen, is declared to have been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" many of the present-day movie stars. The new luminary is Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the war of American independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chronicle-Telegraph 3/28/24

"AMERICA," NEW FILM PLAY, COMING HERE

Samuel Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's film play, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday night, April 17. This romance of the struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the story and has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping the Grumps.

Men who suffer with indigestion have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

Jewish Daily News 3/28/24 · Jewish Daily News 3/28/24

אמעריקא אין 44טע סטריט

אויף 44טע סטריט אין בראדוויי זיעט איזאך יעדען טאג אלס אלס האלב טאף צוויי און אלס אכט אין אויגנער זעקן פילא מענשען. דאס איילאן זיי זיך אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער, וואס נעמינט זיך וועגן פון בראדוויי אויף גריפיטס וואונדערבארע פראדאקשאן, "אמע־ריקא".

אידען פעראינטערעסירט אין "אמעריקא"

דאס אונגעזעלשאפט איז טיף בעקאנט אין קרייז פון דיים א לעגענדארע צייט נעווארען אין 44טע סטריט מיט דאס אנהייבן פון דאס "אמעריקא", א בילד, וואס דאס איז מיטאן פון דער צייט ווען אמעריקא האט זיך באפרייט פון ענגלאנד.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chron-Tel. 3/28/24 · Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph 3/28/24 · Hartford (Conn) Times 3/28/24 · Patchogue (NY) Advance 3/28/24 · New Haven (Conn) Journal-Courier March 29/24 · Motion Picture News NY City 3/29/24

"AMERICA," NEW FILM PLAY, COMING HERE

Samuel Blair arrived in Pittsburgh today to herald the coming of D. W. Griffith's film play, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

"America" will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday night, April 17. This romance of the struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the story and has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Grouping the Grumps.

Men who suffer with indigestion have a club of their own in New York. This will be good news for the others.—Punch.

NEW SCREEN LOVER FOUND BY PRODUCER

A second and greater new "great lover" of the screen has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present-day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae March, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America" he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and Minute man, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's rangers, and leads the charge which saved Washington's army at Fort Sacrifice.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times 3/28/24 · Pittsburgh (Pa) Post March 28 1924

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars. The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success. Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae March, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude. "That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Hale in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton." Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America" he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and Minuteman, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's rangers, and leads the charge which saved Washington's army at Fort Sacrifice.

Pitt Theater to Show New Griffith Picture

D. W. Griffith's great production, "America," made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday evening, April 1. This romance of this country's struggle for freedom was made with the aid of the leading patriotic and historical organizations, as well as with the assistance of the War Department of the Government, which loaned large detachments of regular soldiers for use as "extras" in the big battle scenes.

Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story, has woven a beautiful love story in the background of authentic history.

Frank Dumont, who plays the role of Nathan Hamilton, the hero of the story, Neil Hamilton, Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim and many other famous theatrical, who will be seen in scenes in around the production.

"AMERICA" TO SHOW HERE

D. W. Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater on Monday evening, April 1. The film made with the aid of historical and patriotic organizations and the War Department, depicts the romance of the Revolutionary War.

A thrilling love story on the background of patriotic history has been contributed to the plot of the film by Robert W. Chambers. Frank Dumont has the role of the hero. Supporting him are Neil Hamilton, Charles Mack, Louis Wolheim and many other famous theatrical, who will be seen in scenes in around the production.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 3/28/24 · Lawrence (Mass) Telegram 3/29/24

D. W. Griffith's greatest triumph, "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, made for the sesquicentennial celebration of the Daughters of the American Revolution, will have its local premiere at the Pitt Theater Monday evening, April 1.

UNITED ARTISTS WILL CONTINUE

New York, March 29.—Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and D. W. Griffith at a stockholders' meeting Friday agreed to carry out their existing contracts with the United Artists corporation, which distributes their motion pictures, it was announced Friday night.

Miss Pickford, Fairbanks and Griffith, it was announced, also signed new three-year contracts, Chaplin not doing so because he had eight pictures yet to make on existing contracts. All officers of the corporation were re-elected.

DOUG AND MARY SIGN CONTRACTS

New York, March 28.—Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and D. W. Griffith, at stockholders' meeting today agreed to carry out their existing contracts with the United Artists corporation, which distributes their motion pictures, it was announced tonight.

Miss Pickford, Fairbanks and Griffith, it was announced, also signed new three year contracts, Chaplin not doing so because he had eight pictures yet to make on existing contracts.

We remember last year that the road was closed for months.

"America," a picture now showing in New York, brings back recollections of our school days' study of American history. The skirmishes at Lexington, Concord and the Battle of Bunker Hill are fought before your eyes. The ride of Paul Revere brings an unmistakable thrill to young and old. And the tribulations of our beloved Washington at Valley Forge will recall the fiery patriotism that overcame all obstacles and made us free.

All the way to New York many of

IN recognition of his work in making "America" David Wark Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in the country. The New York members of the Minute Men were on hand at the premiere of the picture to pass on the general historical accuracy of the production.

After seeing the picture, the organization voted the honorary membership for Mr. Griffith, and the famous bronze button, worn only by descendants of the men who fought on Boston Common, was presented to him.

THE CATHOLIC NEWS, MARCH 29, 1924

America" Is a Great Panorama of Revolutionary Struggle

By CHARLES A. McMAHON

(By N. C. W. C. News Service)

Washington, D. C., March 19.—In his latest production, "America," now showing at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, New York, D. W. Griffith has given to the American people the greatest picture of his career. "America" is in every way superior to his "Birth of a Nation," "Intolerance," "Orphans of the Storm," and "Way Down East," which is indeed paying it a considerable compliment. The picture carries a secondary title, "The Sacrifice for Freedom," which explains the attempt which the photoplay makes to suggest the great sacrifice made by America's Revolutionary patriots in order that America might become a free and independent nation. Other pictures have presented the more dramatic incidents of certain wars, but this is the first time, so far as this writer recalls, that a serious effort has been made to picture a great national movement and at the same time to portray the causes and events in connection therewith.

"America" is divided into two parts representing two distinct periods. The first deals mainly with the dramatic ride of Paul Revere, which furnishes some of the most thrilling episodes which the camera art has yet produced.

The love story running through the photoplay introduces characters of the period preceding the Revolutionary War when the Colonies were beginning to resent the tyrannical rule of England.

At the beginning of the second part, where the scenes shift to the struggle of the Continental Army in New York State, there is a drop in dramatic interest although some stirring scenes take place in carrying both the historical and love romance to a satisfactory conclusion. The struggles of Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the rescue of Fort Sacrifice by Morgan's Raiders, and the defeat of Butler and his Indians enliven the unfolding of the story in the second part, which finally terminates with the surrender of Cornwallis to Washington and the inaugural ceremony of Washington as first President of the United States. Real Americans cannot complain of the manner in which Griffith has visualized the causes of the war. He makes it clear that the tyranny of an alien king precipitated the conflict and that this same king prosecuted it with relentless animosity. On the other hand, Griffith, with great fairness, shows the figure of Pitt defending the rights of the American people before the British Parliament and pleading with his king against the policy of taxation without representation.

Evening Telegram March 29 1924 · Evening World March 29 1924

Italian Interests Aim to Produce

Fall River (Mass) Globe March 28 1924

Chicago Herald March 28 1924 · Motion Picture News March 29 1924

Griffith Accepts Bankers' Invitation to Rome

my Motion Picture News March 29 1924

Experts Discuss What Public Wants

N. Y. Times Gathers Opinions

WHAT does the public want? This question, perennial in stage and screen history, was given an interesting airing in an article by George MacAdam in last Sunday's Magazine Section of The New York Times. The Times consulted a group of eight experts, and submitted the question to them, with the result that the jury disagreed.

The experts were: David Belasco; D. W. Griffith; George M. Cohan; John Golden; Morris Gest; Harry Lauder; Fannie Hurst and Irving Berlin.

"If I wanted to treat the theatre as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, I could make more than a million a year," declared Mr. Belasco . . . "But if the producer treats the theatre as though it were on a somewhat different plane from the delicatessen shop, then the problem becomes more difficult.

"My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public the best producer can only make a guess. Success is only a matter of conjecture. No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure.

Belasco's Test of a Play

"My test of a play is: Does this strike my fancy? Then came the practical questions: Has it acting possibilities? Does it suit one of my stars, or can I bring together a group of actors that it will suit? Let a play meet these conditions; it may be on any subject, the scene laid in any land, I'll produce it."

An interesting viewpoint is contributed by D. W. Griffith. "No one knows what the public wants, for the public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food — one time he takes fish, another time meat — it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think any one can be specific in answering the question, 'What does the public want?' I think there is a basic desire (if I may use so formal a phrase in giving my very informal thoughts). People want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book or go to the theatre or to the movies.

"It's a workaday world, and few, if any, are able to play the part in it they would like to, or think they would like to. We are all dreamers; if the world doesn't give us our dream, then we want to find it in the world that the book, the stage or the screen gives us. There we want to have pictured for us the romances, the adventures, that life has denied us.

"I think that all normal people have the same dreams, the same ideals. I don't think there is a human being who, dimly, hasn't thought the same things that Shakespeare did. That's why he has his universal appeal. A writer is great in the ratio that with his stronger mind, he makes the average man see what otherwise he sees dimly.

"If you have no formula, Mr. Griffith, if the only thing that guides you is the 'feel' of a story then a man to be a successful producer must be a synthesis of popular emotions?"

"I haven't succeeded yet. When I have, come back and ask me that question again."

George M. Cohan agreed with Mr. Griffith that the "public has a mixed appetite." "The only secret I know about the theatre," he commented, "is that there isn't any secret. It's just plain horse sense. Don't waste the audience's time. Make it say: 'This fellow is a good story teller; he gossips well.' You know how it is in a club, how the crowd will audience's time. Make it say: 'This fellow and then the other fellow comes in, and they say 'Oh, gosh, look who's coming now', and there's a general fade-away. Well, it's just the same with an audience—there's no mystery about it."

Tough on the Re-hash

Asked whether he had noticed any change in the taste of audiences, Mr. Cohan replied: "The present-day audience is tough on the re-hash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything that you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

John Golden gave a crisp answer to the question "What does the public want?" He answered: "To forget their troubles."

"People have plenty of dullness, plenty of problems in their lives," he explained. "They don't want more of the same thing when they go to the theatre. No; what they want is something that will change their mental attitude, something that will give them contentment. . . . . What the American people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for.

"The rooting impulse is elemental; we're all natural-born rooters—we take sides and shout for the side we want to see win. A play ought to make the audience feel that urge; there ought to be some character in it that will make the audience say: 'I want to see that fellow get his.'

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or the screen, ought to begin that its beginning, and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have appreciated that fact. The 'Party'—sometimes a dinner party, more often a dance—is the greatest offender. Occasionally the party adjourns to the swimming pool—that's what makes the movie a 'super picture.' The party is all right if it is an essential cog in the development of the story; but, as a rule, you sit and watch the party for fifteen minutes, your mind trying to figure out just where the thread of the story comes in and then you discover that it doesn't come in at all.

"Contrast those movies with 'The Covered Wagon;' the people in that caravan want to

(Continued on page 1414)

Censorship Bill Before Oklahoma Senate

A BILL providing a state board for censoring motion pictures was introduced in the Oklahoma State Senate, at Oklahoma City, March 5.

The board would be composed of three members to be appointed by the Governor. The chairman would receive $2,100 a year and the other members $1,800. A secretary would be paid $1,500. Members would serve three years with terms overlapping.

Stockton (Cal) Record 3/29/24

Dreamy Griffith Comes Forth With Realistic Film "America"

By MAURICE HERLE
NEA Service Writer

NEW YORK, March 29.—D. W. Griffith brought his long awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction, of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about that dreamy, whimsical, will-o'-the-wisp director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to the facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the Twentieth century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North Church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene. No band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horseflesh, tearing along a lonely moonbathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the real Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. has accurately reproduced those events.

David Wark Griffith

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's gone and Carol's here, and that's that.

As this film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Captain Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the Middle West in terror. Undoubtedly there will be generous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photograph was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of hazy vignette about the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

Wednesdays—Saturdays

We Dance the Old
We Dance the New
Come to "Hasse's"
You'll Never Be Blue

Boston (Mass) American 3/29/24

REAL HISTORY SHOWN IN 'AMERICA'

Nothing so thrilling as the midnight ride of Paul Revere, now a heart pounding feature of D. W. Griffith's latest film production, America, has been seen in Boston since the chariot race of Ben Hur. The terrific pace of the rider on his sacred errand, jumping walls and ditches that upset or blocked his pursuers, is portrayed with a nerve shooting effect one will long remember.

At the time of this famous ride Paul Revere was in his forties, and lived in North square, Boston, and working at the trade of silversmith. He was strongly against the British ways and laws, and as hardy as a pine tree. Like all boys of his day he was apprenticed to his work in precious metals at an early age, but gave up that job for dentistry before he was well established, and later turned back to his first love as a silversmith. The well-to-do families did not please Revere by their preference for imported luxuries and silver vessels not made at home.

Paul Revere was really an "out from the shoulder" kind of man, bodily vigorous and absolutely without fear. But his greatest fortune was in having one greatest of press agents, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, who wrote the poem immortalizing the ride.

Paul Revere's daring ride covered thirteen miles, and warned Hancock and Adams whom the British wanted to capture above all others.

Hallywood (Cal) Screen News 3/29/24

David W. Griffith is enjoying a brand new shower of unrestrained encomiums. His latest spectacular production, "America," is the cause. New York critics, who have had the first glimpses of this master's attempt to further immortalize the American Revolution, seem quite unanimous in conceding him another triumph extraordinary, and, it is freely predicted he has made a picture which will prove more universally popular, than even his incomparable photodramatic success, "The Birth of a Nation." One very prominent savant among the corps sans critical in old Gotham says he is very sure that ere another year has completely followed the present one, fully nine per cent of the whole populace of Uncle Sam's proud domain will have viewed this screen version of the early beginnings of this republic. "It is the kind of a picture everybody must and will see if for no other reason than to be reminded of the precepts upon which we have built such a wonderful, happy ship of state," is the way he enthuses. Several other critics venture to call this "the great American picture" while others assure us that for whatever it lacks in entertaining value as fiction, it more than makes up the difference in real, unalloyed historical interest since it gives us some visual insights as to what kind of a man George Washington was in real life just as it presents to our very eyesight John Hancock, Nathan Holden, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Paul Revere and many other celebrities of those stirring times. Although it is likely residents of California and the Pacific coast will have to be patient for some time, it would seem certain that "America" is well worth waiting for. It is fourteen reels of Griffithonia story.

Boston (Mass) Traveler 3/29/24

Manchester (N-H) Union 3/29/24

NEIL HAMILTON HAILED AS NEW SCREEN STAR

A new luminary in the film world is Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffiths's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Although Griffith discovered and made Bartholmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and Minuteman, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Griffith Film at the Majestic

D. W. Griffith's historical romance, "America," now at the Majestic, has been called "a clearing echo of the shot heard round the world." That shot is, of course, a particularly hallowed tradition of New England, for it was here that the bonfire of liberty was started by the aggrieved patriots of 1776. The scheming patriots, led by Samuel Adams and John Hancock; the British raid of which Paul Revere rode to warn the countryside; the embattled farmers making their stand at Lexington and at Concord, and the defeat at Bunker Hill, which was never really acknowledged a defeat—all this has given Boston a prominent place in history books, a place that it also holds in the Griffith film of the revolution.

Griffith has made something more than a mere re-telling of history, however. He has attempted to accentuate the sacrifices that were made by the colonists in order to achieve their ideal of liberty. He has also interwoven a romance which binds Boston and Virginia together as they were bound in that day by a common cause. Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack and Lionel Barrymore are principals in the large cast. Such figures of history as Washington, Patrick Henry, King George III, Thomas Jefferson, Lord North and, of course, Paul Revere, lend the distinction of their presence.

Bible Film

my Exhibitors Trade Review March 29 1924

What the Public Wants

IN the New York Times of March 16 is printed the varying views of eight experts in the art of entertaining the public. They were asked to give their versions as to what the public wants.

On the jury in the order named by George MacAdam, the writer of the story, are David Belasco, David W. Griffith, George M. Cohan, John Golden, Morris Gest, Sir Harry Lauder, Fannie Hurst and Irving Berlin.

With the exception of possibly Sir Harry and Mr. Berlin all these have had experience in the motion picture field in one way or another.

Mr. Belasco declares that before a play is submitted to the public the best producer can only make a guess and that success is only a matter of conjecture.

That briefly summarizes practically the views of the others. Mr. Griffith says no one knows what the public likes, that the desire of the public for entertainment is like a man's desire for food, for fish at one time and meat at another—that it's a question of mood.

The producer admits that he leans heavily on what to him is the "feel" of a story, but that he has no hard and fast formula. It is of interest to note that he says "Old Bill" in his view is "one of the best movies ever made."

It is true, he concedes, that it has no love interest, no suspense, nothing of what is ordinarily called plot—three elements which as a rule are believed vital to success.

Mr. Cohan diverges from the majority in that he believes the public expects certain things of certain producers and actors. This, of course, is true on the stage would be true in pictures, and we are inclined in a measure to agree with Mr. Cohan.

Mr. Golden, who has had a string of some of the most remarkable successes the stage has known—"Lightnin'," to name just one—declared first of all that the public wants to forget its troubles. When men and women go to the theatre, he says, they go out to be diverted.

Standing out through the messages from the eight jurymen is one thing—wholesomeness.

For genuine success it will be agreed that that quality must be present in any entertainment.

my Judge 3/29/24

Toledo (O) Blade 3/29/24

—BY K. B. MCCHARLES—

THE DISCOVERY OF A "GREAT LOVER."

D. W. GRIFFITH's publicity bureau has broadcast a bulletin which is of sufficient interest to Toledo patrons of stage and screen to be quoted at length, since it concerns a young actor who is well known here through his work with last season's Toledo Theater company.

"A second and greater Valentino—a new 'great lover' of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and 'made' a majority of the present day movie stars.

"The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's 'America,' the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

"Although Griffith discovered and made Bartholmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an 'extra' into a star of the first magnitude.

"'That boy,' exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in 'America,' 'will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton.'"

Camden (N J) Courier 3/29/24

Easton (Pa) Press 3/29/24

Monte Weekly Mirror March 29 1924

"It isn't the Cost of Clothes that Counts!" says Carol DEMPSTER

It's their appropriate selection and choice for the personality of the individual wearer—Study your own style

An Interview with Ruth Mahoney

Boston (Mass) Globe 3/29/24

Boston Telegram 3/29/24 / Boston Traveler 3/29/24 / Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger 3/30/24

Carol Dempster in D.W. Griffith's "America" Majestic

Neil Hamilton in "America" Majestic

Scene in "AMERICA" CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE

Butte (Mont) Miner 3/30/24

Jewish Day 3/29/24

Exhibitors Herald Chicago 3/29/24

Greater Amusements Minneapolis (Minn) 3/29/24

Lawrence (Mass) Telegram 3/29/24

Miss Carol Dempster as the Heroine in D. W. Griffith's "America"

Atlanta (Ga) Constitution 3/30/24

GRIFFITH TO MAKE ITALIAN PICTURE

די אדש אין די כיער פון דער אמעריקאנער רעפובליק

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

Griffith to Make Series of Pictures in Italy

New York.—D. W. Griffith has accepted the invitation of a syndicate of Italian bankers, to make a series of pictures in Italy. The move, it is said, is an effort to stimulate domestic picture making in Italy, through demonstration of the possibilities, through a film made by Griffith.

Warren A. Newcombe, art director for D. W. Griffith's "America," has been engaged by Mr. Griffith for art director of the Griffith productions for the ensuing year. Mr. Newcombe has produced two of his own pictures, "Sea of Dreams" and "City of Enchantment," which were notable for their artistry. Mr. Newcombe is to join Mr. Griffith in Italy.

Philadelphia Inquirer 3/30/24

Film Fun 3/29/24

Brockton (Mass) Enterprise 3/29/24

Atlanta (Ga) 3/29/24

Weekly Film Review

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

Mid American March 30 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 3/29/24

Cincinnati Post

Cincinnati Times Star

Cincinnati Post

Cincinnati Times Star

Cincinnati Post

Cincinnati Times Star

Philadelphia (Pa) Record March 30 1924

Tory's Deeds Were Cruel in Every Way

Despicable Villainy Shown to Be a Characteristic of Influential Officer in Revolutionary War.

WHO was the greatest villain of the War of American Independence? Contrary to general belief, it was not Benedict Arnold, the traitor, but Walter Butler, the Tory. Such was the conclusion of the staff of research experts which delved into Revolutionary history, into historical data, and even into private diaries of the period to get authentic facts for "America." The picture comes this week to the Chestnut Street Opera House.

Traitor to his country though he was, Benedict Arnold had, previous to his act of treachery, fought bravely. History shows him to have been a man meek but tender, a man who could fight fairly, a man endowed with a goodly stock of what is known as "humanity."

But none of the saving graces vouchsafed by history to Arnold was conferred on Butler. Indeed, one historian eyewitness to some of the horrors perpetrated by Butler declares categorically that Butler was a man "without a single redeeming trait."

Yet somehow, Butler has managed to escape the odium of his ruthless career, and the patriotically minded declare that Griffith's "America," in which the acts of the influence of Butler are vividly portrayed, will go far towards bringing about more friendly relations between this country and Great Britain through a better understanding of how Butler and men of his ilk and not the great mass of the Tories first brought about and later waged the American Revolution.

It was Butler who advised the British to secure Indians as allies, and who, in order to accomplish this, when the peaceably inclined redskins declined to go on the warpath against the settlers, goaded them into it by massacring whole families of Indians and blaming the deed on the Americans. It was Butler who gave the order to his Indian allies to spare neither women nor children; who staged wild orgies in order to awaken a thirst for liquor and vice among his savage followers, as well as to satisfy his own consuming passions. It was Butler who led the frightful raid on Cherry Valley, slaying noncombatants, white men, redmen, women and children without mercy. It was he who, when he commanded one of the Indians to do a foul deed, himself murdered his friend and ally with a tomahawk.

His acts were the acts of an insane man, his whole career that of a megalomaniac or a paranoiac. Had he lived at the present day he probably would be an inmate of an asylum—had his private life been as it was. Yet his influ-cils managed to prevail with King George III, the mad monarch who refused to listen to his more prudent councilors.

LIONEL BARRYMORE as Captain Butler

Records show that Butler was equally insensible to the courage of enemies and the sufferings of friends. He and his band of savages took no prisoners; gave no quarter. On such few occasions as he did spare the life of an enemy, it was but to save the latter up for cruel tortures at the stake. According to contemporary historians, Butler delighted in witnessing the torture of the helpless.

Songs of the period, and poetry, too, tell the pitiful plight of Butler's closest friends and allies—the one finding their daughters ruined, the other their wives and mothers slain. And nowhere in history, not even in the records of the English officers, can be found a word in extenuation of Butler's terrible acts. Indeed, on the contrary, it is made plain that the English officers have neither friendship for him, nor anything but shame for his deeds. On every possible occasion he violated the Briton's inborn respect for fair play.

Like many other persons with deranged minds, Butler imagined himself immune from retribution and death. Tracked through the woods by some of the very redskins he had helped to turn against the white men and their defenseless homes, he, lingered behind his bodyguard of savages to hurl obscene defiances at his pursuers. He could not forego his opportunity to play the braggart. He was shot through the eye, and then tomahawked, leaving, according to contemporary historians, a score of gallows cheated of legitimate prey [illegible] ing birth to a country [illegible] mous sigh of [illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) North American March 30 1924

'AMERICA' TO OPEN SHOWING TOMORROW

Big Griffith Picture in for Run at Chestnut St. Opera House

NOTABLE CAST

"America," the latest picture made by David Wark Griffith, will have its first showing in this city at the Chestnut beginning tomorrow evening. The peformance will have all the accessories of "effects" and of music and there will be present an audience that will include a number of officers of patriotic organizations, educators and descendants of Americans of the revolutionary period. Griffith himself will be present and there will be with him several members of the cast of the picture, including Carol Dempster, leading woman; Neil Hamilton, who has the leading male role, and Charles Emmett Mack. Hamilton is the latest Griffith "find."

The making of "America" was at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, but altho the background is a vivid representation of crucial scenes of the revolutionary war, the picture in its essentials is a love story of unusual power. The story and titles were prepared by the novelist, Robert W. Chambers, who has high reputation as a student of American history. John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships," made the historical arrangement. Music for the picture was composed and arranged by Joseph Carl Breil.

Griffith has declared that the picture is merely an attempt to suggest the great sacrifices made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. With that idea in mind there was a re-enactment of outstanding events at the time of the revolution. One of the stirring presentations is that of the ride of Paul Revere—over the actual ground traversed by that fine patriot.

Other principals include Lionel Barrymore, Arthur Dewey, who is seen as General Washington; Lucille La Verne, Riley Hatch, Milton Noble, Frank McGlynn, Jr., John Dunton, Arthur Donaldson, Charles Bennett and others are in the personnel. Each player was chosen for his close resemblance to the historical character to be depicted. In the battle scenes regular army soldiers, including the famous Third Cavalry, and many descendants of Revolutionary families appear. Indeed the "extras" were as carefully chosen as were the principals in the cast.

NOT ANTI-BRITISH.

Dramatic Editor Toronto World.

Dear Sir—We have seen an article from your paper of March 9th, with a story, headed "England Attacked by D. W. Griffith."

This story is so utterly foreign to the purpose of our film, and it has been so admitted by Mr. Sherwood, who wrote the article, that we regret keenly you should have given it the attention and space and comment you did.

In not one scene in "America" is an Englishman portrayed as a villain or shown indulging in brutality, ferocity, or unfair warfare.

All the scenes presenting the British military show a courageous army going about its business in a thoroughly disciplined and restrained manner.

Our film was intended to show the sacrifices the Colonials made to establish independence. It happened, although not so well known in history, that the greatest sacrifices were made by the settlers in the interior, who were subject to the raids of the Indians and renegade bands.

The reason this feature was shown is that the grain supply from these valleys was of absolute vital importance to Washington's armies, and that it was the purpose of these raiders to destroy this grain supply, starve the army and cause the collapse of resistance, which all military authorities agree would have occurred. In military reality, this warfare was the most important of any during the Revolutionary period.

The instigator and leader of these raids is an American, Walter Butler, an historical character, born and raised in New York State.

We have carefully identified this man in our film, so there would be no confusion, and certainly no direct effort to possibly identify him as an Englishman.

We never object to anyone criticising our films, as no human being has yet ever done a perfect piece of work. All life is full of flaws and we expect no exemption in our product, but it is discouraging to have the purpose of a work, which is clearly understood by the majority of persons, interpreted by one reviewer as being wanting in dignity and fairness.

Sherwood should know that had Mr. Griffith desired to incite national prejudice and portray the English troops as the villains, he could have created a story that would have curled them up on their seats and created very sensational consequences.

Every scene shown in our film is historically correct, every incident shown actually happened, and through it all Mr. Griffith has carefully refrained from arousing any antagonism toward the British people.

Consequently, it is very unfortunate that such impressions as you quote should be widely circulated to sow, in advance, prejudice and create nationalist feeling.

Sincerely yours,
GERRIT J. LLOYD,
for D. W. Griffith,
New York City.

Philadelphia Record March 30 24

Griffith's Newest Picture Has Revolution Background

"America," a Romance With Notable Cast, Will Be Shown on the Screen at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

"AMERICA," said to be the greatest picture yet made by that genius of the screen, David Wark Griffith, will have first showing in this city at the Chestnut Street Opera House beginning tomorrow evening. The performance will have all the accessories of "effects" and of music for which productions bearing the Griffith label are famed, and there will be present a distinguished audience that will include a number of officers of patriotic organizations, educators and descendants of Americans of the Revolutionary period. Griffith himself will be present and there will be with him several members of the cast of the picture, including Carol Dempster, leading woman; Neil Hamilton, who has the leading male role, and Charles Emmett Mack. Hamilton is the latest Griffith "find." Miss Dempster, who is also a player developed by Griffith, has the most important role of her career.

The making of "America" was at request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, but although the background is a vivid representation of crucial scenes of the Revolutionary war, the picture in its essentials is a love story of unusual power. The story and titles were prepared by the novelist, Robert W. Chambers, who has high reputation as a student of American history. John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships," made the historical arrangement. Music for the picture was composed and arranged by Joseph Carl Breil.

Griffith has declared that the picture is merely an attempt to suggest the great sacrifices made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. With that idea in mind there was a re-enactment of outstanding events at the time of the Revolution. One of the stirring presentations is that of the ride of Paul Revere—over the actual ground traversed by that fine patriot. That ride is said to give the greatest thrill ever experienced by onlookers at a picture presentation. Intrepid patriots are seen opposing the British at Lexington, and Concord's battle is realistically reproduced. Then there is the Battle of Bunker Hill—a real triumph in detail of presentation. At Valley Forge, Washington and his tattered and bleeding soldiers command pity. Then later there are Indian raids upon defenseless settlers at the outposts of civilization and the glorious conclusion comes soon after the visualization of the surrender of Cornwallis. In the course of the tale there is also the presentation of the scene of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, and this will particularly appeal to Philadelphians.

Thirty-six principals are in the cast and there is not an indifferent or inefficient player in the lot. Miss Dempster, Neil Hamilton, who is expected to become a second and greater Valentino; Lionel Barrymore, Charles Emmett Mack, Arthur Dewey, who is seen as General Washington; Lucille La Verne, Riley Hatch, Milton Noble, Frank McGlynn, Jr., John Dunton, Arthur Donaldson, Charles Bennett and others are in the personnel. Each player was chosen for his close resemblance to the historical character to be depicted. In the battle scenes regular army soldiers, including the famous Third Cavalry, and many descendants of Revolutionary families appear. Indeed the "extras" were as carefully chosen as were the principals in the cast.

Philadelphia North American 3/30/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE AND CAROL DEMPSTER IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" AT CHESTNUT STREET

Davenport (Ia) Dem-Orter 3/30/24

My Telegram March 30 1924

PHILADELPHIA SEES "AMERICA" MONDAY

Griffith Feature to Begin Run at Chestnut Street Opera House To-morrow Evening.

BIG CEREMONIES PLANNED

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

PHILADELPHIA, March 29.

The premiere showing in this city on Monday evening at the Chestnut Street Opera House of D. W. Griffith's newest screen production, "America," will be of unusual interest because of notables in the audience and the personal appearance of Carol Dempster, who enacted the leading role in the production; Neil Hamilton, leading man, and Charles Emmett Mack, also a member of the cast. In addition to these stars there will be Griffith himself, A. L. Grey, president of the Griffith corporation; James M. Ashcraft, personal representative of Mr. Griffith, and Patrick W. Campbell, business manager. The party will arrive here about noon to-morrow and it is expected that they will be met at the train by the First City Troop under the command of Capt. Clement B. Wood, after which the party will be escorted by the troop to historic Valley Forge, scenes of which are shown in the picture. In the evening Miss Dempster, Griffith and Hamilton will speak over the radio from station WIP, Gimbel Brothers, arrangements having been made for the allotment of thirty minutes to them.

As in other Griffith presentations, "America" will be shown here, with every available advantage that can be given the screening of a big production. A specially augmented orchestra of twenty-five men, under the leadership of Adolph Fink, will render the specially written score. The musical score was arranged by Cesare Sodero, assisted by Joseph Brill, who arranged the music for presentation of the "Birth of a Nation."

Fred R. Zweifel, formerly connected with Ed Wynn's show, and at various times with Griffith productions, will be manager of the local [illegible]

At the Other Houses.

Boston Herald 3/30/24

Dallas (Tex) News 3/30/24

Lexington (Ky) Leader 3/30/24

Graham (NC) News March 30 1924

TEXAS GIRL TAKES PART IN "AMERICA"

LONE STAR STATE REPRESENTED IN GRIFFITH HISTORICAL FILM.

Mrs. Norman R. Greathouse, formerly Tottye Price of this city, was chosen to represent Texas in "America," the colonial photodrama of the War of American Independence, filmed by David Wark Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution and now showing in New York.

Mrs. Greathouse was selected by Mr. Griffith and by Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the leading role in the film, to portray the role of Mrs. Gage, wife of General Gage, the British commander in chief at Boston during the revolution. Her remarkable facial resemblance to the person of the social personage she had been cited by Miss Dempster, her close personal friend, long before the filming of "America" was projected.

In making "America," Griffith has chosen his actors and actresses primarily for their physical resemblance to the famous historical personages who appear in the film. He had learned somewhat of Mrs. Greathouse's resemblance to Mrs. Gage while she was a student at Miss Dempster's school in Tarrytown, N. Y., and when she was at once signed for the part.

[illegible]

'MUSIC IS GREAT AID TO PICTURE

Photoplays Benefited by Musical Scores Played in Synchrony—Lighting Effects Also Have Effect

FILMS MADE IMPRESSIVE

By ELDRID FERRER

Many of the largest motion picture productions such as "The Birth of a Nation," "The Covered Wagon," "Scaramouche," "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," and "Robin Hood," have become famous not entirely on account of the merits of the pictures themselves, but because of favorable presentations, by which, incidentally a large number of the cheaper films have been lifted from mediocrity.

Appropriate music and lighting effects play an important part in promoting any photoplay, as these elements have a definite psychological effect upon the mind of the spectator. Music is so closely allied to the art of color that the perfect presentation includes the blending of both.

It [illegible] was probably the Rialto [illegible] one of the idea of accompanying a picture with music and [illegible] of such music. They [illegible] quarter of a million dollars [illegible] Music is so much an integral part of the production [illegible] the popularity through a [illegible] appropriate and [illegible] It is said [illegible] a [illegible] Rialto [illegible] Music is now making [illegible] Rialto. This was done so that the [illegible] of the place [illegible] the leaders of a [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] Music [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Philadelphia Inquirer March 30 1924 | Philadelphia Pa Public Ledger 3/30/24 | My World 3/30/24 | Topeka (Kansas) Capital 3/30/24 | San Francisco (Cal) Call-Post 3/30/24 | Philadelphia (Pa) Eve. Public Ledger 3/31/24

Realism Runs Riot in Griffith's Latest

When D. W. Griffith undertook to stage the Robert W. Chambers story of romance, that because of historical background is called "America," students of history in all parts of the country volunteered to supply data that would be of value. Special representatives of the motion picture director got into conference with such notables as E. B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society; G. Watson James, Jr., national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; Charles K. Bolton, president of the Boston Athenaeum; Secretary of War Weeks, Brigadier General Sir Percy Sykes, Dr. J. A. C. Chandler, president of the College of William and Mary; Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, professor at that institution; W. Jordan, curator of Independence Hall in this city, and Rev. W. Herbert Burk, D. D., of the Valley Forge Historical Society. Each had something to contribute, and it is asserted that as a result of their aid the production is really an accurate representation of important events in the Revolutionary War. At the same time, as will be observed by those who see "America" at the Chestnut Street Opera House, there will be as the important part of the picture the romance on which Griffith spent some of his best efforts.

In order that there should be correctness of detail, the villages of Lexington and Concord seen in the picture were designed from Doolittle drawings and were then made according to scale in ideal surroundings. The battle lines of Lexington are exact reproductions of the original and the participants are exactly as at the battle, 800 British against 77 Americans. All the details of Paul Revere's ride, which is one of the exciting parts of the picture, are historically correct. When he was pursued by British horsemen he outrode them and kept in advance by hurdling many a fence and gate. He finally lost them in a quagmire. Replicas of his lanterns were actually hung in Old North Church as signals.

The drum seen in the picture as used by the Minute Men is the original that was used at the battle of Lexington. Several flint lock guns that are seen were actually used in the battle and the pistols that are seen were recovered from Major Pitcairn's horse. Then there is Buckman's Tavern, an exact reproduction. Another accurate representation of a historic mansion is that of the Clark home.

In this connection it may be interesting to read what was said by Mr. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society: "It has been a real privilege to see 'America'," he declared, "and I am at a loss for words to express how deeply impressed I am with the picture. God speed you in this glorious work of telling the story of the sacrifices of your forefathers and in your patriotic mission of teaching a higher and a finer Americanism."

A Fascinating Tavern

One of the buildings that is reproduced by D. W. Griffith's romance of the Revolutionary period, "America," coming tomorrow evening to the Chestnut Street Opera House is Buckman's Tavern. It is shown in connection with the Battle of Lexington, in 1775—one of the finest representations of an historic event of great importance, yet brought to the screen. Much of the information that was utilized by Griffith and his staff in the re-creation of the atmosphere and of the aspects of the period came from President Edwin B. Worthen, of the Lexington Historical Society. He had all sorts of documents and of drawings to furnish accurate information to Griffith and his assistants and each detail had the closest scrutiny before there was final adoption of the property.

Buckman Tavern was the chief hostelry of the town. There wealthy travelers on their way North or South would arrive in their splendid coaches with numerous Negro servants. Outside the tavern usually were many idlers—men smoking long church-warden pipes and with no apparent object in life except to discuss affairs of neighbors. The twelve-mile journey to Boston was usually made on horseback. Sometimes a whole family — father, mother and one or two children—would be on the back of a plodding, patient horse. It was far from exciting and also far from comfortable.

Mr. Worthen had many interesting facts relative to living conditions at the time to give to Griffith. For instance, he was told that in those days the British taxed shoe leather so greatly that even the daughters of well-to-do farmers and villagers were accustomed to walk barefoot to the edge of the town in order to make shoes "last a life-time." It was no unusual sight to the traveler to see some blooming young women seated on a rock or at a fence rail, putting on her shoes after a tramp of a mile or more over the rough country.

It was in those days that nearly everything for the colonists was imported from England. Strangely enough New York was not the port of entry. Instead, the goods that were sent from England arrived by way of Virginia, and were passed through the custom house at Williamsburg, Va. That house is still standing and Griffith introduced it in several scenes in "America." The house is just as it was in those days when milady was dependent upon the customs officers there to pass upon silks, jewels and all sorts of wearing apparel. Much of her food went through that gate-way and the rare wines for her husband's cellar were given entry by the Government men at Williamsburg.

WHEN something exceptionally fine comes along it is hard to let it go. "America" keeps humming in our ears and racing before our eyes. It seems rather impossible ever to wind up on it. This week we went again to the 44th Street, and found a last half which is entirely different from that which we had seen before. And still it has been so expertly rearranged by Mr. Griffith that it is quite beyond us to say what has been done.

This much is certain: It is less likely to attract adverse comment now on account of the sequence of its romantic plot. The charming love story of Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague is woven even more bewitchingly into the background of Revolutionary history than it was in the beginning. Everybody who watches what we say about the films knows very well that "America" got us the opening night. Now it is a far better picture play. It is, to tell the truth, a marvelous, inspiring canvas. It is the most thrilling play ever staged.

GRIFFITH SCRATCHED FOR CASH

Closes Studios—Has Trouble With "America."

D. W. Griffith has discharged a number of employes at his Mamaroneck studio and has cut his force there down to the bone. More than 20 have been let out, pending future production plans.

As pointed out on various occasions, Griffith is very uncertain over future plans. It is more or less of an open secret that the problem of proper financing is an irksome one.

It is known in the trade that he experienced some difficulty in getting money to make "America," and that when the production had advanced very considerably, he found it necessary to turn to outside help for financial

FILM PICTURE COLLEGE OF MARY PICKFORD ENDORSED

By Associated Press.

NEW YORK, April 4.—A plan to include a moving picture university in the proposed Central Park art center sponsored by Mary Pickford, who with D. W. Griffith yesterday visited City Chamberlain Berolsheimer, has met with the chamberlain's approval, it was stated today.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give to American youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of moving pictures and "to stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

BERING SEA OPENS EARLY

NOME, Alaska, April 4.—Navigation of Bering Sea, which usually opens in May, was expected here today to begin earlier than usual this spring. Ice in Norton Sound, on which Nome is situated, already shows many breaks.

Boston Herald 3/30/24

"America," Griffith's film of the Revolution, with a story by Robert W. Chambers, enters its fourth week at the Majestic. A stirring film account that realizes the smudged and forgotten episodes, in the ride of Paul Revere, the battle of Bunker Hill, the happenings at Cherry Valley, as well as glimpses of the court and parliament of George III. The photography is unusually beautiful, and the cast includes Charles E. Mack, Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton.

Boston Advertiser March 30 1924 | Memphis (Tenn) News-Scimitar 3/30/24

FILM PRODUCER AT VALLEY FORGE. At the extreme left is D. W. Griffith. Near him are J. L. E. Bell, historian, and Rev. Dr. W. Herbert Burk, president of Valley Forge Historical Society

Topeka (Kansas) Capital 3/30/24

UNITED ARTISTS.

"Minute Man of Lexington."

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film, which is a screen story of the War of Independence made by Mr. Griffith for the D. A. R., the Minute Men were present at the performance to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured events.

Then convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Boston Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Bread of Lexington.

GRIFFITH IS "MINUTE MAN"

Picture Director Honored by Historic Body for Making "America."

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of the Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

Neil Hamilton "America" Majestic

Griffith Honored by Military Organization

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of "The Minute Men of Lexington," the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the minute men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed, of Lexington.

In his presentation, Capt. Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater glory to the memory of the battle at Lexington."

Dallas (Tex) News 3/30/24

Mr. Griffith's Contribution

A LONG this line, I wish to extend a congratulatory palm to David Wark Griffith for his courageous work in filming "America." Hampered by a lack of funds and an endless amount of trying conditions, Mr. Griffith went to work with deep sincerity and gave the screen a photoplay deserving the highest commendation. On the night the picture opened, Mr. Griffith was under his doctor's orders, but was still cutting the photoplay so that he could keep his promise and show it to Broadway on the eve of Washington's Birthday.

There are those who view "America" who will miss certain incidents in the Revolutionary War, such as Washington crossing the Delaware, the influence of Lafayette, and so on; but Mr. Griffith has explained that it was utterly impossible to include everything in his photoplay and keep up the interest of the story. Surely the thrilling role of Paul Revere will long be remembered, as well as a score of other incidents of historical significance.

As a contribution to the screen, Americans owe Mr. Griffith a debt of gratitude for "America." The different incidents that unfold on the screen will be of greater value from an instructive point of view than a book-case full of text books. He has shown a nation at its beginning struggling for existence, and has done so in a manner that will linger long in memory.

Probably the finest bit of acting rendered by Lionel Barrymore as the scoundrel Walter Butler. Carol Dempster is seen to a lovely and sympathetic heroine, and Neil Hamilton a manly hero. The different historical roles were well taken and gave life like pictures of those soldiers who contributed their share in building our nation. It was a pity, however, that more sympathy could not have been injected into the role of General Washington. On the screen the Father of His Country seemed more like a marble statue than a living breathing human being.

Philadelphia Pa Eve. Public Ledger March 31 1924

Realism Runs Riot in Griffith's Latest

Italian Paper Bollettino 3/30/24

L'America al 44th St. Theatre

È vero che il Teatro Muti deve rifrangere in sulle scherme delle azioni nobili e generose per adempiere alla sua missione di educazione e di civiltà, niun altro Teatro è oggi più educativo e più civile, nessuna film più nobile, e capace di accendere i più puri entusiasmi, quanto il Teatro delle 44 Strade che la [illegible] che vi si produce, "America," [illegible] la storia delle gloriose battaglie combattute dai popoli americani per raggiungere la sua indipendenza, uno spettacolo quindi patriottico in cui passano i più grandi fatti, i più illustri campioni della grande epopea che si compendiò nella Costituzione di questa Grande Repubblica.

Tutti dovrebbero visitare questo Teatro e colmare qualche vuoto di cognizioni [illegible] della storia di questo paese. La rappresentazione si svolgerà due volte al giorno: alle ore 2.15 e 8.15 p. m. 44 strada a Broadway. "America" è un accurato lavoro di D. W. Griffith.

The Fortnightly Discovery of a New Valentino

A SECOND and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars. Thus, the press agent.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the war of American independence, now running in New York and Boston.

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover — indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Iowa, Mass, and student theatrics have years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington revolutionist friend of Paul Revere and Minuteman, who tries to capture a spectacle of Morgan's Rangers, and takes the chance which leads through the [illegible] at Fort Ticonderoga.

New Orleans (La) States 3/30/24

FINDS NEW VALENTINO

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Cincinnati (Ohio) Enquirer 3/30/24 | Dayton (O) News 3/30/24

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the Mayor's Cabinet of Rome.

Irving Cummings has selected four of the cast to support Marr Philbin in [illegible]

Washington (DC) Herald 3/30/24

Buffalo Times Express 3/30/24 | Kansas City (Mo) Star March 30 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH IS MADE A MINUTE MAN

For his work in making America, D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Boston Common when 77 Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Capt. E. F. Breed of Lexington.

PRAISES GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA."

Director Backer That Scores for Premiere With Doctor Attending.

D. W. Griffith's "America" received an enthusiastic reception at the New York premiere.

Griffith didn't confine the action to the larger setting for two reasons: One, that the Indian warfare was a vital part of the war in that the food supplies of Washington's armies were invariably secured, that the open winter made the crossing of the Delaware with the Hessians with no broken ice possible, and that the picture was being rushed with spectacle in the theatre Griffith and his staff set up in a frugality dressing room during the final reels of the film for the purpose of an a few minutes later. With the applause and critics factoring it one of the best triumphs of his active career, a [illegible] Griffith, Mrs. Griffith and Lionel Barrymore, who had been in the cast, and discovering that he was in the hospital at [illegible] His wife was now [illegible]

Boston Post 3/30/24

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger March 30 1924 | Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 3/30/24 | Richmond (Va) News-Leader 3/30/24 | Topeka (Kansas) Capital 3/30/24 | Cincinnati (O) Post 3/30/24 | Boston Globe 3/31/24

MRS. NORMAN GREATHOUSE

Cast as the wife of General Greathouse, British commander in chief in the Revolutionary War, Mrs. Greathouse appears in Griffith's "America."

Plays Mrs. Gage in War Picture

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 3/30/24 | Dunbarton (NC) Free-Press 3/31/24 | Philadelphia Pa Eve. Public Ledger March 31 1924

RADIO HURTS MOVIE, GRIFFITH DECLARES

Theatre is Supplant the Cheapest Great Family Entertainer, He Says

TO VALLEY FORGE

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger March 30 1924

GRIFFITH GUEST AT VALLEY FORGE

Boston Post March 30 1924

Boston Post March 30 1924

Worcester (Pa) Times-Herald 3/31/24

GRIFFITH VISITOR AT VALLEY FORGE

Famous Motion Picture Producer Pays Tribute to Revolutionary Heroes

A visit to historic Valley Forge was made yesterday afternoon by D. W. Griffith, foremost motion picture director, who was the guest of the Dr. W. Herbert Burk and Mrs. Burk during his stay at the place made famous by Washington and his soldiers.

Mr. Griffith and his party were shown about the park grounds at Valley Forge by Dr. Burk and at the grave of John Waterman, the only soldier of the 3,000 buried at Valley Forge whose identity is known, Mr. Griffith placed a large floral wreath. Afterwards at the monument of Washington at the Washington Memorial Chapel the director placed a large bouquet of American Beauty roses.

Dr. Burk entertained his guests at dinner at the Washington Inn and they afterwards returned to Philadelphia. Included in the party accompanying the director were: Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Charles Emmett Mack, who have leading roles in the newest Griffith picture, "America." The picture will be shown this evening in the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia, where Mr. Griffith will be host to Dr. and Mrs. Burk.

Last evening Mr. Griffith in a talk broadcast from Station WIP, Gimbel Brothers, Philadelphia, spoke about everything from the Teapot Dome to the latest improvements made in the moving picture industry. He said that radio is keeping many of the people from the movies. He also stated he favored legislation to prevent "cheap actors" from draping themselves in an American flag and have the orchestra play the "Star Spangled Banner" in order to win applause.

Cleveland (Ohio) Plain-Dealer 3/21/24

Griffith Quitting America?

Word comes to hand that D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. Griffith's new "America" is now showing in New York.

The bankers state that "we feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

Griffith has not definitely accepted. He has said that he may visit Russia to look over its picture possibilities before he returns to America.

England some time ago was bidding for Griffith's services in the making of a "History of Mankind."

If they are not already, it looks as if the pictures would soon be the world's chief entertainers.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 3/31/24

Radio Is Threatening Movies Says Griffith

Keeping Thousands From Picture Shows, Declared.

By United Press.

PHILADELPHIA, March 31.—Radio threatens to supplant the movies as the great family entertainer. From the first, radio kept hundreds of persons away from vaudeville and the legitimate theaters, but now it is reaching out, and thousands who used to go to the movies several times a week are staying at home to listen in on their radios," declares D. W. Griffith, motion picture director, now here. He refuses to state how long it is going to take for the radio to "run" the movies out of business, but he says the radio is now a real menace to the motion picture industry.

Italian Letter Corriere 3/31/24

ALLE VISTE

"America", la grande cinematografia patriottica diretta dal Griffith, continua a darsi al 44th Street Theatre, col più grande concorso di pubblico. Il Film riproduce gli episodi principali della rivoluzione americana: sfilano personaggi storici, nel loro ambiente; e gli eventi che portarono faticosamente alla formazione della nazione americana non mancano di commuovere.

Meriden (Conn) Record 3/31/24

GRIFFITH HONORED BY HISTORIC ORGANIZATION

For his work in making "America," D. W. Griffith has been made an honorary member of The Minute Men of Lexington, the oldest military organization in this country.

At the first showing of the film in Boston, the Minute Men were present to weigh the historical accuracy and dramatic truth of the pictured event.

When convinced of the faithfulness and appeal of the scenes at the Common when seventy-seven Americans met 800 British regulars, the Minute Men voted the honorary membership.

The famous bronze button of membership, worn only by direct descendants of the men who fought in the battle, was presented by Captain E. F. Breed of Lexington.

In his presentation, Captain Breed said: "With your film, 'America,' you have done the impossible, Mr. Griffith, in adding greater luster to the memory of The Battle of Lexington."

Oswego (Kan) Palladium 3/31/24

RADIO HURTS MOVIES.

PHILADELPHIA, March 31. The radio is a real menace to the motion picture industry, D. W. Griffith, producer, said here. Thousands who formerly went to the "movies" several times a week, now stay at home evenings and are entertained by "listening in" on broadcasting programs, he said.

New Orleans (La) Item 3/31/24

Griffith Will Help Make An Italian Film

Accepts Invitation From Bankers Syndicate To Go to Italy

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome for the purpose of conferring on the production of a series of pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Com. Andrea Sereo, member of the Mayor's Cabinet of Rome.

The action on the part of the bankers has the consent and approval of the Italian government.

Have Confidence in Him

In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate, it says: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith is Italy will do much toward restoring the picture-making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

"This is the first time an American artist ever has been sought by anyone people to re-establish an art activity. In many instances American bankers and business men have been invited to reorganize a country's industry or economics, but this seems to be the first time an artist has been sought for that purpose.

Has No Definite Plans

No definite plans have been made regarding the output of the story, but the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America" which has proven one of World's greatest successes.

Mr. Griffith was visit Rome in order regarding possibilities of making a picture there before he returns

Balletin

SEEN ON THE SCREEN

Griffith's "America"—New Films at Stanley and Fox—Others

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a real masterpiece of the screen, literally swept the audience "off its feet" at the Chestnut Street Opera House last night. So high was the pitch of patriotic feeling raised by the picture that the audience applauded episode after episode.

No other photoplay since Griffith's "Birth of the Nation" reaches the heights attained by "America" from a patriotic and dramatic as well as artistic viewpoint.

The story deals with the thrilling, yet terrifying days preceding and during the Revolutionary war. No other director, it is evident, could have obtained the effect that Mr. Griffith has through depicting a series of battles and skirmishes along a slender love theme. The battles, which usually are boring, set the blood tingling. The midnight ride of Paul Revere is the most thrilling episode of the picture and probably the superlative of any ever pictured. The story, furnished by Robert W. Chambers, has infinitely more interest than most motion pictures which have their plots unhampered by a necessity for facts. The scenes at Valley Forge, at Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, are probably some of the most dramatic ever filmed. The photoplay also is worthy of commendation.

In Neil Hamilton, Griffith has a character actor whose early rise to fame is evident in every episode. Carol Dempster, as the leader, being Virginia Montgomery, reaches heights hitherto unattained. The best theme [illegible] Charles Emmett Mack, as the Spanish Tory son, who finally gives his life to the Rebel cause. Lionel Barrymore is seen as the dominering squire of Tarrytown, Captain Walter Butler. Arthur Dwan is brilliant as George Washington. All his efforts are overshadowed by those of Barrymore and Miss Dempster.

Pretty this entertainment is [illegible]

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 31 1924

Radio Is Menace To Motion Pictures, Says D. W. Griffith

By United Press

PHILADELPHIA, March 31.—The radio is a real menace to the motion picture industry, D. W. Griffith, producer, said here. Thousands who formerly went to the movies several times a week now stay at home evenings and are entertained by "listening in" on broadcasting programs, he said.

Boston Traveler 3/31/24

GO OPEN IN PHILLY

D. W. Griffith is taking his principal stars, Carol Dempster, Charles Emmett Mack and Neil Hamilton—to Philadelphia for the opening there of "America" tonight. The festivities which the Quaker City will trot out for the occasion include an escort of the national guard, which will meet them at the station and accompany them on a trip to Valley Forge. The director and his stars will appear at the theatre and over the radio [illegible]

Glenfield (N J) Courier-News March 31 1924

RADIO MENACE TO "MOVIES" SAYS GRIFFITH

[illegible]

Fairfield (Iowa) Daily Journal March 31 1924

RADIO REAL MENACE TO MOVIES, HE SAYS

[illegible]

Baltimore (Md) Evening Sun March 31 1924

Radio Is Worst Foe For Motion Pictures, D. W. Griffith Says

[illegible]

SOMETHING NEW FOR HER

[illegible]

Rochester (N.Y.) Times-Union 3/31/24

Griffith Sees Radio as Menace to Films

[illegible]

RADIO REAL MENACE TO MOVIES, PRODUCER SAYS

[illegible]

Cleveland (Ohio) Post-Engineering March 31 1924

Radio Said Menace To Motion Pictures

[illegible]

Springfield (Ohio) Sun March 31 1924

Radio Is Menace To Movie Industry

[illegible]

April 1924 Ny Cits

Making "America" Famous

Scenes in D. W. Griffith's newest production

Lionel Barrymore as Captain Walter Butler and Carol Dempster as the heroine

The British at Lexington (Photographed at the historic battle ground)

Morgan's Rangers arrive at the stockade to protect the Americans

Indians with Tories painted as redmen seeking to destroy grain supply for Washington's army

Captain Butler enlists Indians against the Revolutionary armies

When the Movies Are Worth While

By EDITH H. JARBOE

[illegible]

"AMERICA"

Most Notable Picture of the Month

D. W. GRIFFITH [illegible]

Current Film Features

Reviewed by Charles A. McMahon for N. C. W. C. News Service

[illegible]

Farm Life Spencer (Ind) april 1924

Farming and Fighting in '76.

Scenes from "America," D. W. Griffith's drama of the Revolution, filmed at the request of the D. A. R. The costumes and the farming methods portrayed in this patriotic picture are historically accurate. Photographs made especially for Farm Life.

Third U. S. Cavalry as Morgan Raiders

Off to the War, Leaving His Sweetheart at the Plow Handles

Neil Hamilton as a New England Farmer Minute Man

Charles Mack as a Virginia Farmer and Dandy

Paul Revere's Ride

Arthur Dewey, as George Washington the Gentleman Farmer

The Battle of Lexington

Cinema (Cyc) April 1924

"AMERICA"—D. W. Griffith, Inc. Directed by D. W. Griffith. Written by Robert W. Chambers.

CAST

Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton, Lucille La Verne and many others.

D. W. Griffith has again scaled the heights. The creator of "The Birth of a Nation" has been newly inspired in the case of this new picture, "America," dealing quite as forcefully and picturesquely with another period in the history of this country. There are the impressive outstanding incidents that one remembers so distinctly from his history book—the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, and Bunker Hill, and then, too, there is the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. One is taken to England to see Parliament in session with Pitt and Burke pleading for the colonies and then, in contrast, there are the long and dreary days of the suffering patriots at Valley Forge. The final scene is the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States and the young bridal couple, Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, daughter of an almost uncompromising adherent of King George, stands among the witnesses of the ceremony.

Almost at the very beginning of the picture there is stir. Griffith has done nothing finer than in his creation of the ride of Paul Revere. No one could withstand the appeal of that momentous ride as it is thrillingly set forth. The battle scenes are of a convincing realism and fighting with the Indians is of the hand-to-hand sort. The romantic features of the story are not forgotten, with Carol Dempster as the heroine and with Neil Hamilton as Nathan Holden. He is seen at the head of Continental soldiers fighting valiantly and it is as though one were actually living in the period that is presented. Each role is ably enacted and there are many participants in the action. Griffith is himself again.

Boston Advertiser April 1 1924

ALL IN SWEET ACCORD.

Rumors that United Artists, through which organization Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin and D. W. Griffith distribute their pictures, was headed for a breakup were set at rest by a statement signed by the four cinema notables mentioned above. The quartet is unanimously satisfied with their organization, according to the manifesto.

Philadelphia (Pa) Bulletin 4/1/24

SEEN ON THE SCREEN

Griffith's "America"—New Films at Stanley and Fox—Others

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a real masterpiece of the screen, literally swept the audience "off its feet" at the Chestnut Street Opera House last night. So high was the pitch of patriotic feeling raised by the picture that the audience applauded episode after episode.

No other photoplay since Griffith's "Birth of the Nation" reaches the heights attained by "America" from a patriotic and dramatic as well as artistic viewpoint.

The story deals with the thrilling, yet terrifying days preceding and during the Revolutionary war. No other director, it is evident, could have obtained the effect that Mr. Griffith has through depicting a series of battles and skirmishes along a slender love theme. The battles which usually are boring, set the blood tingling. The midnight ride of Paul Revere is the most thrilling episode of the picture and probably the superlative of any ever pictured. The story, furnished by Robert W. Chambers, has infinitely more interest than most motion pictures which have their plots unhampered by a necessity for facts. The scenes at Valley Forge, at Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, are probably some of the most dramatic ever filmed. The photography also is worthy of commendation.

In Neil Hamilton, Griffith has a new actor whose early rise to fame is evident in every episode. Carol Dempster, as the tender, loving Nancy Montague, reaches heights hitherto unattained. The love theme revolves about Hamilton, as Nathan Holden and Nancy. Decidedly the best bit of artistic portrayal of the picture is that of Charles Emmett Mack, as the foppish Tory son, who gladly gives his life to the Rebel cause. Lionel Barrymore is seen as the domineering, sneering, villanous Captain Walter Butler. Arthur Dewey is brilliant as George Washington but his efforts are overshadowed by those of Hamilton and Miss Dempster. Louis Wolheim, as one of Butler's subordinate, is so terrifying one can hardly believe such a character could exist.

Philadelphia (Pa) Eve Public Ledger 4/1/24

NEW GRIFFITH FILM, "AMERICA," IS SHOWN

Story of Revolution Is Screened at Chestnut Street Opera House

No man has really lived, says Kipling, until he has known war, women and horses, and it is with these three appeals to romance that the great director again drew back the curtains of history last night to tell in a simple yet soul-stirring manner that most dramatic of true stories, the American Revolution.

Although a love tale, refreshingly free from complications, is woven into the picture, the play is primarily a parade of historic episodes leading up to the surrender of Cornwallis.

From the ride of Paul Revere to the last gruesome massacre by Captain Butler and his horde of painted ravagers in Wyoming Valley, the warfare between the colonists and their British and Indian foes is traced with such scrupulous attention to actual fact that the dramatic force of the film is maintained without a single resort to artificial means.

As always, Griffith promises to "make" new stars with his latest presentation. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague, the haughty, yet tender and sincere daughter of a Virginia Tory, blossoms out as a full-fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown.

Neil Hamilton realizes imagination's portrait of the quiet, daring captain of Morgan's Rifles. Charles Emmet Mack, giving a whimsical interpretation of the foppish, but fearless son of luxury and Lionel Barrymore, scowling through the part of Captain Butler divide second honors in the cast.

It can be truly said of "America" that it is historically perfect, with a wealth of accurate revelations concerning the clothes, customs and condi-

Newark (NJ) Star Eagle 4/1/24

D. W. Griffith's super-picture, "America," is being given its premier showing in New York and eliciting much enthusiasm, is to go to Italy shortly to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. Griffith has been assured of ample financial support in his project. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy which was badly crippled by the war. Representatives of different governments and picture syndicates in Europe have been trying for years to induce Griffith to make an outstanding picture of their particular nation.

* * *

my Telegraph April 1 1924

ITALY WANTS Mary Pickford to appear in a film that D. W. Griffith may make in that country.

Advices received from Rome state that announcement that the American producer was to come to that city to confer with a syndicate of bankers over the feasibility of a great motion picture production which would rehabilitate the industry has excited great interest. The various newspapers have played it up and have praised the enterprise of the syndicate. Naturally, also the newspapers and their readers are perfectly willing to advise and suggest methods and means of bringing this about.

Inasmuch as the announcement of the Griffith visit came almost at the same time as that saying that Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford were to sail for a long vacation trip on the Continent, the two facts have been hooked up to the extent that many of the Italians want Miss Pickford chosen as the American star.

Griffith and his party were out of the city yesterday and could not be reached and Miss Pickford had engagements which prevented her from answering any questions. It was learned, however, that Mr. Griffith has postponed his sailing from April 2 to April 12 and will depart on the same steamship as the two stars. Mr. Serrao, the representative of the Italian Syndicate, will also be a passenger on the same ship. He would not say yesterday whether this fact had any significance.

Griffith and Miss Pickford are very old friends. He gave her her first job in motion pictures and directed her in the first picture in which her name stood out in the cast.

IN MY OPINION
By COLEMAN HILL

Telegraph

IN a year when American drama is making steady progress in a definite direction, showing every indication of gathering strength, the American movie continues to rehash the work of its yesteryear. The films which now rush across the screen are better than the 1923 mobs, because they contain thousand additional persons; perhaps a new camera trick has opened up a possibility that was not then developed; but for the most part, the screen has made no advance comparable to the betterment, since the war, of its sister arts of the theater and of fiction.

The new season has brought to New York three movies retailing at the $1.50 to $2 rate—that is, three productions which fill an entire evening in the telling, and are consequently told, not at recognized picture theaters, but across the stages of "legitimate" houses.

They are Griffith's America, Cecil DeMille's The Ten Commandments and Fairbanks' The Thief of Bagdad.

* * * * *

Woman Through the Ages

Would you know the stories which these pictures tell? Or should one say "the story"—for all three are concerned with the same situation? Here are a trio of photoplays which set forth the tale of the girl who had two lovers—one, who was good, being very good, and the other, since bad, being horrid.

Yet of necessity there is something more to these films than mere catch-phrase of a plot. For instance, one might trace in the successive periods shown the gradual emancipation of woman.

Take, for instance, the Fairbanks picture. Here a wonder-fantasy of the Arabian Nights, laid in the Near East at that period when Flying Carpets and Invisible Cloaks were commonplace, shows the lovely Princess beset by the customary two. When the wicked suitor is about to overcome her, and carry her off across the skies on his magic rug, does she struggle to be free for the arms of her truly beloved? She does not. She succumbs without resistance. Here is woman of the cave-man period.

Then comes the America of 1776, when demure heroine is torn between her love for handsome Dick Slater—we beg your pardon; we were thinking of The Liberty Boys of '76, which the Coleman Book Store sold, against our youth, every Saturday morning—her love, we should have said, for handsome Nathan Hamilton, officer in General Washington's forces, and the advances of the ruffianly Captain Walter Butler, of His Brittanic Majesty's army. Here is the Victorian woman, resisting the dastardly schemes of the villain, fighting with him, and finally freeing herself from his clutches.

Mark now the advance shown by Mr. De Mille in his most modern tale of The Ten Commandments. For Mary Leigh, the two-suitored piece de resistance of this contemporary menu, marries them both—though, of course, successively. Here at last is woman as she today commands the world.

* * * * *

Mr. Griffith Introduces Mr. Washington

The two-and-a-half-hour movie, like so many of its sisters of the spoken stage, has difficulty in being noteworthy throughout its length. Mr. Griffith's America alternately holds and releases the interest; his ride of Paul Revere in the first half aroused critical enthusiasm in New York, but to us was no more moving than the attack on the fort in the second. There are moments of great vividness and much beauty in the production; yet it nowhere lives up to the glamor which the name of Griffith has stirred in American hearts.

America is the story of the love between a girl of Virginia and a boy of Massachusetts in those days when both States fought at Princeton and at Yorktown. There is no question but that Mr. Griffith has made American history live before the eyes of his spectators; whether his portraiture is authentic, only the careful historian can say. We have a suspicion that the lily-whiteness of our own forces was not so gilded as Mr. Griffith has made us believe. For the purposes of drama, perhaps, all can be forgiven.

* * * * *

Mr. De Mille Introduces Mr. Moses

The De Mille picture, like the others, has its moments. There is no drag during the splendid prologue, which depicts the flight of the Children of Israel from Egypt, into the wilderness, to the giving of the Commandments and the overthrow of the golden calf.

Here the camera has done its best work. There are splendid flashes of photography done in natural colors, and such magnificent trick work in the parting of the Red Sea that the spectator holds both his seat and his breath. This is a film which must be seen, at least through the first half. The modern story of part two is good, as such things go; but can be missed without qualms.

* * * * *

Mr. Fairbanks Introduces the Scene Painter

Mr. Fairbanks has taken the honor of having used his camera to the limit of its possibilities. The Thief of Bagdad is a delightful location of that realm legitimate to the movies and yet rarely touched by the film. Mr. Fairbanks has a good thing.

Here, black-and-white has never before shown such surprising imaginings—that is, on the screen. Its scenes have the true and unusual and those who love a fine picture in that monotonous or not which D. W. W. produces in the colorings of the Rubber Company's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Los Angeles (Cal) News 4/2/24 — Franklin (Pa) News-Herald April 2 1924 — Springfield (O) Sun 4/2/24 — Boston American 4/2/24 — Elmira (NY) Gazette 4/3/24 — NY News April 4 1924

IN REVIEW

A Great Question
Different Answers
Eight Big Experts
Four Solutions Vary

By L. B. Fowler

WHAT does the public want in the way of the stage and screen entertainment? Probably the best answer to that question is: No one knows but the public and the public doesn't know how to declare itself. Rather a peculiar situation.

Ask any ten persons associated in an executive capacity with the business of producing novels, stage plays, or motion pictures that question and you will receive ten different answers.

For example: George MacAdams of the New York Sunday Times was curious enough to select a group of eight experts on the subject—they were David Belasco, playwright-producer; D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost men connected with the motion picture industry; George M. Cohan, actor-playwright-producer; John Golden, producer of stage plays; Morris Gest, impresario; Harry Lauder, author-actor; Fannie Hurst, novelist, and Irving Berlin, song-writer-musical comedy producer.

One would naturally think that these people, who have achieved both fame and fortune, would have an understanding of the public's desires, yet they disagree.

* * *

"If I wanted to treat the theater as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, why, I could make more than a million a year," declares David Belasco.

"* * * My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public a producer can only make a guess. * * * No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure."

"No one knows what the public wants," wisely states D. W. Griffith. "The public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food—one time he eats fish, another time meat—it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think anyone can be specific in answering the question, I believe people want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book, or go to the theater, or to the movies."

George M. Cohan remarks: "The present day audience is tough on rehash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

* * *

John Golden's answer to the question of "What does the people want?" was crisp and to the point: "To forget their troubles," says he. "They have plenty of dullness, plenty of troubles and problems in their own lives and they don't want more of the same thing in the theater.

"What the people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for—we are all natural born rooters.

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or screen, ought to begin AT its beginning and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have appreciated this fact. They sometimes a dinner party, then after a dance—to the greatest offender. Occasionally the party adjourns to the swimming pool—that's what makes the movie a 'super-picture.' The party is all right if it is an essential one in the development of the story; but it's only too easy to get such a party for mere camera sake and try to make us feel that where the thread of the story ended up and then you figured that a dance would be in order."

"The trend toward the movies and the picture houses shows that the people want a good story that they can follow from beginning to end."

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/2/24

"AMERICA," COLOSSAL WAR FILM, TO HAVE BIG FREE SHOWING

"America," D. W. Griffith's colossal romance of the War of American Independence will have its first performance in this city next Sunday afternoon at 3:15 at the Pitt theater, when a special complimentary performance will be given for the benefit of the dramatic critics and the members of the Typographical union. At 8:15 the film will have its second showing before Mayor Magee, city officials, editorial staffs and other guests. Mayor Magee will speak at both performances in support of better pictures. The public will be given its first chance to see this the greatest of all Griffith's masterpieces beginning Monday afternoon, April 7.

"America" is the throbbing romance of the mighty loves and surging passions of the American Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country in this manner.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the pulsating love story which runs through the glorious romance like a thread of gold. The historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

"America" in which practically every figure of Revolutionary history appears, covers the period of the ride of Paul Revere—which the severest critics of the New York and Boston papers unanimously agree is the most thrilling thing ever seen on the screen—to the first inauguration of George Washington.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton—whom Griffith says is destined to become the greatest and most popular leading man of filmland—Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack and Erville Alderson head the cast of 36 principals. United States army soldiers and descendants of prominent Revolutionary families were used as "extras."

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/2/24

Star of "America," Griffith's Photoplay, Coming to the Pitt

Carol Dempster.

"America," David Wark Griffith's newest and most ambitious historical photographic spectacle, built around the early sacrifices of American patriots, comes to the Pitt next week with Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in the cast.

New Britain (Conn) Herald 4/3/24

GRIFFITH PRAISES NEW LEADING MAN

Says His "Perfect Lover" Will Have Brilliant Career In Films

A second and greater Valentino a new "great lover" of the screen has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Has Made Many Stars

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and minuteman, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's Rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/2/24

IT HAS TO BE NOTED

When a man who, a few years ago according to popular report, was riding over the country in "side-door Pullmans," or, to avoid the vernacular of the hobo, in freight cars—when such a man is offered a contract to cover a period of two years and which involves no particular effort on his part, his remuneration to be a million dollars, the fact or report simply has to be noted and that is all there is to it. The man is no longer a hobo, a tramp pugilist glad to "cut up his dubes" for a comparative few dollars. He has learned how to use those fists of his so well that he stands before the world as the best fighter with his fists of any living man. The document to get him in action, or whether he fits that matter, is so great that no true or false reports concerning his alleged evasion of the draft or any other disreputable conduct, can make much of an impression upon that document. He is worth a million dollars to appear in our moving pictures, so the story goes to be taken in the state, nearly because he is the champion pugilist of the world and because he shows off how tough people in and is to make it worth a million dollars to promoters of the pictures.

And the somewhat laudable side of this thing is that undoubtedly the man was put the million dollars in the transaction.

Boston Telegram April 2 1924

VIRTUE AND VIRTUE'S NEMESIS

Carol Dempster, as Nancy Montague, and Lionel Barrymore, as ale of the American Revolution now at the Majestic. Butler, who outndians the Indians in savagery, pursues pretty Nancy with his attenions, until Neil Hamilton puts an end to it by [illegible] an end to the aptain.

AMUSEMENTS — AMUSEMENTS

Nashville (Tenn) Banner 4/3/24

ARE YOU Discouraged?

Griffith Saw His First Play at 18.

David W. Griffith decided what his life work should be, but he had to alter his plans many times and undergo severe hardships on the way to attainment.

As a boy in La Grange, Ky., he listened in wonder to stories read by his sister, and resolved to be a great writer. At 18 he left public school and started as a reporter on a Louisville newspaper.

Assigned to write theatrical notes, he saw a play for the first time in his life, and made up his mind to be a dramatist. Told that all great playwrights started as actors, he obtained a place with a stock company. The salary was small, and he ran an elevator in a dry goods store to provide a living.

Next he was an actor, with a traveling company, earning $18 a week in season. During one summer he sold books. In another between-season period he shoveled ore in the hold of a ship.

After several years on the road, he went to New York to be a writer. Success finally came with the acceptance of a poem, a story and a play. The play was rewritten but failed.

Seeing a moving picture, he resolved to be a scenario writer, prepared a picture play and sent it to a producing company, but never heard its fate. He wrtoe one for the Biograph company, and was paid $15. Then he decided to be a movie picture director.

Although he received little encouragement, he "hung around" the Biograph studio until the illness of a director gave him a chance. He introduced new ideas. The producers did not like them, but the public did, and for six years he made one and two-reel pictures.

At 33 he started making "The Birth of a Nation." Originally it was planned to cost $50,000, but expenses ran ten times that amount, and he had to spend all his time away from the studio raising money. Then came the fight to save the picture from suppression. That cost him $300,000 in attorneys' fees, but the success of the production made motion picture history.

Griffith made other large films, became rich, and now, at 43, is reported to have said he will make only two more big productions, then retire.

Tomorrow—Mrs. Sage's Thirty Years of Privation.

(Copyright, 1924, by C. C. Powell.)

Watertown (Mass) Sun 4/3/24

FIRST OF TICKETS TO "AMERICA" ARE AWARDED BY "SUN"

The first of the tickets to David W. Griffith's great film play "America," at the Majestic theatre, which are being presented to girls and boys who write the best essays on the Colonial and Revolutionary periods in American history, were given out at the SUN office this week.

Those students in the Watertown schools who made the try for seats to "America" were pleasantly surprised to more instances when they were called up by the SUN or received tickets by mail.

Some of the prize-winning essays will be published by the SUN now that the time for submitting essays is nearing the close. Be sure to get yours in soon as the contest closes the middle of April.

Essays that give new material regarding Watertown's part in the early history of the nation especially desired.

Houston (Tex) Post 4/3/24

What, Another!

The Day (Nye) April 2 1924

[illegible]

Denver (Colo) Herald 4/3/24

[illegible]

The "Naked Truth Dinner" is the annual gathering of the Associated Motion Picture Advertisers. This year there will be no long after-dinner speeches but the following well known people will give five minute bedtime stories which same will be broadcast to Hollywood, England and places in between: Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Will Hays, David W. Griffith, Samual Rothafel, Rupert Hughes, A. M. Botsford, and a Big Personality whose name will be the Big Surprise of the festivity.

Cleveland (O) Plain Dealer April 3 1924

Notes and Comment.

D. W. Griffith is going to Italy to look over the celluloid situation there. If he decides to make a picture in Italy, he will please the Italians further by having Mary Pickford for his star. Italy is calling for Griffith and Mary. If Mary does yield to the demand (which of course she won't), it will be a reunion. D. W. was Mary's early flame.

The image is reported to be covering

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun April 3/24

COMING TO THE THEATERS.

"America," the latest D. W. Griffith production, which has just taken New York by storm and aptly described by one of the reviewers as "an echo of the shot heard 'round the world," will be the attraction at the Shubert-Pitt Theater twice daily beginning next Monday afternoon.

Albany (NY) News April 3 1924

PHOTOPLAYS AND PLAYERS.

Mary Pickford directed by David W. Griffith. That is the proposal advanced by a group of Italian bankers who are ready to back a big picture with the most famous actress and director concerned in it. Griffith is to sail for Italy April 12, and Miss Pickford and Fairbanks sail on the same date, so the rumor hounds see something more [illegible]

Jewish Daily News April 4 1924

א גרויס פון דער רעוואלוציע אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער

אין 44טע סטריט טעאטער ווערט איצט געוויזן א בילד פון דער גרויסער אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע. אין דעם בילד געהערן אנטייל א מאסע מענשען און פיעלע היסטארישע פאסיגנען ווערן איבערגעגעבן מיט אלע איינצעלהייטן פון איהן לייזונגס. דאס בילד איז געמאכט געווארען פון גריפיטס, דעם באשאפער פון א בוירט און עגיפטן און אנדערע עפאכע מאכענדע בילדער אמעריקא ווערט געגעבען פאר דיא בעסטע בילד.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chron-Tel April 4 1924

HYLAN PONDERS NEW PARK AIR STIFLERS

Schools and Even a Movie Institute on List.

By INDUSTRIALIST.

"It begins to dawn on me that Mayor Hylan in his recklessness and lack of balance might even build public schools in Central park, unless interrupted.

"If he persists in his efforts to build up Central park with monuments, art centers and the like, I predict that Mayor Hylan will turn the entire public against him."

This was the statement last night of William Bradford Roulstone of the Parks and Playgrounds association which is attempting to save Central park.

Friend When Right.

Roulstone, addressing several hundred women at the American Women's organization, 220 Madison avenue, declared that he is a Democrat and has twice voted for Mayor Hylan. "But," he said, "that fact does not make me endorse this determination of his to throw open our city's precious treasure for real estate development."

Killed in the assembly, it is now thought the art bills will be worked into the new home rule measure.

Courtship of the favor of movie fans is seen in the new dodge to include a motion picture institute with the art buildings.

Earlier in the day Roulstone learned that Mary Pickford, David W. Griffith had called at City Hall to ask that a moving picture institute be added to the projected art and music centre. They were informed that the plan has Mayor Hylan's indorsement.

Doubts Seriousness.

"Do you mean to tell me that Mayor Hylan is seriously considering using Central park as a building site for educational purposes?" Roulstone asked.

"I can think of nothing that would improve our people more than a school for the movies which would develop the religious and educational features. But it must not be in Central park."

David W. Griffith Mary Pickford

Be sure to read editorial on page 15.

Read further about the Central Park controversy in the DAILY NEWS today.

Jewish Daily News April 4 1924

גרויסע מענשען, א גרויסע צייט און א קאלאסאלער ספעקטאקעל

[illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 4/4/24

Gri[illegible]ming for [illegible]e of "America"

Note[illegible]er to Speak Sunday [illegible] Sunday in Shubert Pitt Theater.

INTEREST [illegible] FILM GREAT

D. W. GRIFFITH.

D. W. Griffith, noted motion picture director and producer, is coming to Pittsburgh tomorrow and will appear at the Shubert Pitt Theater Sunday and Monday at the opening presentations of his newest picture, "America." Carol Dempster, who has the leading feminine role; Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack, actors in the film drama, will also appear with Mr. Griffith at the theater, though they will not arrive in the city until Sunday morning.

Mr. Griffith, the director of "The Birth of a Nation," "Way Down East," "Broken Blossoms," "Hearts Aflame" and many other great screen productions, will address audiences at matinee and night performances on both days. The Sunday afternoon show will be for members of the Pittsburgh Typographical Union and their families. That night the guests will include city officials, the board of public education, officers of the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution, Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Spanish-American War Veterans, G. A. R., the Select Scouts, Girl Scouts and the editorial staffs of Pittsburgh newspapers. The complimentary showings will be given with special permission of Mayor William A. Magee.

The film shows Monday will be regular performances for the public. Matinee and night performances will be given daily thereafter.

A summary of the actual [illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 4/4/24

NOTED PICTURE PRODUCER COMING TO PITTSBURGH.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

Farm Life Spencer (Ind) april 1924

Farming and Fighting in '76.

Scenes from "America," D. W. Griffith's drama of the Revolution, filmed at the request of the D. A. R. The costumes and the farming methods portrayed in this patriotic picture are historically accurate. Photographs made especially for Farm Life.

Third U. S. Cavalry as Morgan Raiders

Off to the War, Leaving His Sweetheart at the Plow Handles

Neil Hamilton as a New England Farmer Minute Man

Charles Mack as a Virginia Farmer and Dandy

Paul Revere's Ride

Arthur Dewey, as George Washington the Gentleman Farmer

The Battle of Lexington

Cinema (Los Angeles) April 1924

"AMERICA"—D. W. Griffith, Inc. Directed by D. W. Griffith. Written by Robert W. Chambers.

CAST

Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton, Lucille La Verne and many others.

D. W. Griffith has again scaled the heights. The creator of "The Birth of a Nation" has been newly inspired in the case of this new picture, "America," dealing quite as forcefully and picturesquely with another period in the history of this country. There are the impressive outstanding incidents that one remembers so distinctly from his history book—the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, and Bunker Hill, and then, too, there is the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. One is taken to England to see Parliament in session with Pitt and Burke pleading for the colonies and then, in contrast, there are the long and dreary days of the suffering patriots at Valley Forge. The final scene is the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States and the young bridal couple, Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, daughter of an almost uncompromising adherent of King George, stands among the witnesses of the ceremony.

Almost at the very beginning of the picture there is stir. Griffith has done nothing finer than in his creation of the ride of Paul Revere. No one could withstand the appeal of that momentous ride as it is thrillingly set forth. The battle scenes are of a convincing realism and fighting with the Indians is of the hand-to-hand sort. The romantic features of the story are not forgotten, with Carol Dempster as the heroine and with Neil Hamilton as Nathan Holden. He is seen at the head of Continental soldiers fighting valiantly and it is as though one were actually living in the period that is presented. Each role is ably enacted and there are many participants in the action. Griffith is himself again.

Boston Advertiser April 1 1924

ALL IN SWEET ACCORD.

Rumors that United Artists, through which organization Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin and D. W. Griffith distribute their pictures, was headed for a breakup were set at rest by a statement signed by the four cinema notables mentioned above. The quartet is unanimously satisfied with their organization, according to the manifesto.

Philadelphia (Pa) Bulletin 4/1/24

...N ON THE SCREEN

Griffith's "America"—New Films at Stanley and Fox—Others

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a real masterpiece of the screen, literally swept the audience "off its feet" at the Chestnut Street Opera House last night. So high was the pitch of patriotic feeling raised by the picture that the audience applauded episode after episode.

No other photoplay since Griffith's "Birth of the Nation" reaches the heights attained by "America" from a patriotic and dramatic as well as artistic viewpoint.

The story deals with the thrilling, yet terrifying days preceding and during the Revolutionary war. No other director, it is evident, could have obtained the effect that Mr. Griffith has through depicting a series of battles and skirmishes along a slender love theme. The battles which usually are boring, set the blood tingling. The midnight ride of Paul Revere is the most thrilling episode of the picture and probably the superlative of any ever pictured. The story, furnished by Robert W. Chambers, has infinitely more interest than most motion pictures which have their plots unhampered by a necessity for facts. The scenes at Valley Forge, at Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, are probably some of the most dramatic ever filmed. The photography also is worthy of commendation.

In Neil Hamilton, Griffith has a new actor whose early rise to fame is evident in every episode. Carol Dempster, as the tender, loving Nancy Montague, reaches heights hitherto unattained. The love theme revolves about Hamilton, as Nathan Holden and Nancy. Decidedly the best bit of artistic portrayal of the picture is that of Charles Emmett Mack, as the foppish Tory son, who gladly gives his life to the Rebel cause. Lionel Barrymore is seen as the domineering, sneering, villanous Captain Walter Butler. Arthur Dewey is brilliant as George Washington but his efforts are overshadowed by those of Hamilton and Miss Dempster. Louis Wolheim, as one of Butler's subordinate, is so terrifying one can hardly believe such a character could exist.

Newark (N.J.) Star Eagle 4/1/24

D. W. Griffith's super-picture, "America," is being given its premier showing in New York and eliciting much enthusiasm, is to go to Italy shortly to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. Griffiths has been assured of ample financial support in his project. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy which was badly crippled by the war. Representatives of different governments and picture syndicates in Europe have been trying for years to induce Griffiths to make an outstanding picture of their particular nation.

Philadelphia (Pa) Eve Public Ledger 4/1/24

NEW GRIFFITH FILM, "AMERICA," IS SHOWN

Story of Revolution Is Screened at Chestnut Street Opera House

No man has really lived, says Kipling, until he has known war, women and horses, and it is with these three appeals to romance that the great director again drew back the curtains of history last night to tell in a simple yet soul-stirring manner that most dramatic of true stories, the American Revolution.

Although a love tale, refreshingly free from complications, is woven into the picture, the play is primarily a parade of historic episodes leading up to the surrender of Cornwallis.

From the ride of Paul Revere to the last gruesome massacre by Captain Butler and his horde of painted ravagers in Wyoming Valley, the warfare between the colonists and their British and Indian foes is traced with such scrupulous attention to actual fact that the dramatic force of the film is maintained without a single resort to artificial means.

As always, Griffith promises to "make" new stars with his latest presentation. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague, the haughty, yet tender and sincere daughter of a Virginia Tory, blossoms out as a full-fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown.

Neil Hamilton realizes imagination's portrait of the quiet, daring captain of Morgan's Rifles. Charles Emmet Mack, giving a whimsical interpretation of the foppish, but fearless son of luxury and Lionel Barrymore, scowling through the part of Captain Butler divide second honors in the cast.

It can be truly said of "America" that it is historically perfect, with a wealth of accurate revelations concerning the clothes, customs and condi-

N.Y. Telegraph April 1 1924

ITALY WANTS MaryPickford to appear in pictures that D. W. Griffith may make in that country.

Advices received from Rome state that announcement that the American producer was to come to that city to confer with a syndicate of bankers over the feasibility of a great motion pictiire production which would rehabilitate the industry has excited great interest. The various newspapers have played it up and have praised the enterprise of the syndicate. Naturally, also the newspapers and their readers are perfectly willing to advise and suggest methods and means of bringing this about.

Inasmuch as the announcement of the Griffith visit came almost at the same time as that saying that Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford were to sail for a long vacation trip on the Continent, the two facts have been hooked up to the extent that many of the Italians want Miss Pickford chosen as the American star.

Griffith and his party were out of the city yesterday and could not be reached and Miss Pickford had engagements which prevented her from answering any questions. It was learned, however, that Mr. Griffith has postponed his sailing from April 2 to April 12 and will depart on the same steamship as the two stars. Mr. Serrao, the representative of the Italian Syndicate, will also be a passenger on the same ship. He would not say yesterday whether this fact had any significance.

Griffith and Miss Pickford are very old friends. He gave her her first job in motion pictures and directed her in the first picture in which her name stood out in the cast.

IN MY OPINION

By COLEMAN HILL

N.Y. Telegraph

IN a year when American drama is making steady progress in a definite direction, showing every indication of gathering strength, the American movie continued to rehash the work of its yesteryear. The new, which now rush across the screen are better than the 1920 mobs, because they contain thousand additional persons; perhaps a new camera trick has opened up a possibility that was not then developed; but for the most part, the screen has made no advance comparable to the betterment, since the war, of its sister arts of the theater and of fiction.

The new season has brought to New York three movies retailing at the $1.50 to $2 rate—that is, three productions which fill an entire evening in the telling, and are consequently told, not at recognized picture theaters, but across the stages of "legitimate" houses.

They are Griffith's America, Cecil DeMille's The Ten Commandments and Fairbanks' The Thief of Bagdad.

* * * * *

Woman Through the Ages

Would you know the stories which these pictures tell? Or should one say "the story"—for all three are concerned with the self same situation? Here are a trio of photoplays which set forth the tale of the girl who had two lovers—one, who was good, being very good, and the other, since bad, being horrid.

Yet of necessity there is something more to these films than mere catch-phrase of a plot. For instance, one might trace in the successive periods shown the gradual emancipation of woman.

Take, for instance, the Fairbanks picture. Here a wonder-fantasy of the Arabian Nights, laid in the Near East at that period when Flying Carpets and Invisible Cloaks were commonplace, shows the lovely Princess beset by the customary two. When the wicked suitor is about to overcome her, and carry her off across the skies on his magic rug, does she struggle to be free for the arms of her truly beloved? She does not. She succumbs without resistance. Here is woman of the cave-man period.

Then comes the America of 1776, when demure heroine is torn between her love for handsome Dick Slater—we beg your pardon; we were thinking of The Liberty Boys of '76, which the Coleman Book Store sold, against our youth, every Saturday morning—her love, we should have said, for handsome Nathan Hamilton, officer in General Washington's forces, and the advances of the ruffianly Captain Walter Butler, of His Brittanic Majesty's army. Here is the Victorian woman, resisting the dastardly schemes of the villain, fighting with him, and finally freeing herself from his clutches.

Mark now the advance shown by Mr. De Mille in his most modern tale of The Ten Commandments. For Mary Leigh, the two-suitored piece de resistance of this contemporary mann, marries them both—though, of course, successively. Here at last is woman as she today commands the world.

* * * * *

Mr. Griffith Introduces Mr. Washington

The two-and-a-half-hour movie, like so many of its sisters of the spoken stage, has difficulty in being noteworthy throughout its length. Mr. Griffith's America alternately holds and releases the interest; his ride of Paul Revere in the first half aroused critical enthusiasm in New York, but to us was no more moving than the attack on the fort in the second. There are moments of great vividness and much beauty in the production; yet it nowhere lives up to the glamor which the name of Griffith has stirred in American hearts.

America is the story of the love between a girl of Virginia and a boy of Massachusetts in those days when both States fought at Princeton and at Yorktown. There is no question but that Mr. Griffith has made American h[illegible] live before the eyes of his spectators; w[illegible]ther his portraiture is authentic, only the careful historian can say. We have a suspicion that the lily-whiteness of our own forces was not so gilded as Mr. Griffith has made us believe. For the purposes of drama, perhaps, all can be forgiven.

* * * * *

Mr. De Mille Introduces Mr. Moses

The De Mille picture, like the others, has its moments. There is no drag during the splendid prologue, which depicts the flight of the Children of Israel from Egypt, into the wilderness, to the giving of the Commandments and the overthrow of the golden calf.

Here the camera has done its best work. There are splendid flashes of photography done in natural colors, and such magnificent trick work in the parting of the Red Sea that the spectator holds both his seat and his breath. This is a film which must be seen, at least through the first half. The modern story of part two is good, as such things go, but can be missed without serious.

* * * * *

Mr. Fairbanks Introduces the Brass Pounder

Mr. Fairbanks has taken the honor of being used his camera to the limit of its possibilities. The Thief of Bagdad is a delicious invention of that racia lightness to the movies and yet there is much in the film that is of the stuff of fantasy. The production is a triumph for the camera man and some battles Mr. Fairbanks must a poor rank.

Here, then and there, the screen has given us some very amazing imaginings—that is, on the screen. Its seven reels are thick with excitement and there not a dull moment in the movements of our story. Mr. W. provided us in the persons of the Italian Emperor, the Italian Princess, with photographs of an superior sort, characters of a reality to the comedy and tend more and more. The prologue has invested it in the primary place.

* * * * *

Action Starts in the Prologue

The first part of the Thief of Bagdad, in the opinion of many critics, is the best part of the film. The thief of Bagdad, a lovable rogue, is a thief and a liar, and he is a thief and a liar and he is a thief and a liar. The Princess of Bagdad, the Princess of Bagdad, the Princess of Bagdad, the

Los Angeles (Cal) News 4/7/24 — Franklin (Pa) News-Herald April 2 1924 — Springfield (O) Sun 4/12/24 — Boston Advertiser 4/13/24 — Elmira (N.Y.) Gazette 4/3/24 — Troy News April 4

IN REVIEW

A Great Question
Different Answers
Eight Big Experts
Four Solutions Vary

By L. B. Fowler

WHAT does the public want in the way of the stage and screen entertainment? Probably the best answer to that question is: No one knows but the public and the public doesn't know how to declare itself. Rather a peculiar situation.

Ask any ten persons associated in an executive capacity with the business of producing novels, stage plays, or motion pictures that question and you will receive ten different answers.

For example: George MacAdams of the New York Sunday Times was curious enough to select a group of eight experts on the subject—they were David Belasco, playwright-producer; D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost men connected with the motion picture industry; George M. Cohan, actor-playwright-producer; John Golden, producer of stage plays; Morris Gest, impresario; Harry Lauder, author-actor; Fannie Hurst, novelist, and Irving Berlin, song-writer-musical comedy producer.

One would naturally think that these people, who have achieved both fame and fortune, would have an understanding of the public's desires, yet they disagree.

* * *

"If I wanted to treat the theater as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, why, I could make more than a million a year," declares David Belasco.

* * * My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public a producer can only make a guess. * * * No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure."

"No one knows what the public wants," wisely states D. W. Griffith. "The public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food—one time he eats fish, another time meat—it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think anyone can be specific in answering the question, I believe people want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book, or go to the theater, or to the movies."

George M. Cohan remarks: "The present day audience is tough on rehash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

* * *

John Golden's answer to the question of "What does the people want?" was crisp and to the point: "To forget their troubles," says he. "They have plenty of dullness, plenty of troubles and problems in their own lives and they don't want more of the same thing in the theater.

"What the people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for—we are all natural born rooters.

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or screen, ought to begin AT its beginning and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have appreciated this fact. The Thirty—sometimes a dinner party, more often a dance—is the general offender. Occasionally the party appears to the entranced fan that's what makes the movie a 'movie-picture.' The party is all right if it is an essential cog in the development of the story; but to a city job an art work a party for party sake, party dated trying to fill out and where the thread of the story seems to end there you discover that a dance come in at all."

* * *

[illegible]

"AMERICA," COLOSSAL WAR FILM, TO HAVE BIG FREE SHOWING

"America," D. W. Griffith's colossal romance of the War of American Independence will have its first performance in this city next Sunday afternoon at 3:15 at the Pitt theater, when a special complimentary performance will be given for the benefit of the dramatic critics and the members of the Typographical union. At 8:15 the film will have its second showing before Mayor Magee, city officials, editorial staffs and other guests. Mayor Magee will speak at both performances in support of better pictures. The public will be given its first chance to see this the greatest of all Griffith's masterpieces beginning Monday afternoon, April 7.

"America" is the throbbing romance of the mighty loves and surging passions of the American Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country in this manner.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the pulsating love story which runs through the glorious romance like a thread of gold. The historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

"America" in which practically every figure of Revolutionary history appears, covers the period of the ride of Paul Revere—which the severest critics of the New York and Boston papers unanimously agree is the most thrilling thing ever seen on the screen—to the first inauguration of George Washington.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton—whom Griffith says is destined to become the greatest and most popular leading man of filmland—Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack and Erville Alderson head the cast of 36 principals. United States army soldiers and descendants of prominent Revolutionary families were used as "extras."

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/2/24

Star of "America," Griffith's Photoplay, Coming to the Pitt

Carol Dempster.

GRIFFITH PRAISES NEW LEADING MAN

Says His "Perfect Lover" Will Have Brilliant Career In Films

A second and greater Valentino a new "great lover" of the screen has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Has Made Many Stars

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and minuteman, who later becomes a captain of Morgan's Rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/2/24

"America," David Wark Griffith's newest and most ambitious historical photographic spectacle, built around the early sacrifices of American patriots, comes to the Pitt next week with Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in the cast.

New Britain-Conn Herald 4/3/24

IT HAS TO BE NOTED

When a man who, a few years ago according to popular report, was riding over the country in "side-door Pullmans," or, to avoid the vernacular of the hobo, in freight cars—when such a man is offered a contract to cover a period of two years and which involves no particular effort on his part, his remuneration to be a million dollars, the fact or report simply has to be noted and that is all there is to it. The man is no longer a hobo, a tramp pugilist glad to "out up his duke" for a comparative few dollars. He has learned how to use those fists at his so well that he stands before the world as the hold fighter with his fists of any living man. The demand to see him in return, or otherwise for that matter, is so great that no true or false reports concerning his alleged evasion of the draft or any other [illegible] contract, can make much of an impression upon that demand. He is offered a million dollars to appear in the motion pictures, so the state goes to us which in two years nearly become so in the champion pugilist of the world and because the picture and their enough people to see it to make it worth a million dollars to promoters of the picture.

And the somewhat fantastic part of the thing is that undoubtedly the man who put the million dollars under Dempsey's feet in the beginning.

[illegible]

Boston Telegram April 2 1924

VIRTUE AND VIRTUE'S NEMESIS

Carol Dempster, as Nancy Montague, and Lionel Barrymore, as [illegible]ale of the American Revolution now at the Majestic. Butler, who out[illegible]ndians the Indians in savagery, pursues pretty Nancy with his atten[illegible]ions, until Neil Hamilton puts an end to it by [illegible] an end to the [illegible]aptain.

AMUSEMENTS — AMUSEMENTS

Nashville (Tenn) Banner 4/3/24

ARE YOU Discouraged?

Griffith Saw His First Play at 18.

David W. Griffith decided what his life work should be, but he had to alter his plans many times and undergo severe hardships on the way to attainment.

As a boy in La Grange, Ky., he listened in wonder to stories read by his sister, and resolved to be a great writer. At 18 he left public school and started as a reporter on a Louisville newspaper.

Assigned to write theatrical notes, he saw a play for the first time in his life, and made up his mind to be a dramatist. Told that all great playwrights started as actors, he obtained a place with a stock company. The salary was small, and he ran an elevator in a dry goods store to provide a living.

Next he was an actor, with a traveling company, earning $18 a week in season. During one summer he sold books. In another between-season period he shoveled ore in the hold of a ship.

After several years on the road, he went to New York to be a writer. Success finally came with the acceptance of a poem, a story and a play. The play was rewritten but failed.

Seeing a moving picture, he resolved to be a scenario writer, prepared a picture play and sent it to a producing company, but never heard its fate. He wrtoe one for the Biograph company, and was paid $15. Then he decided to be a movie picture director.

Although he received little encouragement, he "hung around" the Biograph studio until the illness of a director gave him a chance. He introduced new ideas. The producers did not like them, but the public did, and for six years he made one and two-reel pictures.

At 33 he started making "The Birth of a Nation." Originally it was planned to cost $50,000, but expenses ran ten times that amount, and he had to spend all his time away from the studio raising money. Then came the fight to save the picture from suppression. That cost him $300,000 in attorneys' fees, but the success of the production made motion picture history.

Griffith made other large films, became rich, and now, at 42, is reported to have said he will make only two more big productions, then retire.

Tomorrow—Mrs. Sage's Thirty Years of Privation.

(Copyright, 1924, by C. C. Powell.)

Watertown (Mass) Sun 4/8/24

FIRST OF TICKETS TO "AMERICA" ARE AWARDED BY "SUN"

The first of the tickets to David W. Griffith's great film-play "America," at the Majestic theatre, which are being presented to girls and boys who write the best essays on the Colonial and Revolutionary periods in American history, were given out at the SUN office this week.

Those students in the Watertown schools who made the try for seats to "America" were pleasantly surprised in some instances when they were called up by the SUN or received tickets by mail.

Some of the prize-winning essays will be published by the SUN during the time for submitting essays is nearing the close. Be sure to get yours in soon as the contest closes the middle of April.

Essays that give new material regarding Watertown's part in the early history of the nation especially desired.

Houston (Tex) Post 4/3/24

The Day (Nye) April 2 1924

[illegible]

Denver (Colo) Herald 4/3/24

Denver (Colo) Post April 4 1924

The Day (Nye) April 2 1924

[illegible]

Boston Herald April 4 1924

The "Naked Truth Dinner" is the annual gathering of the Associated Motion Picture Advertisers. This year there will be no long after-dinner speeches but the following well known people will give five minute bedtime stories which same will be broadcast to Hollywood, England and places in between: Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Will Hays, David W. Griffith, Samual Rothafel, Rupert Hughes, A. M. Botsford, and a Big Personality whose name will be the Big Surprise of the festivity.

Cleveland (O) Plain Dealer April 3 1924

Notes and Comment.

D. W. Griffith is going to Italy to look over the celluloid situation there. If he decides to make a picture in Italy, he will please the Italians further by having Mary Pickford for his star. Italy is calling for Griffith and Mary. If Mary does yield to the demand (which of course she won't), it will be a reunion. D. W. was Mary's early mentor.

The story is reported to be covering [illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun April 3/24

COMING TO THE THEATERS.

America, the latest D. W. Griffith production which has just taken New York by storm and aptly described by one of the reviewers as "an echo of the shot heard 'round the world," will be the attraction at the Shubert-Pitt Theater twice daily beginning next Monday afternoon.

Albany (N.Y.) News April 3 1924

PHOTOPLAYS AND PLAYERS.

Mary Pickford directed by David W. Griffith. That is the proposal advanced by a group of Italian bankers who are ready to back a big picture with the most famous actress and director concerned in it. Griffith is to sail for Italy April 12, and Miss Pickford and Fairbanks sail on the same date, so the rumor hounds see something more than rumor in the [illegible]

Jewish Daily News April 4 1924

א גליל פון דער רעוואלוציע אין 44סטע סטריט טעאטער

אין 44סטע סטריט טעאטער וועלן איצט געווייזן א גליל פון דער גרויסער אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע. אין דעם גליל געהערן אנטייל א מאסע מענשען און פיעלע היסטאָרישע פאסיונען ווערן אויבערגעגעבן מיט אלע איינצעלהייטן מען איז'ן לייזונגס. דאס גליל איז געמאכט געווארען פון גרויסע, דעם באשאפער פון א בוירס און ע'נעשאן און אנדערע עפּעס מאכענדיג בילדער אמעריקא ווערט געיעגענט פאר דעם בעסטן גליל.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 4/4/24

NOTED PICTURE PRODUCER COMING TO PITTSBURGH.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH

HYLAN PONDERS NEW PARK AIR STIFLERS

Schools and Even a Movie Institute on List.

By INDUSTRIALIST.

"It begins to dawn on me that Mayor Hylan in his recklessness and lack of balance might even build public schools in Central park, unless interrupted.

"If he persists in his efforts to build up Central park with monuments, art centers and the like, I predict that Mayor Hylan will turn the entire public against him."

This was the statement last night of William Bradford Roulstone of the Parks and Playgrounds association which is attempting to save Central park.

Friend When Right.

Roulstone, addressing several hundred women at the American Women's organization, 220 Madison avenue, declared that he is a Democrat and has twice voted for Mayor Hylan. "But," he said, "that fact does not make me endorse this determination of his to throw open our city's precious treasure for real estate development."

Killed in the assembly, it is now thought the art bills will be worked into the new home rule measure.

Courtship of the favor of movie fans is seen in the new dodge to include a motion picture institute with the art buildings.

Earlier in the day Roulstone learned that Mary Pickford and David W. Griffith had called at City Hall to ask that a moving picture institute be added to the projected art and music centre. They were informed that the plan has Mayor Hylan's indorsement.

Doubts Seriousness.

"Do you mean to tell me that Mayor Hylan is seriously considering using Central park as a building site for educational purposes?" Roulstone asked.

"I can think of nothing that would improve our people more than a school for the movies which would develop the religious and educational features. But it must not be in Central park."

David W. Griffith Mary Pickford

Be sure to read editorial on page 15.

Read further about the Central Park controversy in the DAILY NEWS today.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chron-Tel April 4 1924

Gri[illegible]ming for [illegible]e of "America"

Note[illegible]er to Speak Sunday [illegible]nd Monday in Shubert Pitt Theater.

INTEREST [illegible] FILM GREAT

D. W. GRIFFITH.

D. W. Griffith, noted motion picture director and producer, is coming to Pittsburgh tomorrow and will appear at the Shubert Pitt Theater Sunday and Monday at the opening presentations of his newest picture, "America." Carol Dempster, who has the leading feminine role; Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack, actors in the film drama, will also appear with Mr. Griffith at the theater, though they will not arrive in the city until Sunday morning.

Mr. Griffith, the director of "The Birth of a Nation," "Way Down East," "Broken Blossoms," "Hearts Aflame" and many other great screen productions, will address audiences at matinee and night performances on both days. The Sunday afternoon show will be for members of the Pittsburgh Typographical Union and their families. That night the guests will include city officials, the board of public education, officers of the Sons and Daughters of the American Revolution, Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, Spanish-American War Veterans, G. A. R., Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts and the editorial staffs of Pittsburgh newspapers. The complimentary showings will be given with special permission of Mayor William A. Magee.

The two shows Monday will be regular performances for the public. Matinee and night performances will be given daily thereafter.

A committee of city officials has been [illegible] to arrange [illegible]

Jewish Daily News April 4 1924

גרויסע מענשען, א גרויסע צייט און א קאלאסאלער ספּעקטאקעל

[illegible]

Farm Life Spencer (Ind) April 1924

Farming and Fighting in '76.

Scenes from "America," D. W. Griffith's drama of the Revolution, filmed at the request of the D. A. R. The costumes and the farming methods portrayed in this patriotic picture are historically accurate. Photographs made especially for Farm Life.

Third U. S. Cavalry as Morgan Raiders

Off to the War, Leaving His Sweetheart at the Plow Handles

Neil Hamilton as a New England Farmer Minute Man

Charles Mack as a Virginia Farmer and Dandy

Paul Revere's Ride

Arthur Dewey, as George Washington the Gentleman Farmer

The Battle of Lexington

Cinema (Los Angeles) April 1924

"AMERICA"—D. W. Griffith, Inc. Directed by D. W. Griffith. Written by Robert W. Chambers.

CAST

Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton, Lucille La Verne and many others.

D. W. Griffith has again scaled the heights. The creator of "The Birth of a Nation" has been newly inspired in the case of this new picture, "America," dealing quite as forcefully and picturesquely with another period in the history of this country. There are the impressive outstanding incidents that one remembers so distinctly from his history book—the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, and Bunker Hill, and then, too, there is the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. One is taken to England to see Parliament in session with Pitt and Burke pleading for the colonies and then, in contrast, there are the long and dreary days of the suffering patriots at Valley Forge. The final scene is the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States and the young bridal couple, Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, daughter of an almost uncompromising adherent of King George, stands among the witnesses of the ceremony.

Almost at the very beginning of the picture there is stir. Griffith has done nothing finer than in his creation of the ride of Paul Revere. No one could withstand the appeal of that momentous ride as it is thrillingly set forth. The battle scenes are of a convincing realism and fighting with the Indians is of the hand-to-hand sort. The romantic features of the story are not forgotten, with Carol Dempster as the heroine and with Neil Hamilton as Nathan Holden. He is seen at the head of Continental soldiers fighting valiantly and it is as though one were actually living in the period that is presented. Each role is ably enacted and there are many participants in the action. Griffith is himself again.

Boston Advertiser April 1 1924

ALL IN SWEET ACCORD.

Rumors that United Artists, through which organization Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin and D. W. Griffith distribute their pictures, was headed for a breakup were set at rest by a statement signed by the four cinema notables mentioned above. The quartet is unanimously satisfied with their organization, according to the manifesto.

Philadelphia (Pa) Bulletin 4/1/24

SEEN ON THE SCREEN

Griffith's "America"—New Films at Stanley and Fox—Others

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a real masterpiece of the screen, literally swept the audience "off its feet" at the Chestnut Street Opera House last night. So high was the pitch of patriotic feeling raised by the picture that the audience applauded episode after episode.

No other photoplay since Griffith's "Birth of the Nation" reaches the heights attained by "America" from a patriotic and dramatic as well as artistic viewpoint.

The story deals with the thrilling, yet terrifying days preceding and during the Revolutionary war. No other director, it is evident, could have obtained the effect that Mr. Griffith has through depicting a series of battles and skirmishes along a slender love theme. The battles which usually are boring, set the blood tingling. The midnight ride of Paul Revere is the most thrilling episode of the picture and probably the superlative of any ever pictured. The story, furnished by Robert W. Chambers, has infinitely more interest than most motion pictures which have their plots unhampered by a necessity for facts. The scenes at Valley Forge, at Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, are probably some of the most dramatic ever filmed. The photography also is worthy of commendation.

In Neil Hamilton, Griffith has a new actor whose early rise to fame is evident in every episode. Carol Dempster, as the tender, loving Nancy Montague, reaches heights hitherto unattained. The love theme revolves about Hamilton, as Nathan Holden and Nancy. Decidedly the best bit of artistic portrayal of the picture is that of Charles Emmett Mack, as the foppish Tory son, who gladly gives his life to the Rebel cause. Lionel Barrymore is seen as the domineering, sneering, villanous Captain Walter Butler. Arthur Dewey is brilliant as George Washington but his efforts are overshadowed by those of Hamilton and Miss Dempster. Louis Wolheim, as one of Butler's subordinate, is so terrifying one can hardly believe such a character could exist.

Philadelphia (Pa) Eve Public Ledger 4/1/24

NEW GRIFFITH FILM, "AMERICA," IS SHOWN

Story of Revolution Is Screened at Chestnut Street Opera House

No man has really lived, says Kipling, until he has known war, women and horses, and it is with these three appeals to romance that the great director again drew back the curtains of history last night to tell in a simple yet soul-stirring manner that most dramatic of true stories, the American Revolution.

Although a love tale, refreshingly free from complications, is woven into the picture, the play is primarily a parade of historic episodes leading up to the surrender of Cornwallis.

From the ride of Paul Revere to the last gruesome massacre by Captain Butler and his horde of painted ravagers in Wyoming Valley, the warfare between the colonists and their British and Indian foes is traced with such scrupulous attention to actual fact that the dramatic force of the film is maintained without a single resort to artificial means.

As always, Griffith promises to "make" new stars with his latest presentation. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague, the haughty, yet tender and sincere daughter of a Virginia Tory, blossoms out as a full-fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown.

Neil Hamilton realizes imagination's portrait of the quiet, daring captain of Morgan's Rifles. Charles Emmet Mack, giving a whimsical interpretation of the foppish, but fearless son of luxury and Lionel Barrymore, scowling through the part of Captain Butler divide second honors in the cast.

It can be truly said of "America" that it is historically perfect, with a wealth of accurate revelations concerning the clothes, customs and condi-

Newark (N J) Star Eagle 4/1/24

[illegible] super-picture, "America," is being given its premier showing in New York and eliciting much enthusiasm, is to go to Italy shortly to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. Griffiths has been assured of ample financial support in his project. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy which was badly crippled by the war. Representatives of different governments and picture syndicates in Europe have been trying for years to induce Griffiths to make an outstanding picture of their particular nation.

N Y Telegraph April 1 1924

ITALY WANTS Mary Pickford to appear in a film that D. W. Griffith may make in that country.

Advices received from Rome state that announcement that the American producer was to come to that city to confer with a syndicate of bankers over the feasibility of a great motion pictfire production which would rehabilitate the industry has excited great interest. The various newspapers have played it up and have praised the enterprise of the syndicate. Naturally, also the newspapers and their readers are perfectly willing to advise and suggest methods and means of bringing this about.

Inasmuch as the announcement of the Griffith visit came almost at the same time as that saying that Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford were to sail for a long vacation trip on the Continent, the two facts have been hooked up to the extent that many of the Italians want Miss Pickford chosen as the American star.

Griffith and his party were out of the city yesterday and could not be reached and Miss Pickford had engagements which prevented her from answering any questions. It was learned, however, that Mr. Griffith has postponed his sailing from April 2 to April 12 and will depart on the same steamship as the two stars. Mr. Serrao, the representative of the Italian Syndicate, will also be a passenger on the same ship. He would not say yesterday whether this fact had any significance.

Griffith and Miss Pickford are very g'd friends. He gave her her first job in motion pictures and directed her in the first picture in which her name stood out in the cast.

IN MY OPINION

By COLEMAN HILL

Telegraph

IN a year when American drama is making steady progress in a definite direction, showing every indication of gathering strength, the American movie continues to rehash the work of its yesteryear. The films which now rush across the screen are better than the 1924 mobs, because they contain a thousand additional persons; perhaps a camera trick has opened up a possibility that was not then developed; but for the most part, the screen has made no advance comparable to the betterment, since the war, of its sister arts of the theater and of fiction.

The new season has brought to New York three movies retailing at the $1.50 to $2 rate—that is, three productions which fill an entire evening in the telling, and are consequently told, not at recognized picture theaters, but across the stages of "legitimate" houses.

They are Griffith's America, Cecil DeMille's The Ten Commandments and Fairbanks' The Thief of Bagdad.

* * * * *

Woman Through the Ages

Would you know the stories which these pictures tell? Or should one say "the story"—for all three are concerned with the same situation? Here are a trio of photoplays which set forth the tale of the girl who had two lovers—one, who was good, being very good, and the other, since bad, being horrid.

Yet of necessity there is something more to these films than mere catch-phrase of a plot. For instance, one might trace in the successive periods shown the gradual emancipation of woman.

Take, for instance, the Fairbanks picture. Here a wonder-fantasy of the Arabian Nights, laid in the Near East at that period when Flying Carpets and Invisible Cloaks were commonplace, shows the lovely Princess beset by the customary two. When the wicked suitor is about to overcome her, and carry her off across the skies on his magic rug, does she struggle to be free for the arms of her truly beloved? She does not. She succumbs without resistance. Here is woman of the cave-man period.

Then comes the America of 1776, when demure heroine is torn between her love for handsome Dick Slater—we beg your pardon; we were thinking of The Liberty Boys of '76, which the Coleman Book Store sold, against our youth, every Saturday morning—her love, we should have said, for handsome Nathan Hamilton, officer in General Washington's forces, and the advances of the ruffianly Captain Walter Butler, of His Brittanic Majesty's army. Here is the Victorian woman, resisting the dastardly schemes of the villain, fighting with him, and finally freeing herself from his clutches.

Mark now the advance shown by Mr. DeMille in his most modern tale of The Ten Commandments. For Mary Leigh, the two-suitored piece de resistance of this contemporary menu, marries them both—though, of course, successively. Here at last is woman as she today commands the world.

* * * * *

Mr. Griffith Introduces Mr. Washington

The two-and-a-half-hour movie, like so many of its sisters of the spoken stage, has difficulty in being noteworthy throughout its length. Mr. Griffith's America alternately holds and releases the interest; his ride of Paul Revere in the first half aroused critical enthusiasm in New York, but to us was no more moving than the attack on the fort in the second. There are moments of great vividness and much beauty in the production; yet it nowhere lives up to the glamor which the name of Griffith has stirred in American hearts.

America is the story of the love between a girl of Virginia and a boy of Massachusetts in those days when both States fought at Princeton and at Yorktown. There is no question but that Mr. Griffith has made American history live before the eyes of his spectators; whether his portraiture is authentic, only the careful historian can say. We have a suspicion that the lily-whiteness of our own forces was not so guided as Mr. Griffith has made us believe. For the purposes of drama, perhaps, all can be forgiven.

* * * * *

Mr. De Mille Introduces Mr. Moses

The De Mille picture, like the others, has its moments. There is no drag during the splendid prologue, which depicts the flight of the Children of Israel from Egypt, into the wilderness, to the giving of the Commandments and the overthrow of the golden idol.

Here the camera has done its best work. There are splendid flashes of photography done in natural colors, and such magnificent trick work in the parting of the Red Sea that the amateur finds both his gasp and his breath. This is a film which should be seen, at least through the first half. The modern story of part two is good, as such things go, but can be screened without effort.

* * * * *

Mr. Fairbanks Introduces the Boom Pirates

Mr. Fairbanks has taken the theme of having what he considers to be fun of the pirates. The Thief of Bagdad is a fairy tale because of that theme, beginning in the opening part of Persia ruled by the Sultan of Bagdad. The production is a triumph for camera work and stage setting. Mr. Fairbanks does a good job.

Mark, Mark and Mary, the same name, same pirate, same camera, same [illegible] that is in the action, of course, the Mark and Mary is a Bagdad in the [illegible] of the Sultan of Persia. The production is a triumph for camera work and stage setting. Mr. Fairbanks does a good job.

[illegible]

[illegible]

Boston Post April 1 1924

Cleveland (Ohio) News April 2 1924

Democrat Herald (Ohio) April 1 1924

Herald April 2 1924

Los Angeles Examiner April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Post April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Telegram April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Herald April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Sunday Herald April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Sunday Herald April 1 1924

Bridgeport (Conn) Sunday

Los Angeles (Cal) News 4/2/24 — Franklin (Pa) News-Herald April 2 1924 — Springfield (O) Sun 4/2/24 — Boston American 4/3/24 — Elmira (N.Y.) Gazette 4/3/24 — N.Y. News April 4

IN REVIEW

A Great Question
Different Answers
Eight Big Experts
Four Solutions Vary

—By L. B. Fowler—

WHAT does the public want in the way of the stage and screen entertainment? Probably the best answer to that question is: No one knows but the public and the public doesn't know how to declare itself. Rather a peculiar situation.

Ask any ten persons associated in an executive capacity with the business of producing novels, stage plays, or motion pictures that question and you will receive ten different answers.

For example: George MacAdams of the New York Sunday Times was curious enough to select a group of eight experts on the subject—they were David Belasco, playwright-producer; D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost men connected with the motion picture industry; George M. Cohan, actor-playwright-producer; John Golden, producer of stage plays; Morris Gest, impresario; Harry Lauder, author-actor; Fannie Hurst, novelist, and Irving Berlin, song-writer-musical comedy producer.

One would naturally think that these people, who have achieved both fame and fortune, would have an understanding of the public's desires, yet they disagree.

* * *

"If I wanted to treat the theater as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, why, I could make more than a million a year," declares David Belasco.

* * * My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public a producer can only make a guess. * * * No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure."

"No one knows what the public wants," wisely states D. W. Griffith. "The public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food—one time he eats fish, another time meat—it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think anyone can be specific in answering the question, I believe people want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book, or go to the theater, or to the movies."

George M. Cohan remarks: "The present day audience is tough on rehash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

* * *

John Golden's answer to the question of "What does the people want?" was crisp and to the point: "To forget their troubles," says he. "They have plenty of dullness, plenty of troubles and problems in their own lives and they don't want more of the same thing in the theater.

"What the people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for—we are all natural born rooters.

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or screen, ought to begin AT its beginning and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have represented this fact. The story—sometimes it dinner party, more often a dance—is the central offender. Unknowingly the party allowed to the assumption that that's what makes the movie a 'movie-picture.' The party is all right if it is an essential step in the development of the story; but it is only one of and serves a purpose the whole message must have that to reach and get about the heart of the story going to end this you have had a theme to go on."

The Sun (Balto) April 2 1924

"AMERICA," COLOSSAL WAR FILM, TO HAVE BIG FREE SHOWING

"America," D. W. Griffith's colossal romance of the War of American Independence will have its first performance in this city next Sunday afternoon at 3:15 at the Pitt theater, when a special complimentary performance will be given for the benefit of the dramatic critics and the members of the Typographical union. At 8:15 the film will have its second showing before Mayor Magee, city officials, editorial staffs and other guests. Mayor Magee will speak at both performances in support of better pictures. The public will be given its first chance to see this the greatest of all Griffith's masterpieces beginning Monday afternoon, April 7.

"America" is the throbbing romance of the mighty loves and surging passions of the American Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country in this manner.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the pulsating love story which runs through the glorious romance like a thread of gold. The historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

"America" in which practically every figure of Revolutionary history appears, covers the period of the ride of Paul Revere—which the severest critics of the New York and Boston papers unanimously agree is the most thrilling thing ever seen on the screen—to the first inauguration of George Washington.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton—whom Griffith says is destined to become the greatest and most popular leading man of filmland—Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack and Erville Alderson head the cast of 36 principals. United States army soldiers and descendants of prominent Revolutionary families were used as "extras."

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/2/24

GRIFFITH PRAISES NEW LEADING MAN

Says His "Perfect Lover" Will Have Brilliant Career In Films

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Has Made Many Stars

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and romantic man, who lat becomes a captain of Morgan's Rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/2/24

"America," David Wark Griffith's newest and most ambitious historical photographic spectacle, built around the early sacrifices of American patriots, comes to the Pitt next week with Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in the cast.

New Britain-Conn Herald 4/3/24

Star of "America," Griffith's Photoplay, Coming to the Pitt

Carol Dempster.

IT HAS TO BE NOTED

When a man who, a few years ago according to popular report, was riding over the country in "side-door Pullmans," or, to avoid the vernacular of the hobo, in freight cars—when such a man is offered a contract to cover a period of two years and which demands no particular effort on his part, his conversation is to be a million dollars, the fact or report simply has to be noted and that is all there is to it. The man is no longer a hobo, a tramp pugilist glad to "cut up his dickers" for a comparatively few dollars. He has learned how to use those fists of his so well that he stands before the world as the hobo fighter with his fists of any living man. The demand to see him in action, of whom, for that matter, is so great that no true or false reports concerning his alleged conduct of the fruit or any other merchandise product, can make stock of his reputation equal that demand. He is offered a million dollars to appear in the moving pictures, so the story goes, to be taken in the ring, movie business is the champion pugilist of the world and because the stories are true enough people want to see it so much it makes a million dollars to promoters of the pictures.

And the amusement business pulls of the thing is that undoubtedly the man who put the million into sight deserve all the commission.

Now, we are to learn that the million dollars which we guessed a professional pugilist would be paid to take part in a moving picture show, is not paid to him. The story is false from the start. It is not true that he is paid a million dollars, or any other sum, for his services in the movies. The story is false in every detail. The man who is said to be paid a million dollars is not a professional pugilist. He is not

Farm Life Spencer (Ind) april 1924

Farming and Fighting in '76.

Scenes from "America," D. W. Griffith's drama of the Revolution, filmed at the request of the D. A. R. The costumes and the farming methods portrayed in this patriotic picture are historically accurate. Photographs made especially for Farm Life.

Cinema (Ore) April 1924

"AMERICA"—D. W. Griffith, Inc. Directed by D. W. Griffith. Written by Robert W. Chambers.

CAST

Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore, Neil Hamilton, Lucille La Verne and many others.

D. W. Griffith has again scaled the heights. The creator of "The Birth of a Nation" has been newly inspired in the case of this new picture, "America," dealing quite as forcefully and picturesquely with another period in the history of this country. There are the impressive outstanding incidents that one remembers so distinctly from his history book—the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington and Concord, and Bunker Hill, and then, too, there is the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. One is taken to England to see Parliament in session with Pitt and Burke pleading for the colonies and then, in contrast, there are the long and dreary days of the suffering patriots at Valley Forge. The final scene is the inauguration of George Washington as President of the United States and the young bridal couple, Nathan Holden and Nancy Montague, daughter of an almost uncompromising adherent of King George, stands among the witnesses of the ceremony.

Almost at the very beginning of the picture there is stir. Griffith has done nothing finer than in his creation of the ride of Paul Revere. No one could withstand the appeal of that momentous ride as it is thrillingly set forth. The battle scenes are of a convincing realism and fighting with the Indians is of the hand-to-hand sort. The romantic features of the story are not forgotten, with Carol Dempster as the heroine and with Neil Hamilton as Nathan Holden. He is seen at the head of Continental soldiers fighting valiantly and it is as though one were actually living in the period that is presented. Each role is ably enacted and there are many participants in the action. Griffith is himself again.

Philadelphia (Pa) Bulletin 4/1/24

SCREEN ON THE SCREEN

Griffith's "America"—New Films at Stanley and Fox—Others

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," a real masterpiece of the screen, literally swept the audience "off its feet" at the Chestnut Street Opera House last night. So high was the pitch of patriotic feeling raised by the picture that the audience applauded episode after episode.

No other photoplay since Griffith's "Birth of the Nation" reaches the heights attained by "America" from a patriotic and dramatic as well as artistic viewpoint.

The story deals with the thrilling, yet terrifying days preceding and during the Revolutionary war. No other director, it is evident, could have obtained the effect that Mr. Griffith has through depicting a series of battles and skirmishes along a slender love theme. The battles which usually are boring, set the blood tingling. The midnight ride of Paul Revere is the most thrilling episode of the picture and probably the superlative of any ever pictured. The story, furnished by Robert W. Chambers, has infinitely more interest than most motion pictures which have their plots unhampered by a necessity for facts. The scenes at Valley Forge, at Concord, Lexington and Bunker Hill, are probably some of the most dramatic ever filmed. The photography also is worthy of commendation.

In Neil Hamilton, Griffith has a new actor whose early rise to fame is evident in every episode. Carol Dempster, as the tender, loving Nancy Montague, reaches heights hitherto unattained. The love theme revolves about Hamilton, as Nathan Holden and Nancy. Decidedly the best bit of artistic portrayal of the picture is that of Charles Emmett Mack, as the foppish Tory son, who gladly gives his life to the Rebel cause. Lionel Barrymore is seen as the domineering, sneering, villanous Captain Walter Butler. Arthur Dewey is brilliant as George Washington but his efforts are overshadowed by those of Hamilton and Miss Dempster. Louis Wolheim, as one of Butler's subordinate, is so terrifying one can hardly believe such a character could exist.

Newark (N.J.) Star Eagle 4/1/24

D. W. Griffith's super-picture, "America," is being given its premier showing in New York and eliciting much enthusiasm, is to go to Italy shortly to confer with a syndicate of Italian financiers for an elaborate motion picture production to be made in that country. Griffith has been assured of ample financial support in his project. The object of the syndicate, it is understood, is to rehabilitate the motion picture industry of Italy which was badly crippled by the war. Representatives of different governments and picture syndicates in Europe have been trying for years to induce Griffith to make an outstanding picture of their particular nation.

Boston Advertiser April 1 1924

ALL IN SWEET ACCORD.

Rumors that United Artists, through which organization Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin and D. W. Griffith distribute their pictures, was headed for a breakup were set at rest by a statement signed by the four cinema notables mentioned above. The quartet is unanimously satisfied with their organization, according to the manifesto.

Philadelphia (Pa) Eve Public Ledger 4/1/24

NEW GRIFFITH FILM, "AMERICA," IS SHOWN

Story of Revolution Is Screened at Chestnut Street Opera House

No man has really lived, says Kipling, until he has known war, women and horses, and it is with these three appeals to romance that the great director again drew back the curtains of history last night to tell in a simple yet soul-stirring manner that most dramatic of true stories, the American Revolution.

Although a love tale, refreshingly free from complications, is woven into the picture, the play is primarily a parade of historic episodes leading up to the surrender of Cornwallis.

From the ride of Paul Revere to the last gruesome massacre by Captain Butler and his horde of painted ravagers in Wyoming Valley, the warfare between the colonists and their British and Indian foes is traced with such scrupulous attention to actual fact that the dramatic force of the film is maintained without a single resort to artificial means.

As always, Griffith promises to "make" new stars with his latest presentation. Carol Dempster as Nancy Montague, the haughty, yet tender and sincere daughter of a Virginia Tory, blossoms out as a full-fledged actress with capabilities that were unknown.

Neil Hamilton realizes imagination's portrait of the quiet, daring captain of Morgan's Rifles. Charles Emmet Mack, giving a whimsical interpretation of the foppish, but fearless son of luxury and Lionel Barrymore, scowling through the part of Captain Butler divide second honors in the cast.

It can be truly said of "America" that it is historically perfect, with a wealth of accurate revelations concerning the clothes, customs and condi-

My Telegraph April 1 1924

ITALY [illegible] Mary Pickford to appear in a film that D. W. Griffith may make in this country.

Advices received from Rome state that announcement that the American producer was to come to that city to confer with a syndicate of bankers over the feasibility of a great motion picture production which would rehabilitate the industry has excited great interest. The various newspapers have played it up and have praised the enterprise of the syndicate. Naturally, also the newspapers and their readers are perfectly willing to advise and suggest methods and means of bringing this about.

Inasmuch as the announcement of the Griffith visit came almost at the same time as that saying that Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford were to sail for a long vacation trip on the Continent, the two facts have been hooked up to the extent that many of the Italians want Miss Pickford chosen as the American star.

Griffith and his party were out of the city yesterday and could not be reached and Miss Pickford had engagements which prevented her from answering any questions. It was learned, however, that Mr. Griffith has postponed his sailing from April 2 to April 12 and will depart on the same steamship as the two stars. Mr. Serrao, the representative of the Italian syndicate, will also be a passenger on the same ship. He would not say yesterday whether this fact had any significance.

Griffith and Miss Pickford are very old friends. He gave her her first job in motion pictures and directed her in the first picture in which her name stood out in the cast.

IN MY OPINION

By COLEMAN HILL

Telegraph

IN a year when American drama is making steady progress in a definite direction, showing every indication of gathering strength, the American movie continues to rehash the work of its yesteryear. The films which now rush across the screen are better than the 1923 mobs, because they contain thousand additional persons; perhaps a new camera trick has opened up a possibility that was not then developed; but for the most part, the screen has made no advance comparable to the betterment, since the war, of its sister arts of the theater and of fiction.

The new season has brought to New York three movies retailing at the $1.50 to $2 rate—that is, three productions which fill an entire evening in the telling, and are consequently told, not at recognized picture theaters, but across the stages of "legitimate" houses.

They are Griffith's America, Cecil DeMille's The Ten Commandments and Fairbanks' The Thief of Bagdad.

* * * * *

Woman Through the Ages

Would you know the stories which these pictures tell? Or should one say "the story"—for all three are concerned with the self same situation? Here are a trio of photoplays which set forth the tale of the girl who had two lovers—one, who was good, being very good, and the other, since bad, being horrid.

Yet of necessity there is something more to these films than mere catch-phrase of a plot. For instance, one might trace in the successive periods shown the gradual emancipation of woman.

Take, for instance, the Fairbanks picture. Here a wonder-fantasy of the Arabian Nights, laid in the Near East at that period when Flying Carpets and Invisible Cloaks were commonplace, shows the lovely Princess beset by the customary two. When the wicked suitor is about to overcome her, and carry her off across the skies on his magic rug, does she struggle to be free for the arms of her truly beloved? She does not. She succumbs without resistance. Here is woman of the cave-man period.

Then comes the America of 1776, when demure heroine is torn between her love for handsome Dick Slater—we beg your pardon; we were thinking of The Liberty Boys of '76, which the Coleman Book Store sold, against our youth, every Saturday morning—her love, we should have said, for handsome Nathan Hamilton, officer in General Washington's forces, and the advances of the ruffianly Captain Walter Butler, of His Brittanic Majesty's army. Here is the Victorian woman, resisting the dastardly schemes of the villain, fighting with him, and finally freeing herself from his clutches.

Mark now the advance shown by Mr. De Mille in his most modern tale of The Ten Commandments. For Mary Leigh, the two-suitored piece de resistance of this contemporary memo, marries them both—though, of course, successively. Here at last is woman as she today commands the world.

* * * * *

Mr. Griffith Introduces Mr. Washington

The two-and-a-half-hour movie, like so many of its sisters of the spoken stage, has difficulty in being noteworthy throughout its length. Mr. Griffith's America alternately holds and releases the interest; his ride of Paul Revere in the first half aroused critical enthusiasm in New York, but to us was no more moving than the attack on the fort in the second. There are moments of great vividness and much beauty in the production; yet it nowhere lives up to the glamor which the name of Griffith has stirred in American hearts.

America is the story of the love between a girl of Virginia and a boy of Massachusetts in those days when both States fought at Princeton and at Yorktown. There is no question but that Mr. Griffith has made American history live before the eyes of his spectators; whether his portraiture is authentic, only the careful historian can say. We have a suspicion that the lily-whiteness of our own forces was not so guided as Mr. Griffith has made us believe. For the purposes of drama, perhaps, all can be forgiven.

* * * * *

Mr. De Mille Introduces Mr. Moses

The De Mille picture, like the others, has its moments. There is no drag during the splendid procession, which depicts the flight of the Children of Israel from Egypt, into the wilderness, to the giving of the Commandments and the overthrow of the golden idol.

Here the camera has done its best work. There are splendid flashes of photography done in natural colors, and such magnificent trick work in the parting of the Red Sea that the spectator holds both his breath and his breath. This is a film which must be seen, at least through the first half. The modern story of girl torn in twain as such things go not seek to succeed, although started.

* * * * *

Mr. Fairbanks Introduces the Boom Doctor

Mr. Fairbanks has taken the honor of being used his camera to the limit of the photoplay. The Thief of Bagdad is a delightful invasion of that realm legitimate to the screen and yet there should be no doubt of the success of the picture. The production is a bigger for screen wide and deep. Mr. Fairbanks plays it a gay thief.

Here, then, and there, this same author has shown such superior imagination that it is the pity. Of course, there are those who remember and there and a few others in that knowledge of the world of the Middle Ages, in the jungles of the Middle Ages, in the jungles of the Middle Ages, in the jungles

Los Angeles (Cal) News 4/2/24 — Franklin (Pa) News-Herald April 2 1924 — Springfield (O) Sun 4/2/24 — Boston American 4/3/24 — Elmira (N.Y.) Gazette 4/3/24 — N.Y. News April 4

IN REVIEW

A Great Question
Different Answers
Eight Big Experts
Four Solutions Vary

—By L. B. Fowler—

WHAT does the public want in the way of the stage and screen entertainment? Probably the best answer to that question is: No one knows but the public and the public doesn't know how to declare itself. Rather a peculiar situation.

Ask any ten persons associated in an executive capacity with the business of producing novels, stage plays, or motion pictures that question and you will receive ten different answers.

For example: George MacAdams of the New York Sunday Times was curious enough to select a group of eight experts on the subject—they were David Belasco, playwright-producer; D. W. Griffith, one of the foremost men connected with the motion picture industry; George M. Cohan, actor-playwright-producer; John Golden, producer of stage plays; Morris Gest, impresario; Harry Lauder, author-actor; Fannie Hurst, novelist, and Irving Berlin, song-writer-musical comedy producer.

One would naturally think that these people, who have achieved both fame and fortune, would have an understanding of the public's desires, yet they disagree.

* * *

"If I wanted to treat the theater as a commercial enterprise, if I wanted to be a tradesman offering for sale only such goods as I know the public will buy, why, I could make more than a million a year," declares David Belasco.

* * * My experience has been that the public will accept anything if it is interesting, appealing. That is a general statement. When the problem narrows down to a specific play, it is very difficult to prophesy whether or not it will hit the popular fancy. Before a play is submitted to the public a producer can only make a guess. * * * No producer intentionally risks a play he thinks will be a failure."

"No one knows what the public wants," wisely states D. W. Griffith. "The public's desire for entertainment is like a man's desire for food—one time he eats fish, another time meat—it's all a question of mood.

"But while I do not think anyone can be specific in answering the question, I believe people want to have their dreams visualized. It is simply to get an ideal projection of themselves that people read a book, or go to the theater, or to the movies."

George M. Cohan remarks: "The present day audience is tough on rehash. I think the movies have had a lot to do with this. The people have seen so much of the obvious in the movies that they're fed up. But give them any little subtlety, anything you don't pour out like molasses, and they'll ask for more."

* * *

John Golden's answer to the question of "What does the people want?" was crisp and to the point: "To forget their troubles," says he. "They have plenty of dullness, plenty of troubles and problems in their own lives and they don't want more of the same thing in the theater.

"What the people want is clean laughter, clean love and something that's right to root for—we are all natural born rooters.

"A play or a movie succeeds because it has a story to tell. The story, whether it is presented on the stage or screen, ought to begin AT its beginning and travel straight to its end.

"Many movie directors do not seem to have appreciated this fact. The third—sometimes a dinner party, more often a dance—is the favorite diversion. Unfortunately the party adjourns to the intermission and 'that's what makes the movie a 'reel picture.' The party to all intents is to be enjoyed, not as the development of the story, but as a cute way to get words a party for three dances and then try to make out that since the thread of the story started in and then the lovers found it doesn't have to go on."

The Board Members and the [illegible] Society and the Boy Scouts of America [illegible] to which the [illegible] is to be given [illegible] Monday, the 14th day of April, [illegible] the Pittsburgh Post Graduate Hospital, Bank and Sixth streets, Pittsburgh, Pa., [illegible] Pittsburgh Post Graduate Hospital [illegible] Pittsburgh Post Graduate Hospital [illegible] Pittsburgh Post Graduate Hospital [illegible]

"AMERICA," COLOSSAL WAR FILM, TO HAVE BIG FREE SHOWING

"America," D. W. Griffith's colossal romance of the War of American Independence will have its first performance in this city next Sunday afternoon at 3:15 at the Pitt theater, when a special complimentary performance will be given for the benefit of the dramatic critics and the members of the Typographical union. At 8:15 the film will have its second showing before Mayor Magee, city officials, editorial staffs and other guests. Mayor Magee will speak at both performances in support of better pictures. The public will be given its first chance to see this the greatest of all Griffith's masterpieces beginning Monday afternoon, April 7.

"America" is the throbbing romance of the mighty loyes and surging passions of the American Revolution, made by Griffith for the Daughters of the American Revolution, who wished to signalize the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country in this manner.

Robert W. Chambers wrote the pulsating love story which runs through the glorious romance like a thread of gold. The historical arrangement was made by John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships."

"America" in which practically every figure of Revolutionary history appears, covers the period of the ride of Paul Revere—which the severest critics of the New York and Boston papers unanimously agree is the most thrilling thing ever seen on the screen—to the first inauguration of George Washington.

Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton—whom Griffith says is destined to become the greatest and most popular leading man of filmland—Lionel Barrymore, Charles Mack and Erville Alderson head the cast of 36 principals. United States army soldiers and descendants of prominent Revolutionary families were used as "extras."

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/2/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/2/24

Star of "America," Griffith's Photoplay, Coming to the Pitt

Carol Dempster.

GRIFFITH PRAISES NEW LEADING MAN

Says His "Perfect Lover" Will Have Brilliant Career In Films

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage, is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Has Made Many Stars

Although Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae Marsh, and many other present day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never had a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies through the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and minute man, who lat becomes a captain of Morgan's Rangers, and leads the charge which saved thousands of lives at Fort Sacrifice.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/2/24

"America," David Wark Griffith's newest and most ambitious historical photographic spectacle, built around the early sacrifices of American patriots, comes to the Pitt next week with Lionel Barrymore, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in the cast.

New Britain (Conn) Herald 4/3/24

IT HAS TO BE NOTED

When a man who, a few years ago according to popular report, was riding over the country in "side-door pullmans," or, to avoid the vernacular of the hobo, in freight cars—when such a man is offered a contract to cover a period of two years and which involves no particular effort on his part, his remuneration to be a million dollars, the fact or report simply has to be noted and that is all there is to it. The man is no longer a hobo, a tramp pugilist glad to "cut up his dinner" for a comparatively few dollars. He has learned how to use those fists of his so well that he stands before the world as the best fighter with his fists of any living man. The demand to see him in action, or wherever for that matter, is so great that no true or false reports concerning his alleged conduct of the draft of one million men should contain, can make much of an impression upon that demand. He is about a million dollars richer in the deadly pastime in which he is the champion, and now comes people to see it to make it worth a million dollars to promoters of the pastime.

And the amusement business pulse of the nation is not indicative the case, for the nation who make money as the promoters.

How many will be much disturbed that the condition which is now [illegible] the condition which will permit a professional pugilist who has come from the ranks to have such a position in life, such a position as to make such a million dollars, such a position as to be able to command such a price for his services, such a position as to be able to command such a price for his services, such a position as to be able to command such a price for his services

Times 4/4/24

WANT SITE IN PARK FOR MOVIE COLLEGE

Mary Pickford Persuades City Chamberlain of Need; Mayor's Approval Is Sought.

PLAN AROUSES ROULSTONE

Declares He Will Block Any Such Move—Anti-Invasion Federation May Be Formed Today.

Mary Pickford persuaded City Chamberlain Philip Berolzheimer within twenty-five minutes, yesterday, to add a "motion picture university" to his rapidly growing scheme to embellish Central Park with buildings, including a $15,000,000 music and art centre. Mr. Berolzheimer was so impressed by the plan of the screen actress that he went with her from his office in the Municipal Building to call on Mayor Hylan, presumably to ask his approval. But the Mayor was out.

Other developments in the movements for and against building projects involving the seizure of sites in Central Park, included a vote by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York condemning the proposed art centre, a formal protest from the Mendelssohn Glee Club, and announcement of a conference to be held today to consider the formation of a federation of all organizations opposed to park invasion.

Announcement that the City Chamberlain had approved the motion picture university project was made in an announcement given out from his office which, in part, follows:

"Miss Sophie Irene Loeb, the well-known welfare worker, accompanied Miss Mary Pickford and D. W. Griffith to see the Chamberlain and the Mayor at the City Hall to urge that in the establishment of the music and art centre the city include in the buildings a building for the preservation of the very highest in motion pictures. Miss Pickford says:

"'It has been the dream of my life that a great university should be developed in order to give to our youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of motion pictures. Had I such an opportunity when I began as a child it would have made my career much quicker and more easily attained.

Help for Young People.

"'And I bespeak for those young people who have no opportunity and little chance of such expression to have the city government get behind them and aid them in this connection. Already many times when these young people have an opportunity presented to them their chance for development and for attaining any high position is lessened because no one is there to push them forward. The government of the city being behind them, this municipality will stimulate the very highest and best in an industry in which every man, woman and child is intensely interested.

"'Furthermore, the motion picture theatre is the poor man's friend and what better could the City of New York do than to create in this art centre a building that would have in its curriculum the development of this art which we are trying so hard to further.'"

The statement quotes D. W. Griffith as saying that the proposed motion picture university would not only aid the advancement of the picture art but furnish instruction "relieved of the tedium of the ordinary cultural courses," and that through motion picture instruction much could be accomplished in a short time which required years before the advent of the new art.

Miss Loeb announced after the visit that the City Chamberlain was thoroughly in accord with the idea of a "movie college," which she said would be constructed and operated by the city. "It would be a great thing for New York," she said. "It would provide an opportunity for a great many starving souls to show their talent right in their home city."

Efforts to have Mr. Berolzheimer explain how far he would go in the development of the motion picture university along with his industrial art school, opera house, picture gallery and other institutions proposed for Central Park met with no success. He referred to the statement issued from his office and refused to add to it.

Not in Park, Says Roulstone

When told of the new proposal, W. B. Roulstone, counsel of the Parks and Playgrounds association, said:—

"All the Mary Pickfords and D. W. Griffiths will never get their motion picture theaters and schools in Central Park. I will undertake to keep all the motion picture theaters out of the park as well as any other kind of theatrical or educational institutions.

"I think Miss Pickford is to be congratulated for her interest in the public, and she should be encouraged to build the motion picture university. I think that the idea is all right, because I think the day is coming when motion pictures will be the most powerful influence in matters of education. Miss Pickford is a far-sighted prophetess when she advocates a motion picture university, and she is young enough to be able to count upon seeing it in her lifetime, but she will never see it in Central Park in my lifetime. I am especially pleased to realize that her interest has been awakened in the educational value of moving pictures as against her heretofore too devoted interest in the theatrical side of the motion picture game.

"The time is close at hand when the schools will all be using motion pictures. In view of the fact that nearly 90 per cent of our mental impressions are through the sensation of sight as against about 10 per cent of impressions of all other senses combined, the importance of visual education is apparent and cannot be over-estimated. Therefore Miss Pickford is to be congratulated on being apparently the first of the moving picture stars to see the development and importance of education by moving pictures. And I congratulate her on her conception of a motion picture university, but as I stated before, not in Central Park."

---

be prevented by legal action. It certainly would destroy the integrity of the Park and would be an opening wedge for future encroachments. * * *

"Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York is opposed to bills S. 1284 and A. 1258 introduced in the Legislature authorizing an art centre in Central Park, and is opposed to any similar measure authorizing an art centre or any other project which shall be inconsistent with the idea upon which the Park was founded, or which shall detract from its present condition and natural character; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Service in the metropolitan district or other delegates from the Chamber shall be authorized to appear at hearings and take other action deemed desirable to carry out the conclusions of this report and resolution."

The Board of Directors of the Parks and Playgrounds Association will hold a conference at the Downtown Association at noon today to consider plans for a city-wide federation of approximately seventy-five civic, business, political and charitable organizations opposed to the use of park sites for any building projects.

Topeka (Kan) Journal 4/4/24

SUGGESTS MOVIE UNIVERSITY

Mary Pickford Would Place It in New York City.

New York, April 4.—A plan to include a moving picture university in the proposed Central park art center, sponsored by Mary Pickford, who with D. W. Griffith, yesterday visited City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, has met with the chamberlain's approval, it was stated today.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give American youth the best opportunity for serious consideration in the matter of moving pictures and to "stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

Oswego (N Y) Times 4/4/24

Mary Pickford Back of Move To Start Moving Picture Univ. In N. Y.

NEW YORK, April 4.—A plan to include a motion picture university in Central Park art centre, proposed by Mary Pickford who with D. W. Griffith, yesterday visited City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, has met with the chamberlain's approval, it is stated.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give American youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of moving pictures and "to stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

Rochester (N Y) Journal 4/4/24

MOVIE UNIVERSITY PLAN IS FAVORED

By Associated Press

NEW YORK, Apr. 4.—A plan to include a motion picture university in Central Park Art Center, proposed by Mary Pickford, who with D. W. Griffith, visited City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, has met with the chamberlain's approval, it is stated.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give the American youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of moving pictures and "to stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

Boston Globe 4/4/24

MOVIE UNIVERSITY FOR CENTRAL PARK

Mary Pickford's Proposal Favored by N Y Official

Cincinnati (O) Times Star April 4 1924

HAS A PLAN FOR "MOVIE" UNIVERSITY

Portland (Me) Press Herald April 4 1924

Loan To Make Griffith's "America" Bears 30 Per Cent Interest, He Says

Bankers Hesitate To Finance Motion Picture Productions And Exact Unusual Rates—Many "Super Films" Drugs On Market

Of late some producers have emphasized the finanacial outlay involved in their productions, and in a number of cases the figures given out were staggering. There were days when $100,000 was a huge sum to spend on a production, but we have had million-dollar pictures, and quite recently "The Ten Commandments," on which Cecil B. De Mille is said to have spent nearly $2,000,000. Apropos of this cost of production and the borrowing of money, we went over to see David Wark Griffith, who consented to talk on the subject, although he is a believer in the artistic worth of the picture and not in favor of exploiting its cost. He is known by his colleagues to be an artist who studies the desires of the public, and not a business man.

As it happened, we interrupted Mr. Griffith at a moment when he was going over the orchestration of "America." He was actually telling the orchestra in la-da-das what he wanted, but in his usual good-natured way he kept the appointment he had made with us.

With him it is always a fight between gold and art when making a production, and, curiously enough, new angles concerning his work were revealed in the course of the interview. We had heard a good deal about borrowing money for the purpose of producing pictures, and were aware that some well-known stars not only manage to get amounts at a not unusual rate of interest, but pay themselves huge salaries while they are working on the films, which is consented to by the banks or the financiers. We also knew that a little while before "America" was finished Mr. Griffith had to borrow more money, for which he was charged the apparently exorbitant interest of 30 per cent.

30 Per Cent Interest

Mr. Griffith admitted that he had been forced to pay this high rate of interest, and he explained that it was not unusual, taking into consideration the risk the lenders took in advancing money on a production. He said that it never would have been difficult to obtain the usual interest on their money in a venture without any risk. But in a film production there is usually a great risk, as one never can tell whether a picture will be successful.

"The Birth of a Nation," Mr. Griffith's great film success of years ago, met with instant favor, but there are others of his productions that are slow in bringing in the money. It so happened, however, that Mr. Griffith's financial interest in "The Birth of a Nation" was quite small. One man, who afterward reaped a fortune of nearly $750,000 from "The Birth of a Nation," was willing at one time to dispose of his share of the film for $10,000.

Another picture which was a speedy hit was "Way Down East," which has not only been a marvelous success in this country, but also in England and other parts of the world. However, before the interest on the money advanced has been paid, and the cost of distribution, it is a long while before the producer begins to reap any financial benefits from his months of concentrated work.

"Orphans of the Storm" is a slow-moving film in the market, and "Intolerance" is said to have been partly handicapped on its presentation at an inopportune period. "One Exciting Night" cannot be judged properly so far, any more than "The White Rose," the former cost about $700,000 and the latter about $600,000. The expense attached to the producing of "America," Mr. Griffith's last picture, which is now running in the Forty-Fourth Street Theater, is in the neighborhood of $1,300,000.

Failures Costly

Mr. Griffith emphasized the point that at such cost no picture maker could afford to make failures, as there would come a time when he would not be able to borrow money and would have to cease his producing.

"Nobody is sure about a picture," observed Mr. Griffith. "One may think that it is good, but whether it is going to meet popular favor is always problematical. 'America' has opened with success in New York and Boston. I did have an idea that this picture would go well, but really only after trial exhibitions in small towns. I am always in trepidation before a picture is presented. In the small town where we first showed 'America' I was more sanguine about it when the audience arose in their seats and howled with excitement at Paul Revere's ride. I then knew that it had a chance.

"A man producing a picture has got to do his utmost to make as certain as he possibly can that the investors are going to get back their money. The business end has its notion of commercial or popular appeal, and it stands to reason that they have to be humored. You have the costs of some film productions, and can therefore get an idea of the fortunes risked. In stage productions they spend from $5,000 to $25,000, and they do not have to pay the players during the rehearsals.

"I live for my work. It is a pleasure to me. I am wrapped up in it while it is going on. Nevertheless, at every thought of the great risk a red light comes up before me. You must please the majority with a film production. As a matter of personal opinion, I believe that with the right sort of picture one can please most people. I am opposed to the idea that one type of picture has to be made for highbrows and another for the great mass of people. If your picture is really good, I believe it will please everybody. Remember Kipling's lines: 'The Colonel's lady and Judy O'Grady are sisters under their skins.'"

One interesting statement which Mr. Griffith dropped casually was to the effect that he must produce big pictures. They are expected of him, and if for the sake of economy he makes an ordinary type of program picture, no matter how well it is produced, it will be disappointing to many thousands who expect big things when Griffith's name is attached to a film. He declared, with emphatic modesty, that what motion picture enthusiasts all over the country want from him is something on the order of "America."

It is the general opinion that this producer, who to the average man who goes and sees one of his pictures is a wealthy genius, is one of the few in the motion picture industry who sacrifices gold for the sake of his art. He has had many successes and is considered without a peer in the direction of really big productions, but he loves his work so much that quite often he sacrifices his own chances of financial success to pay the piper, and therefore those who reap the real benefit of his labors are the men with capital who have been willing to gamble on a Griffith production.

Telegraph April 4 1924

"FILM UNIVERSITY" NEW BRIGHT IDEA

With Schools of Journalism as Horrible Example, City Gets Art Center Plan.

PROPOSED AS AN ANNEX

As last a plan has been devised to divert the hordes of film-struck Suckers from invading Hollywood. The plan is as simple and as sure of success that the only wonder is why it hasn't been thought of before.

With the growth of promotion of academic study and specialty training in schools and universities, and having in view the success of schools of journalism, the film capital has proposed to the Municipal Art Commission of New York that the city establish a film university in the Central Park Art Center, to be known as the Film University, and to be an annex to the Hollywood institution.

The idea is that the film university would be a warning example to the film-struck youth of the country, just as the schools of journalism are a warning example to the would-be newspaper men and women.

The film university would be a place where the film-struck could be taught the ABC of the film business, and be saved the expense of a trip to Hollywood.

THE BUNKER HILL Scene from "AMERICA" at the 44th St. THEATRE

EMMETT MACK in "AMERICA" at the MAJESTIC

my Post april 5 1924

Boston Telegram 4/5/24

Baltimore (Md) Jewish Forward 4/

Post april 5/24

'AMERICA' COMING TO ACADEMY NEXT WEEK

"America," D. W. Griffith's photodramatic epic of revolutionary days, will be shown at the Academy of Music on Monday, April 14.

It will reintroduce to local theatergoers Miss Carol Dempster.

In this unusual picture, made for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the sesquicentennial of our struggle for liberty, Miss Dempster has the only female role, and in consequence much of the burden falls upon her slender shoulders. Reports show that those slender shoulders bear the heavy burden with both ease and grace.

To say Miss Dempster has the only female role is not strictly true, for Lucille LaVerne, at present starring in "Sun-Up" on Broadway, who has appeared in every one of Griffith's productions, hearing of the production of "America," visited the Griffith studios and insisted on having a "bit," offering her services free.

As a result Griffith wrote in a short scene in which Miss LaVerne and Miss Dempster appear together—a scene which is said to be one of the most touching in the entire picture.

Screen News Hollywood (Cal) april 5 1924

ווארום ענגלישען טעאטער

פון ב. מארוסין

פארשפלונג אין נעוארק

„אמעריקא", א פיאר

מיר, פרוים אין א מענש וואס האט
ליעבט ווארטיל. ער מאכט נים קיין בעל
ער פון איין מענשען, צי זיין איין-שר
בילד, נאר פון א גאנץ וועלט מיט א
מאל און פון א גאנצען פעריאד. דעם
מבצע האט ער שוין אראפגע-
נאמען אויפ'ן לייוועגס אין זיין בילד
„די בורדס און איי נייטשאן", נעבען וועל-
כן בילד די נעער און די ליבעראלען
מלל האבען נעפונען וואס אויסצוזע-
ען. איצט האט ער אונז נעגעבען די
אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע אין א ניי
ריזיגן בילד „אמעריקא".

דאס ווערק צייגען דעם הינען גרונד
פון דער אמעריקאנער רעוואלוציע, דאס
נעבען פון די קאלאניסטען, זייער באצי-
הונג צו ענגלאנד, און ווי שווי זיי זיינען
געווען צו דעם באוואוסטזיין פון
דלכסשטענדיגקייט. די באסטאן טהי
פארטי, דאס מאהרען פון פאול ריוויר,
אמרים הענרי'ס ארויסרופ „גיב מיר פרייהייט
אדער גיב מיר דעם טויט" און דער מי-
ליטערישער קאמף פאר באפרייאונג ביז
דער אינאגוראציע פון פרעזידענט וואַ-
שינגטאן, די און א רייהע אנדערע איב-
ערגעגעבען ווערען אריינגעפירט אין דעם
בילד.

נאך די אלע „אונטערזוכונגען" אין
וואשינגטאן איז א שטיקעל טרייסט אז
בייסטיגער אפרוה צו זעהן דאס בילד
„אמעריקא", וואו דאס וואס זאל ווי
דאס בעסטע אין העכסטע פון אמעריקע
זאל זיין פארגעשטעלט. די נייע היסטא
ריזער וועלען האבען וואס אויסצוזעצ
נעבען דעם בילד. זיי וועלען דערין גע-
פינען דעם נאאיוועז סאן, וואס מיר ליי
גען אין די היסטאריע ביכלאך פון דעם
זיבעטען גרייזר פאבליק סקול, אבער פאר
דער נייסטיגער רייפסייט וועלען דאך
איינגעגעליך די פואוויס נים נעפאלכט.

עס וועט אויך אביסעל לערנען דער
עוועווער רו געשיכטע פון דעם וויכטיג-
סטען פעריאד אין דער אמעריקאנער
געשיכטע.

נעשטעלט אין עס אזוי גרויס און
שטארק ווי אלע בילדער פון זו. גריפיס,
מיט וועלכען ער איז באריומט.

Screen News Hollywood (Cal) april 5 1924

David Wark Griffith has sailed from New York bound for Italy, where he will consult with a syndicate which proposes backing him in the making of a great photodramatic spectacle in Rome, the idea of the Italians capitalists being to thus take a potential step in the direction of essaying to rehabilitate the film industry in their country. And, when they selected D. W., they surely picked the champion "rehabilitator" of them all. Incidentally, it will be an excellent opportunity for the great director to rehabilitate his fortune, recently attacked extensively by the failure of the eastern public to support his latest spectacle, "America," anything like they should.

my Exhibitors Trade Review april 5 1924

Houston (Texas) Post 4/5/24

Worcester (Mass) Telegram 4/5/24

Mary Pickford's Plan for Movie College Is Favored in New York

NEW YORK, April 4.—A plan to include a moving picture university in an art center in Central Park, proposed by Mary Pickford who with D. W. Griffith, yesterday visited City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, had met with the chamberlain's approval, it is stated.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give to American youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of moving pictures and "to stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

Mary Pickford Urges Movie 'College' in N. Y.

Associated Press Report.

NEW YORK, April 4.—A plan to include a motion picture university in the proposed Central Park Art center, sponsored by Mary Pickford, who with D. W. Griffith, yesterday visited City Chamberlain Berolzheimer, has met with the chamberlain's approval, it was stated today.

Miss Pickford said it had been the dream of her life that a great university should be developed to give to American youth the best opportunity for serious education in the matter of moving pictures and "to stimulate the highest and the best" in the industry.

NEIL HAMILTON, the altogether fine and inspiring Nathan Holden of Griffith's "America," is to play the juvenile lead in Famous Players' "The Mountebank," in which Ernest Torrence and Anna Q. Nilsson have the featured roles. We are all set right now to see something out of the usual with Torrence and Hamilton in the same team. Torrence has played in thirteen pictures, and is firmly intrenched as one of the great character screen artists, easily the peer of the best. Young Hamilton "arrived" in smashing fashion in "America," but as yet he is known only to a comparatively small part of the vast picturegoing public.

Hartford (Conn) Times april 5 1924

Camden (N J) Courier 4/5/24

John [illegible] Pell, who made the historical arrangement of "America," for D. W. Griffith, visited many sites of Revolutionary War happenings in the course of his work. He spent many days at Valley Forge delving into history and the result of his efforts is seen in important details of the presentation of "America" as it is shown at the Chestnut Street

Hartford (Conn) Times 4/5/24

"AMERICA" EPIC OF REVOLUTION

D. W. Griffith's Masterpiece to Be Shown at Parsons'.

Heralded by enthusiastic New York reviewers as one of the outstanding screen masterpieces of all time, D. W. Griffith's epic of the war of American independence, "America," will have its Hartford premiere at Parsons' theater beginning Monday evening, April 14. The presentation of what is described as the great director's greatest artistic achievement promises to be the most important motion picture event of the year.

Telling its immortal story in scenes of thrilling sequence, "America" waves a banner of beautiful romantic screen message of America's high adventure. David W. Griffith's inspired direction has given the picture the distinction of a work of art and he holds one in a vise-like grip with his overwhelming sweep in the scenes building to the climax.

Graphically picturing many of the thrilling scenes of America's struggle for independence, taken on the exact spots of the action, "America" is conceived and executed as only a Griffith can, and is charged with patriotic charm and exquisite tone and quality. The picture was made for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the sesquicentennial of America's struggle for liberty.

The engagement is for one week, with performances twice daily after the premiere Monday evening.

Harlem (N.Y.C.) 4/6/24 Home News

It now [illegible] W. Griffith [illegible] addition to the country to confer with [illegible] dicate of Roman bankers on the feasibility of a large motion picture production which would rehabilitate the industry, the Italian public to [illegible] circus of our sending Mary Pickford to appear in any film Griffith may make. The various newspapers of Italy have played up to the idea, while [illegible] the enterprise of the syndicate. Neither Mr. Griffith nor Mary [illegible] have put themselves on record with either yes or no, but the fact is known that the director, the star and the representative of the Italian syndicate are all listed to sail for Europe on the same ship, April 12.

my Telegraph 4/6/24

Boston Traveler Moving Picture world 4/5/24

Boston American april 5 1924

"America" Continues

At the Majestic Theatre, David Wark Griffith's latest photodrama, "America," continues to be a attraction. It is a stirring historical romance of the American revolution.

The picture world has produced no one so able in inspiring actors, kindling emotion, stealing patriotism, touching hearts, in short, in filming melodrama as Mr. Griffith. The midnight ride of Paul Revere, the heroic minute when men fired the shot at Lexington that echoed 'round the world, the fateful battles at Concord bridge and Bunker Hill, the terrible sacrifices at Valley Forge, the surrender of Cornwallis, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington army, the Houses of Parliament with William Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for the colonists, and the beautiful scenery of the country in which early American history was to be making, are the bring features of this film story.

Matinee and evening performances are now

D. W. Griffith to Italy

Will Confer With Italian Syndicate on Making Series There

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from an Italian syndicate of bankers to go to Rome, Italy, to confer on the production of a series of motion pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the Mayors Cabinet of Rome.

This action on the part of the banking group has the consent and full approval of the Italian government. In a statement issued by representatives of the syndicate this assertion is made:

"We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward restoring the picture-making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

While abroad Mr. Griffith may visit Russia to confer regarding possibilities of making a picture there.

Fargo (N.D.) Forum 4/5/24

Fargo (N.D.) Forum 4/5/24

Toledo (Ohio) Blade 4/5/24

GRIFFITH HAD FAMILIAR TROUBLES

Creator of "Close-Up" and "Fade Out" Laughed at in the Old Days

David Wark Griffith, whose romantic picture of the trials that brought America into being, is a native of Kentucky, colloquially called a corncracker. That's where, you know, the grass is green enough to be Irish, and the girls are pretty and the horses gamble and high step.

D. W. Griffith

There is no place like it for giving cause and relish for trying. David had a lot of the salt of life thrust down in the cause of the real Kentuckian, before he got his strength for a chance to stand about, grow and win like a tender fig capsule, for a high head. Although the Bible says, man cannot add to his stature, he does that to go to Louisville to school.

[illegible]

NEW ENGLAND RELICS FIGURE IN "AMERICA"

New England agreed to open its treasures of Revolutionary relics to motion pictures, when D. W. Griffith went to Boston with 150 members of his staff and players to photograph the incidents of the early war on the actual sites for "America," which comes to Parsons' theater April 14 for an engagement of one week.

By arrangement with several of the historical societies including in particular the Lexington Historical society, the weapons, drums, costumes, vehicles, etc., used during the war were used in the action. It is the first time these articles have ever been shown to the world through motion pictures.

Battle scenes were taken on the famous Lexington common, where the historic "shot heard round the world" was fired. Buckman's tavern and the Adams house where John Hancock and John Adams were sleeping on the night the British came, were used as settings.

The action, under Griffith's direction, continued along the road to Concord where the battle of the bridge was fought. Griffith's intention that all scenes should be taken on actual sites, excepting those where inconvenience prohibit, was carried out at a tremendous expense.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun april 5 1924

THE AMERICA OF PITT

[illegible]

Fargo (N.D.) Forum 4/5/24

[illegible]

Toledo (Ohio) Blade 4/5/24

Lincoln University Planned in Gotham

[illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chronicle-Telegraph april 5 1924

Wilkesburg (Pa) Times

Harrisburg (Pa) Telegraph

Philadelphia Pa Record april 6 1924

CHARACTERS OF PROMINENCE IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S NEW PRODUCTION

Sonntagsblatt der New Yorker Volkszeitung, 6. April 19

"AMERIKA."

Im 44. Str. Theater ist aber eines der grossartigsten Filmdramen eingezogen, die wir je hier auf der Bühne sahen. Es ist "America", eine Darbietung von D. W. Griffith. Es bringt die Geschichte dieses Landes in sehr schönen Bildern und hineinverknüpft ist die poetische Liebesgeschichte einer schönen Aristokratin aus Virginia mit einem Expressreiter aus Boston. Das Stück beginnt mit der Zeit, als die Amerikaner für die Engländer Kriegsschulden zahlen mussten, ohne eine Stimme in der Regierung zu haben. Die grossen Konflikte folgen, die sehr aufregend sind. Sie wurden an den Plätzen der Schlachten mit Hilfe der Armee aufgenommen. Mehr als tausend Schauspieler sind beschäftigt. Unter ihnen: Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Lionel Barrymore, Lucille LaVerne, Louis Wolheim und Charles Mack. Dieses Filmdrama wird in keinem anderen Theater gezeigt werden.

Es wird vorzüglich gespielt, sowohl von den einzelnen Schauspielern, als auch in den grossen Volks- und Massenszenen, die voll Leben sind und wirklich aufregend wirken. Carol Dempster als Nancy spielt bewunderungswürdig echt und fein. Neil Hamilton als Holden ist sehr sympathisch und eine schöne Erscheinung. Lionel Barrymore als Captain Butler, Louis Wolheim als brutaler Captain Hare, Arthur Dewey als Washington — überhaupt alle leisten Ungewöhnliches. Das hochinteressante Drama bringt die amerikanische Geschichte bis zur Zeit als Washington Präsident der Vereinigten Staaten wurde. Es ist fortwährend spannend und erschütternd.

C. Rupp

Volks-Zeitung
German 4/6/24

Carol Dempster in "America."

Denver (Colo) Times 4/6/24

'America' Film Sales Promise to Set Record.

Ticket sales for the presentation of "America," D. W. Griffith's latest screen masterpiece, which will open at the Broadway theater Monday night, promise to break all records, according to indications at the advance sale, which has been opened this week.

The showing will give Denver residents their first opportunity to see the latest Griffith film, which has been pronounced by experts to be perfect, both from a historical and an entertainment viewpoint. As several of his previous successes, Griffith's "America" has a historical setting.

Carol Dempster, who portrays one of the title roles in the film, has been lauded for her work in the production. Her role gives opportunity for expression of the deeper shades of character acting.

The film is based on the time of the revolution and includes detailed, historically perfect scenes of the battles at Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, in addition to the war scenes the Indian variety is depicted.

In the filming of the scenes invaluable Revolutionary war relics were used, including drums, flintlocks, powder horns and other equipment actually carried thru the war by the American soldiers.

Colonial Belle

GISE CAROL DEMPSTER.
The Photo a Picture Role in D. W. Griffith's "America," to be shown at the Broadway Theater, beginning Monday night.

Philadelphia (Pa) North-American April 6 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press April 6 1924

Philadelphia Public Ledger 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press April 6 1924

NEW GRIFFITH MOVIE SHOWS EVERYDAY LIFE OF LEXINGTON IN 1775

PROMINENT ACTORS IN MOVIE AT PITT.

Boston Herald 4/6/24

Boston Advertiser April 6 1924

Lionel Barrymore and Carol Dempster in "America" Majestic

Carol Dempster "America" Majestic

ning, April 20, for the benefit

Philadelphia Record April 6 1924

Some New Productions of Screen and Stage

By HERMAN L. DIECK

IT must have been a labor of love—the creation of "America," that masterly screen presentation of D. W. Griffith. He is one of the most ardent of patriots and his love for all that typifies America—the freest and happiest of nations—was an inspiration resulting in the consummation of a masterpiece. For "America" is just that. There is in it a lesson for every man, woman or child who is apt to take too lightly the boon of freedom that has its foundation in the Constitution. That there will be better Americans as a result of seeing this testimonial to the founders of the United States there can be no doubt. "America" is a tribute to the self-sacrificing men and women who dared to resist the oppression of a foreign government and the lesson is in their fortitude— an unyielding devotion to a great cause.

Griffith is a poet. Some assert that he is a sentimentalist. But those who have seen his pictures are aware that beneath a seeming sentimentalism there is a strong dramatic sense. An ability to get to the heart of a subject is dominant. Griffith endows his screen puppets with tremendous significance. They are individuals and yet they have integral part in the evolving of a tale that shall expound a principle. To his aid he brings all the resources of the motion picture world. His photography is unexcelled; there are illuminate incidents that create an atmosphere and all along the story builds to a climax that is the more effective in that it is inevitable from his exposition. Romance and fact are wedded. "The Birth of A Nation" showed this and through it all there was a big theme—greater than were the individuals in their relation to each other in the story.

So it is in "America." He has as background for the tale of Robert W. Chambers, which is the connecting link for historic happenings, that most significant war of the western world—the American Revolution. It would have been a fastidious task to give to the screen merely a series of events showing the heroic men and women who were responsible for the country's birth. Such a picture would have appealed but the smaller human element of great times would have been lacking. Such a picture would be akin to a history in which the important events were set down in the general, but the personal, the human, were omitted. There are instances in this picture where the personal is subordinate to the general, but there are others in which the personal is so intimately in the general that their influence is the mainspring of momentous events. Griffith has taken the story of Chambers and has woven into it the story of the Revolution as it might be in a generation or so after the conclusion of the war.

Thus we have the story of Nancy Montague, who is loved by Captain Butler, who is seen as the arch-villain of the story. That role is taken by Lionel Barrymore, who seems equally at home on stage and screen.

A protege of Griffith is in the leading feminine role. As a matter of fact, there is but one other feminine role in the story and that is of minor import. Carol Dempster has had splendid training for the screen, as she demonstrates in the finesse of her enactment. She is at times a pathetic creature in the bewilderment of her dread experiences, but, of course, it all comes out right in the end and, though she has lost father and mother, she has solace in the prospect of union with the man she loves. That role is played by Neil Hamilton. He is not familiar to many picture "fans," but he is assuredly of the type called "comer." He is manly and an ideal lover—at least that is what the girls assert. Charles Emmett Mack, as the brother of the girl, shows splendid qualities of histrionism. He, too, is likely to go far in attainment on the screen. Each historic character—George Washington, King George III, Thomas Jefferson, William Pitt, Samuel Adams, John Hancock—is admirably presented and there are other characters portrayed with skill by players who benefitted by the Griffith direction. No wonder, with such an array and with such masterly handling of individuals and of crowds that "America" has gone to the hearts of the people. It is an appeal to patriotism but not through sloganism. It makes one glad that he was born an American for his nation and he will be the more willing to sacrifice to the end that this nation may endure.

* * *

Lionel Barrymore, seen on the screen in "America," is here "in person" on the advertisements one. He is in "Laugh, Clown, Laugh!" which is an adaptation by David Belasco and Tom Cushing of an Italian play. It is a simple but affecting story that is told. A clown who for years has befriended a child left as orphan by a fatal accident of her father while walking tether, has grown to little manhood. The child grows fair, but he does not realize his manhood pass. Then, in his distorted manhood, he plots vengeance against the man who ruined his sweetheart. A lawyer man—a man who has many friends—blocks his path. The clown finally learns the truth and, realizing his manhood, he gives up his life in the service of his friends. The story is well told and the acting is good. Barrymore is a strong actor and he gives a strong portrayal of the clown. Irene Fenwick is seen as Simonetta. The part is not exacting and Miss Fenwick plays it satisfactorily.

* * *

"The Highwayman" is not at all about a "road agent" or even a city bandit. It deals with a self-sufficient chap who manages to outwit some landowners of Hungary and to carry off the betrothed of an elderly but domineering count. His "sickness" is what makes the young fellow a "highwayman." Joseph Schildkraut has that role and he fits well into it. It is not so interesting as was his part in "Lilom," but then it would not be easy to find an congenial a role just by leaving the desire to find it. Leon Bim, who is the original author of the play, was assisted in adaptation by Gladys Unger. The result is not wholly perfect. The "light parts" between heavy is the promise and it is not agreeable in one's home. But it ends on considerable sensational. However, this is not a complaint for in the final accounting The Boston Post said and the clown at night horrie away from his past. At least that is th ending of the play for this city. Repor has it that in New York there was a ending of the story in the suicide of th despairing buffoon. More impressive un doubtedly would that ending be, bu perhaps not "what the public wants."

"Laugh, Clown, Laugh!" is of valu for its opportunities for effective an affecting acting. Barrymore has achieve a notable bit of histrionism as the clown. The poignant grief of the man, his inherent goodness and his great nobility, show forth in the superb presentation by the star. However, the play is slight in story and Belasco and his fellow adapter were hard put to extend the action into three sufficiently interesting acts. Ian Keith, as the successful suitor, is the antithesis of the clown and the contrast in the outlook of the two men and in their characterization is marked. As stage creation the roles are memorable and each is well played. Irene Fenwick is seen as Simonetta. The part is not exacting and Miss Fenwick plays it satisfactorily.

* * *

"The Highwayman" is not at all about a "road agent" or even a city bandit. It deals with a self-sufficient chap who manages to outwit some landowners of Hungary and to carry off the betrothed of an elderly but domineering count. His "sickness" is what makes the young fellow a "highwayman." Joseph Schildkraut has that role and he fits well into it. It is not so interesting as was his part in "Lilom," but then it would not be easy to find an congenial a role just by leaving the desire to find it. Leon Bim, who is the original author of the play, was assisted in adaptation by Gladys Unger. The result is not wholly perfect. The "light parts" between heavy is the promise and it is not agreeable in one's home. But it ends on considerable sensational. However, this is not a complaint for in the final accounting The Boston Post said and the clown at night horrie away from his past. At least that is th ending of the play for this city. Repor has it that in New York there was a ending of the story in the suicide of th despairing buffoon. More impressive un doubtedly would that ending be, bu perhaps not "what the public wants."

"Laugh, Clown, Laugh!" is of valu for its opportunities for effective an affecting acting. Barrymore has achieve a notable bit of histrionism as the clown. The poignant grief of the man, his inherent goodness and his great nobility, show forth in the superb presentation by the star. However, the play is slight in story and Belasco and his fellow adapter were hard put to extend the action into three sufficiently interesting acts. Ian Keith, as the successful suitor, is the antithesis of the clown and the contrast in the outlook of the two men and in their characterization is marked. As stage creation the roles are memorable and each is well played. Irene Fenwick is seen as Simonetta. The part is not exacting and Miss Fenwick plays it satisfactorily.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 4/4/24

Philadelphia (Pa) North-American April 6 1924

Boston (Mass) Advertiser April 6 1924

GRIFFITH'S AMERICA ... FILM AT CHESTNUT

Griffith's Epic Has Perfect Villain

Boston Morning Globe april 6 1924

LEXINGTON HEIRLOOMS LOANED TO MAKE MOVING PICTURE ACCURATE

Even the Drum That Was Used in 1775 Was Beaten Again, First Time In More Than a Century

THE FIGHT ON LEXINGTON GREEN

The settings, and even the disposition of the troops, are based on the Sandham painting in the Lexington Town Hall. Buckman Tavern at the left, Old Meeting House in the middle and the Belfry on the right.

THE OLD BUCKMAN TAVERN

This is a careful reconstruction of the original, which is still standing close by the Green at Lexington

Now the guardians of historical [illegible] at Lexington brought them[illegible] to the point of permitting [illegible] treasures to figure in the [illegible] as they do in Griffith's "America" film, in a typical New England [illegible]

"It was characteristic of us on this Bunkerhill that we didn't wait for the idea at first," said Miss [illegible] Burchell, president of the Lexington Historical Society. "In the meeting the matter the other day.

"In fact, the very idea of using such a shrine as the Hancock-Clarke house as the locale for a motion picture caused a shiver of one down the spine of most of us. Lexington and its historic associations cannot be carried in so to be reproduced on the screen.

"So full's consent was a [illegible] the control the appearance of the Lexington Historical Society, the Hancock-Clarke and other [illegible] houses, the use of [illegible] national relics, and the services of [illegible] experts.

[illegible] plied, could add little to his vast knowledge of Lexington's early days.

"Griffith made the first scenes for 'America' at Lexington, reproducing the olden days so accurately that one cannot help being amazed. During the timing free one was made of the relics owned by the Lexington Historical Society.

"I think the greatest thrill of my life was the one I got when for the first time I viewed 'America,' the night of the film town of Lexington, as it was in 1775, springing into view on the silver-sheet gave me a sensation I shall never forget. I forgot that I was viewing a reproduction, both with [illegible] accuracy. I forgot that one of the actual children in the picture was my own. I stood in the aisle, and my tears started to most have started the cheers of the patrons sitting in [illegible]

"The original [illegible] I viewed the picture I am so in a most unusual sense, as upon having been that experience [illegible] of the particular of the [illegible] and some [illegible] to [illegible] work that I could not find one [illegible] Lexington and gave the screen in 'America' in the Boston Lexington [illegible] of the [illegible] and the Revolutionary [illegible] of their period are to be found.

[illegible] are kept, for the first time in years, and turned over to Griffith for use in his picture.

"The drum actually used at the Battle of Lexington, probably the most sacred musical instrument in American tradition, was beaten for the first time in more than a century.

"Flintlocks and powder horns which did deadly service on that historic day when 77 Americans attempted to stack the progress of 60 trained and tried grenadiers of King George III, were transferred to the screen, many of them by private families, who owned them against weapons as their most precious possessions.

"Groups [illegible] and fifers, [illegible] [illegible] made by [illegible] and the [illegible] [illegible] from [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] to the [illegible] [illegible] in the [illegible] of Griffith's [illegible] [illegible]

"[illegible] of Lexington's [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Griffith Tells of His Aims

He is a man who does not grow old. Griffith has all the enthusiasm of a youth. Not that he is old—he is far from that—but he has been so long in motion pictures that some of the glamour of it might be thought to have passed. But not so, as a few minutes' conversation disclosed.

"I wanted to put on 'America,' he declared, 'and I would have done it whether I thought it would make money or not. It is not because I am a rich man, and can afford to do such things, but only because I believe in my country, and want to do something to be helpful. That is what 'America' strives to do—the helpful thing. But it is not in a prosy way. The people do not want to have any one 'educate' them, and I am not the person who would attempt such a thing.

D. W. GRIFFITH

"What I have wanted to do is to give every one something sweet and lovable, and lovely, and at the same time to let every one know that the blessings we enjoy in this wonderful country have come thru the sacrifice of our forefathers—those sterling people who participated in the revolutionary war. What would be our condition today if we had not become a free and independent nation? Europe is in chaos, and millions are suffering and in want. Here we are happy and contented. Let us preserve our American institutions.

"We have had manifestations of evil in the conduct of affairs of state. They are not lightly to be dismissed. But what we need is the arousing of national conscience. There must be love of fellow men and we must be ready to sacrifice as did our forefathers for the good of the many. I believe in the integrity of the constitution of the United States. It is a noble document—a splendid creation upon which the happiness of the people rests. We should not tamper with that.

"I hope that Philadelphians often other day— last Sunday. It was most inspiring. We have a notion of the suffering of the brave men who wintered there so that our country might be free, but no one can visit that hallowed ground without feeling how wonderful was the devotion of those men to a patriotic cause.

"They could have saved themselves had they capitulated. But they would not give up—theirs was a sacred duty. The British in Philadelphia were having every comfort—warmth, good clothing, plenty of food and many luxuries. What a contrast! And how it all ended—gloriously, for the good of us all.

"I hope that Philadelphia often visit Valley Forge. It affects me as no other place of similar sort has affected me. Such devotion commands the admiration of all warm-blooded men and women.

"I would like to say a word too about the Rev. Dr. W. Herbert Burk, rector of the Memorial Chapel, at Valley Forge. He is doing a splendid work—not only in the building up of the church, but also in preserving historic records. His investigations and his research have given us much valuable information about the encampment, and that chapel is one of the most interesting places on our visit."

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 4/6/24

Happiness of Griffith Is His Work

Leading Motion Picture Director Is Repaid When His Productions Are Helpful to Humanity.

D. W. GRIFFITH

«АМЕРИКА» — В ТЕАТРЕ 44 УЛИЦЫ
The greatest success of "America"

В театре 44-ой ул. и Бродвея идет с необычайным успехом изв. национально-историческая картина по сюжету Гриффита — «Америка». Картина с необычайной яркостью и живостью знакомит читателей со всеми теми жертвами, которые пионеры американских полей принесли при создании своего государства. В картине любовная завязка переплелась с этой историческ. канвой, и смотрится она необычайно живо и легко.

Все театральн. критики Нью Йорка сошлись на признании ее самой удачнейшей картиной сезона. В картине занято более 10,000 артистов.

Baltimore (Md) American 4/6/24

AMERICAN FILM BEAUTIES IN ITALY WILL ENCOUNTER TASTE FOR PORTLY STARS

David Wark Griffith May Need All His Eloquence to Convince People That His Type of Girl Is Superior to 350-Pound Favorites—Norma Talmadge in "Secrets" Should Do Much to Keep Married Couples Together

By LOUELLA O. PARSONS.

NEW YORK, April 5.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH may have to use all his powers of persuasion to convince the Italian people that the much-admired Griffith type of girl is a proper film heroine. He may have to offer a little soap-box oratory to explain to the Italians that girls like Carol Dempster, Lillian Gish and Mae Marsh are preferable to a 350-pound star.

Not so much because ideas of pulchritude are a matter of geography,

If anyone should try and slip a 350-pound heroine over on Mr. Griffith, whose ideas of beauty run to the slim and graceful, it would take Mussolini and the whole Fascisti to keep him at work.

But Italy wants Mr. Griffith, and if "The Last Days of Pompeii" is made, we shall see a Nydia with beauty and youth and not a panting old woman. On the other hand Mr. Griffith knows Mark Antony and Caesar were not vamped by wrinkled, fat, old women. He makes "Antony and Cleopatra" can promise the lady who made Nile will be all the American

Denver (Colo) Post April 6 1924

Neil Hamilton, who scored a success in D. W. Griffith's "America," is playing a juvenile lead in "The Mountebank" which is being produced with Ernest Torrence and Wallace Reid in the cast.

Boston Post April 6 1924

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 6 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post April 6 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 6 1924

Elmira (N.Y.) Telegram 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 6 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 6 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/6/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 6 1924

Philadelphia (Pa) Inquirer Ap. 6/24

Rochester (N.Y.) American 4/6/24

Omaha (Neb) Bee April 6 1924

Omaha (Neb) World April 6 1924

Omaha (Neb) Bee April 6 1924

Omaha (Neb) World April 6 1924

Omaha (Neb) World April 6 1924

Omaha (Neb) World

St Paul (Minn) News 4/6/24

My Telegraph April 6, 1924

"AMERICA" HAS DEBUT IN EAST

Paul Revere's Ride the Big Thrill Event in New Griffith Film.

BY MAURICE HENLE.

NEW YORK, April 5.—D. W. Griffith brought his long-awaited picture, "America"—Series One: "The Sacrifice"—to the Forty-fourth Street theater a few nights ago. It is an accurate, faithful reproduction of those events that led to the birth of this country.

The faith Mr. Griffith kept with his public is in my mind the most complimentary thing one can say about this distinguished director.

Some months ago the Daughters of the American Revolution asked Griffith to make a picture of the Revolution. Griffith had had the same idea since his "The Birth of a Nation," and so their offer to give him their endorsement and help, if needed, met with instant action. The one thing they asked was that he should stick to facts, an admonition hardly necessary.

Well, Griffith "stuck to facts." From the very beginning the spectator senses it is no longer the 20th century. The spectator is living once more in the colonies. He catches the tenseness of the people he sees on the screen. He feels a rising anger within him against injustice. He knows something is going to happen.

Then Griffith plants his camera on the banks of the Charles river across from Old North church (he took as many scenes as possible on their exact location).

THEN PAUL REVERE.

It is nightfall and Paul Revere waits for the signal that will tell whether the British are coming by land or sea. Soon two burning spots glow from the far-off darkened tower.

And then commences the most dramatic episode this writer ever has seen on a screen. No mob scene, no band of blood-thirsty Indians. Just a lone rider astride a beautiful specimen of horse-flesh, tearing along a lonely moon-bathed road.

The outwitting by Revere of two British officers (an actual incident, according to history) was enough to send the first night audience to its feet.

Just one uncomfortable thought came to me concerning that ride. The roads over which the film Paul Revere rode looked like smooth macadam highways. I wondered if the real Revere had that much luck!

OTHER THRILLERS.

The midnight ride isn't the only thriller. Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill, are words that mean a lot to Americans. D. W. Griffith has accurately reproduced those events.

Through the picture runs the thread of a love tale. Nathan Holden (Neil Hamilton) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster) were chosen to supply the romance and they do their parts well. We can't reconcile ourselves to the absence of Lillian Gish from Griffith pictures, but Lillian's loss and Carol's here and that's that.

* * *

As the film was shown on opening night, it was too long, the superfluous part coming near the end. It seems Griffith places too much emphasis on the devilish activities of Capt. Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore), whose bloody acts kept the middle west in terror. Undoubtedly, there will be numerous cuts made.

Barrymore is splendid and so is Louis Wolheim as Butler's aide.

The photography was masterly. Griffith threw at times a sort of haze upon the picture, producing a softened, warm effect.

"AMERICA" GOES BIG IN PHILADELPHIA

D. W. Griffith and Stars Attending Opening Given Ovation by Public and City Officials.

STAR THEATRE IN EASTON A HIT

(Special Dispatch to The Morning Telegraph.)

PHILADELPHIA, April 5.

Probably no picture given premier presentation here in recent years opened under such auspicious circumstances as that of D. W. Griffith's latest, "America," at the Chestnut Street Opera House on Monday evening. In the audience were high city officials, officers of the various historical societies, educators and numerous others of prominence in the social and business life of the city. Griffith was on hand for the gala opening and brought with him, besides his executive force, two stars who gained prominence in the making of "America." They were Carol Dempster and Charles Emmett Mack, who occupied a box opposite to one occupied by Mayor Kendrick with his wife and party. When the audience was apprised of the fact that Miss Dempster and Mack were sitting in a box above them the stars were compelled to make numerous bows before the deafening applause was subdued. Griffith made a short speech and then called on Mayor Kendrick for a few words. The Mayor could hardly have been more laudatory, for in describing the picture which he had just seen he said it spelled greater Americanism and that in turn spelled a better world. Mrs. Albert L. Grey, wife of the general manager, and Mrs. Mack accompanied the party here and occupied the box with Miss Dempster.

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger April 6 1924

MAKING OF "AMERICA"

The making of "America," that newest D. W. Griffith film production which is at the Chestnut Street Opera House, came as a direct result of a suggestion of the Daughters of the American Revolution. In May of last year a letter was addressed to Will H. Hays inquiring why a film dealing with the Revolutionary War had not been undertaken. Mr. Hays at once turned over the letter to Mr. Griffith with the request that he comply with the suggestion. The director did not at once assent. He wanted to be sure that such a production could be made with historical accuracy and conviction and he also wanted to be sure that a tale to enthrall could be given to the screen with the Revolution as a background. One day spent in visiting the shrines of the Nation in Boston and vicinity was sufficient to convince Mr. Griffith, and it was not long before his cameras were actually at work upon the production.

The first undertaking was the ride of Paul Revere. That is a tremendously stirring incident of the picture. It required three weeks for filming. A spirited horse was chosen to make the ride, but the steed was such a fiery animal that nine riders were defeated before Harry J. Neill was engaged for the part of Paul Revere.

Wochen-Zeitung April 6 1924 My Catherine Gerdman

Phila (Pa) Public Ledger April 7 1924

NEW GRIFFITH FILM, "AMERICA," IS SHOWN

Production Is Screened at Chestnut Street Opera House

"AMERICA"

Jewish Daily News April 7 1924

LEXINGTON HEIRLOOMS LOANED TO MAKE MOVING PICTURE ACCURATE

Even the Drum That Was Used in 1775 Was Beaten Again, First Time In More Than a Century

THE FIGHT ON LEXINGTON GREEN

The settings, and even the disposition of the troops, are based on the Sandham painting in the Lexington Town Hall. Buckman Tavern at the left, Old Meeting House in the middle and the Belfry on the right.

THE OLD BUCKMAN TAVERN

This is a careful reconstruction of the original, which is still standing close by the Green at Lexington

How the guardians of historical treasures at Lexington brought themselves to the point of permitting those treasures to figure in the motion—as they do in Griffith's "America" film—is a typical New England tale.

"It was characteristic of us as New Englanders that we didn't warm up to the idea at first," said Edwin D. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society, in discussing the matter the other day.

"In fact, the very idea of using such a shrine as the Hancock-Clarke house as the locale for a motion picture caused a shiver to ride down the backs of most of us. Lexington and its historic associations caused too recent in us to be considered as the subject.

"Mr. Griffith's request was a large one. It wanted the cooperation of the Lexington Historical Society, the use of the Hancock-Clarke and other historic houses, the use of museum treasures, and the services of historical experts.

Paid Its Way Out

[illegible]

piled, could add little to his vast knowledge of Lexington's early days.

"Griffith made the first scenes for "America" at Lexington, reproducing the olden days so accurately that one cannot help being amazed. During the filming free use was made of the relics owned by the Lexington Historical Society.

"I think the greatest thrill of my life was the one I got when for the first time I viewed 'America,' the sight of the little town of Lexington, as it was in 1775, springing into view on the silver-sheet gave me a sensation I shall never forget. I forgot that I was viewing a reproduction, both with surprising accuracy; I forgot that one of the several children in the picture was my own. I lived in the past, and my heart pounded as most have pounded the hearts of the patriots back of '76.

"The second time I viewed the picture I did so in a most critical spirit, determined to note any that anachronism of the period of the traditions of the town, in the same impression. It needs refinement for my brothers, nearly work that I could not find one. The Lexington we saw upon the screen is Lexington in the actual temperament of its people in that it is the most patriotic, democratic period of that period and is to be believed.

Programs Lost for Company

[illegible]

are kept, for the first time in years, and turned over to Griffith for use in his picture.

"The drum actually used at the Battle of Lexington, probably the most sacred musical instrument to American tradition, was beaten for the first time in more than a century.

"Flintlocks and powder horns which did doughty service on that historic day when 77 Americans attempted to block the progress of 800 trained and tried grenadiers of King George III, were transferred to the screen, many of them by private families, who regard these ancient weapons as their most precious heirlooms.

"Relics letters and diaries, collected with rare care years previous made to spectacular, and the war materials great, were taken from public and private vaults to add the modern movement to help to the traditions of thrilling romantic history.

"The local patriotism of Lexington's inhabitants was quite natural in the original of the film. Thousands of persons had of mothers, fathers gave way to many patriots to offer and marvel throughout from the time of Revolutionary days, the time of the Civil War, and the time of the World War, in the only life and death struggle.

"A collection was made of pictures of Revolutionary relics, Patriots Hollow and other, the Revolutionary Lexington, and the Civil War, the Lexington Minutemen, and the Civil War, the Lexington Minutemen in the Civil War, the Lexington Minutemen in the World War, [illegible] THE WATERTOWN SUN, [illegible] Watertown, [illegible] Watertown, [illegible] and make the [illegible]

"SUN" WILL GIVE BOYS AND GIRLS 50 TICKETS A WEEK TO "AMERICA"

Boys and girls of Watertown!

Here's a good chance for you to earn, without much trouble—and right in line with your school work—a complimentary ticket to see perhaps the best motion picture ever made, at the best theatre in Boston—the Majestic. Just listen!

THE WATERTOWN SUN has made arrangements with David Wark Griffith's Boston manager so that each week from 25 to 50 Watertown school boys and girls can see Griffith's great picture "America," now showing at the Majestic Theatre.

This picture is a story of the American Revolution from the Battle of Lexington to the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. It shows the gathering of the Minutemen, the ride of Paul Revere, the Battle of Lexington, the Battle of Concord Bridge, the Battle of Bunker Hill, Washington's Army at Valley Forge, the conflicts with the Indians, the British Parliament, the British Court and King George III, the American Congresses and signing of the Declaration of Independence, the acceptance by Washington to command the Colonial troops, the stirring speeches and leadership of Washington, Samuel Adams, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson in the Colonies, and Edmund Burke and William Pitt in the British Parliament.

In fact we have here for the first time every major scene and act of the American Revolution—the greatest patriotic motion picture ever made—a picture endorsed by all educators who have seen it and which was made by Mr. Griffith at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. Griffith has been eight years making this picture, and even now he is continually making changes in it. So far it has been shown at only two places in the country—New York and Boston. It opened its run at the Majestic Theatre last week to a crowded and enthusiastic house, and will not be shown at any other theatre in New England this season.

Just Write a Short Essay

THE SUN will give 50 tickets a week to see this great picture on the sole condition that you—boys and girls—write a composition or essay on "Big Events in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country." This essay must not be over 400 words; if you can tell the story in fewer words so much the better, and the greater chance you stand of winning a ticket. The essay should state what part Watertown has taken in American history.

As you should know, boys and girls, Watertown played a very important part not only in the settlement of America, but in the events of the American Revolution. What events? What great men were here, right in our own town? What did Washington do here in Watertown? Paul Revere? Adams? Hancock? General Warren? French and others? What great Colonial Assemblies met here? What two congresses of Colonial Days were held here? [illegible] Do you know the Watertown Flag? Do you know the Watertown Flag? [illegible] THE WATERTOWN SUN [illegible] Watertown, [illegible] and make the [illegible] life-work, namely motion pictures that will make better citizens, better boys and girls and greater love for our country and its institutions.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH, Producer of "America"

Your essays, boys and girls, will be published in the SUN. Mr. Griffith will read every one of them. He will not only read your essays but also your criticisms of "America," after you have seen the picture. The SUN will publish the pictures of some of the boys and girls taking part, so if you have a picture of yourself, send it to the SUN with your essay.

Now, boys and girls of Watertown, "put your best foot forward"—AND GET BUSY. Remember that you hail from old Watertown, the "Mother Town" of New England; that here two Provincial Congresses met, and here the greatest men of the Revolution debated and took action which committed our country to the greatest events of all time. Here Washington addressed the patriots in stirring words; here President Coolidge's ancestors settled on their arrival from England.

We shall mail copies of the SUN containing your essays to Congressman Frederick W. Dallinger and to President Coolidge.

The Size of Your Essay

The 400-word essay the SUN wants you to write will take about 7 or 8 inches of space when printed in the SUN. Just measure off that amount of space now in your copy of THE WATERTOWN SUN and then cut your literary cloth to fit. Decide on your national points and your Watertown points, then write the story.

Remember that legibility, punctuation and grammar count, as well as your grasp of national history. The most powerful essays will be singled out. Make yours right to the point.

EVERY ESSAY MUST BE WRITTEN ON ONE SIDE OF THE PAPER ONLY. DO NOT WRITE ON THE BACK OF ANY OF YOUR SHEETS.

The SUN undertakes this contest because it endorses this great educational American picture. We are hoping that all of our Watertown homes and especially our clubs, churches and schools will cooperate to make this educational and patriotic event a success.

Many young people who afterward became famous and successful writers got their first inspiration in just this way. We remember that Mr. Palmer of the Palmer Publishing Co. of Boston, editor of "Education," a journal which goes all over the world, told our editor that he got his first idea of writing from a contest of this sort.

The values of the best essays submitted in the competition, Col. Charles M. Alston, Post Commander of the American Legion; Miss Lydia W. Masters, Librarian of the Free Public Library, and Principal Arthur Wheeler of the West Junior High School have volunteered to serve. We believe they are among the best-qualified persons of the town to act in such a capacity. Their submitting to this need have no fear, and boys will be congratulated and their essays will be properly judged.

Remember, boys and girls, for a little while you will receive a free ticket to the best theatre in Boston and get a glimpse of your country's history. Do your best and make the most of your opportunity.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times April 7 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 4/7/24

GRIFFITH'S 'AMERICA' PRAISED

MOVIE ACTR... ...ND DIRECTOR VISIT PITTSBURGH

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press. april 7 1924

GRIFFITH, SUPER-CREATOR, TALKS OF "AMERICA" AND A DREAMED-OF STEEL FILM

By Burt McMurtrie.

"A message to the American people, a reminder to those who sit ensconced in comfortable chairs, warmly clothed, well-fed and overly content, of the privations and ghastly horrors our forefathers suffered to establish this government, the greatest government in the world, one which we are today too prone to criticize, and to jog sluggish memories to the appreciation that should be manifest, such is the purpose of 'America.'"

It was David Wark Griffith speaking, greatest of all moving picture directors, and master-mind of the cinema, as we sat talking in the lounge of the Pitt theater last night prior to a private showing of the director's new masterpiece, a historical drama that is bound to sweep the nation with the same furore that the "Birth of a Nation" created some ten years ago. There is a tremendous personality to Griffith, one that grips you and dominates your auditor every second. Of medium height, prominent features, with eyes that are both cold and searching, and at the same time possess a humorous twinkle, Griffith is every inch the business man. He speaks with a firm, decisive manner, slow and commanding.

"I dreamed for years of a picture such as 'America,'" he said. "Eight years ago at the completion of 'The Birth of a Nation,' and its reception by the American people, I centered my ambition upon the production of a picture that would in some way teach a lesson, a lesson of appreciation and love for one's fellow man and above all, love for the flag. But it was work. It meant years of research. I started upon the picture at once. I do not mean the actual production but the task; that meant as much even as the actual filming that of getting accurate hisotrical foundation, one that would withstand the severest of criticism and would be accepted as THE American feature.

HEART INTEREST.

"'Intolerance,' 'Broken Blossoms,' 'Dream Street' and my other productions were all incidental. In none of them was my heart and interest so wrapped up as in this gigantic historical plm I was determined to put forth. In France, Germany and England there was nothing but strife. We entered the war. Everywhere was turmoil, dissatisfaction and continual complaining about present-day conditions. More and more the purpose of my picture became manifest and I was convinced of the necessity for a film that would bring back to the American public what the flag that now waves over our heads actually represents.

"There is no medium for reaching the public of such great import as is the motion picture field. Through this industry can be taught the greatest of lessons. The day of cheap flash productions is fast going. The picture of tomorrow will be a thing of art, of educational value and all of the qualities that mean improvement of the mind and higher class value.

"My surprise in conducting the research work was the magnitude of the incidents little stressed in our most popular histories, occurrences that were the basis of this nation, and yet the import attached to numerous other incidents which seemed trivial in comparison. To enumerate would take too long. A view of 'America,' will show you my point. I feel that Pittsburghers will be unusually impressed with this picture as it is the actual history of what took place in this city very many years ago. It was right on this location where this greatest industrial center of the world now stands that our forefathers gave their lives that such a city might some day be.

"Some day I shall come to Pittsburgh and produce a picture that will center about your vast steel mills. It will be an industrial spectacle, and should be as gigantic in the completion as the very industry is itself."

Mr. Griffith is most emphatic in his declaration that the day of a neutralized location for the taking of motion pictures is ended. "The man with brains and perception, aided by the improvements of the modern equipment can photograph a production in any locality," he says. "From this time on it will be a case of actual locales in the taking of pictures, and Pittsburgh will be as adaptable to the film as California."

ON WAY TO ITALY.

Mr. Griffith goes to Italy next week, upon the invitation of that government, where he will look over the field for production and the proposition of a huge financing firm to produce a picture that will explorate the country. It is a tribute to the art of the man and his accomplishments that such a government would realize the value of his directorship to such an extent.

"'America,'" he started—and then the strains of the orchestra from the pit above broke in, and he hastily added, "But come, you've had enough of talking to me, come up and see my picture and then you can see for yourself just what I mean, when I say it is the greatest work I have ever done, my 'dream' picture and my offering to the American nation!"

Every seat in the theater having long since been taken, we stood in the rear, watching the feature through parted curtains. Pittsburghers will have one thing to thank Mr. Griffith and his musical director for. It may be a patriotic picture to an extent, but they don't rouse the emotions with this showing at the Pitt playing all the national airs procurable. The music is national, but it is not the hackneyed kind that keeps one jumping up and down, wondering if he is patriotic or just numb. The musical score is, incidentally, beautiful and forms a magnificent background.

"America" is a masterpiece. That not cannot be denied. Not since the "Birth of a Nation," has anything approached it, and in the opinion of this reviewer it is even greater than that feature. It is an historical romance, authorized by Robert W. Chambers, with Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton the featured members, though by no means the only acceptable characterizations of the piece. As to the cast, it is well nigh perfect. When one catches such an artist as Lionel Barrymore playing a bit that is far from a lead, an impression of the general worth can be assumed. Barrymore's interpretation of the English regent, Hatley, is a wonderful piece of work.

There is the usual battle of the colonies, and the grandeur of the early Americans portrayed as only Griffith could picture it. The dances and pageant scenes are beyond carping.

EARLY MOTHER PICTURE.

The picture shows all sides and elements of the rule of England, the oppression of King George, going against the Boston colonist, the colonists against the Indians, the colonists against the English, the Tories against the patriots, the English against the French, the Tories against the Indians, the Tories against the English, the Tories against the Tories, the English against the English, the Indians against the Indians, the French against the French, the English against the French, the Indians against the English, the Indians against the French, the French against the Indians, the English against the Indians, the French against the English, the Indians against the Tories, the French against the Tories, the English against the Tories, the Tories against the Indians, the Tories against the French, the Tories

PAUL REVERE RODE INTO FAME ON APRIL 18, 1775
This and other action pictures of his historic midnight ride, in D. W. Griffith's "America," is "one of the most remarkable ever screened."

Nashville (Tenn) Tennessean 4/8/24

MEASURE MIND BY LENGTH OF LIMBS

Scientists Say Bodily Proportions Are Indication Of Power of Brain

If you have a small body and long arms and legs the chances are that you are highly intelligent and will find success in some kind of brain work.

If you have a large body and short arms and legs, brain work is probably not your forte, and you would do best to follow some manual trade, or at least a line of work requiring steadiness and accuracy rather than quickness of mind.

If you are of a normal type—that is, if your limbs are not disproportionately long or short in comparison with the size of your body—you may be either intelligent or unintelligent. Whether you are suited for brain work or manual labor cannot be told accurately from your bodily measurements.

These in effect are the conclusions science has reached as a result of the latest investigations in the field of physiological psychology, says Henry E. Garrett, Ph. D., of the department of psychology, Columbia University, writing in the May number of Popular Science Monthly. Recently, he declares, he and Dr. Sante Naccarati, of New York, specialist in nervous and mental diseases, conducted a test of this theory among about 300 students of Columbia University, and the results tended to show that a very definite relationship exists between bodily structure and intelligence, this despite the fact that no very unintelligent individuals would be found among a group of college students.

In the test the length of each man's limbs was obtained—the combined length of one arm and one leg. This figure was then divided by the volume of his body, the result indicating to what body type he belonged. This result was then compared with each man's tested intelligence as indicated by his class work and the standing obtained in standard psychological tests. Of the men examined, says Doctor Garrett, 76 per cent of the small-bodied, long-legged men, 40 per cent of the normal men, and 15 per cent of the large-bodied, short-legged men showed high intelligence.

"It is surprising," writes Doctor Garrett, "how thoroughly the conclusions reached in the test seem to be borne out in the case of well-known men. Henry Ford, John D. Rockefeller, General Pershing, Booth Tarkington, and David Wark Griffith might be named as the outstanding Americans of this generation in their particular fields. All of them are long-legged men with short bodies. Washington and Lincoln and Woodrow Wilson likewise were of this type. President Coolidge, the late President Harding, Andrew W. Mellon, Tesla, Marconi, the Wright Brothers, and a host of others are typically long-limbed men with small bodies.

"Edison belongs to the normal type. So did Theodore Roosevelt. So do David Belasco, Charles Evan Hughes and Elihu Root. The names of two other men occur to me—Jack Dempsey and Luis Angel Firpo. Not even their staunchest admirers would claim that they possess as much intelligence as any of the others I have mentioned. Both of them fall into the class of large-bodied short-legged men."

As to the scientific reason for the apparent relationship between bodily proportions and intelligence, Dr. Garrett says that the most tenable explanation is based on facts given by the study of the ductless glands, particularly the action of the thyroid gland in the neck. Activity or inactivity of this gland, he declares, influences both the body type and the intelligence with the results that he gives.

New York City Telegram + Mail April 10 1924

Boston Advertiser 4/10/24

Over the Garden Wall—Neil Hamilton and Carol Dempster in "America" (Majestic) in a pretty episode.

Portland Ore Press-Herald April 8 1924

"America," the new D. W. Griffith film, a remarkable visualization of many events in early American history, with some thrilling battle scenes, is in its second week at the Chestnut Street Opera House, and at the Aldine is continued the impressive story of Biblical and modern times, "The Ten Commandments." Both of these notable screen productions are shown afternoon and evening.

Italy wants Mary Pickford to appear in any film that D. W. Griffith may make in that country. Announcement that Italian financiers were bringing Griffith to Italy to confer about making a picture there aroused great attention from Italian publications and immediately a flood of suggestions anent American players were forthcoming.

Philadelphia (Pa) Bulletin 4/8/24

Indianapolis (Ind) Star 4/8/24

MINISTER FACING MANN ACT CHARGE TO GO TO ILLINOIS

Transfer of the Rev. Lewis Holloway of Attica, Ind., pastor of the United Brethren Church of Attica, from Indianapolis to Danville, Ill., to stand trial in the Federal court of the Eastern district of Illinois on a charge of violation of the Mann white slave act, will be made this week, on the issuance of an order yesterday by Federal Judge A. B. Anderson.

The Rev. Mr. Holloway was brought to Indianapolis about ten days ago after a warrant for his arrest had been received from the United States marshal at Danville. He is said to have taken a 15-year-old girl from Attica to Rossville, Ill., for immoral purposes.

LIFE OF LONG AGO REVEALED ON FILM

Life in Lexington, Mass., in 1775 was somewhat different from today, according to the scenes in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo-drama of the Revolution made for the D. A. R., which, according to President Edwin S. Worthen, of the Lexington Historical Society, is accurate to the smallest detail.

In Colonial days the tax on shoe leather was so high that even the daughters of the well to do farmers and villagers were accustomed to walk barefoot to the very edge of the town in order to save their footgear as much as possible.

It was quite an ordinary sight to see some well dressed young woman sitting on a big rock at the edge of the town putting on her dainty shoes after having tramped a mile or more barefoot.

In those days Buckman Tavern was the chief hostelry of the town, and the rich travellers on their way North or South, their splendid coaches attended by numerous negroes, would pull up there for refreshment for man and beast.

Outside the tavern was usually to be found a group of idlers—males, be it noted—smoking their long churchwarden clay pipes and discussing their neighbors' affairs.

The twelve mile journey to Boston was made on horseback as a rule, sometimes a whole family, father and mother and one or two children, piling on the back of some heavy, slow moving, but patient horse to make the trip.

In "America," now at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, Griffith has taken the opportunity to give a sort of panoramic view of the everyday life of the period in Lexington, as well as to show vividly the famous ride of Paul Revere and the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill.

Watertown (Mass) Sun April 10 1924

ALL ESSAYS MUST BE IN BY APRIL 15 FOR "AMERICA" TICKETS

Here is one of the bright Watertown girls who won tickets to David W. Griffith's great film-play, "America," now showing at the Majestic Theatre in Boston. Her name is Margaret Doyle and she lives with her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Doyle, at 44 Eliot Street. THE SUN is publishing Margaret's essay in this issue, along with essays submitted by other girls and boys of the town. If you other girls and boys, who are going to try for tickets to see Paul Revere's Ride and all the other thrilling pictures that Mr. Griffith has made for you, have not yet mailed your essay of 400 words to the SUN office, then you should do so this week. The contest closes the middle of April, as announced, which will be next Tuesday. Don't mail yours so it will reach us too late.

There are quite a number of essays on hand which have not been read, but every one, whether it wins a prize or not, must be carefully examined; so if your effort is worthy, you will hear from the SUN in due time with a free admission ticket to "America."

Just how good at writing history some of our boys and girls are may be seen from the following essays:

AMERICA

Whenever that name comes to our ears we should think what is connected with it;—300 years of upward progress, war and peace, which has finally put America and more especially the United States into a foremost position in the world.

The first place where America appears in History is when the Norsemen with their strong and sturdy bark touched on the North American coast. That Watertown has had some connection with this event is certain because of remains which have been found in recent years.

Christopher Columbus is credited with the discovery of America in 1492 when he touched the shores of North America and the West Indies.

The first English colonies to be formed in the New World were established in Virginia and Plymouth. The Indians gave much trouble to both of these and many other colonies as the whites gradually fought they and [illegible]

[illegible] hatchets, and threw the tea in the water. This was called the Boston Tea Party.

When the English king heard this he was very angry. He ordered that Boston Harbor should be closed, so boats could not get in with provisions and other things. But the different colonies sent things to Boston. Some sent cattle, some sent rice, and others sent cotton.

The greatest men living then were George Washington, Dawes, Paul Revere, Samuel Adams, John Adams, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, and Thomas Jefferson.

George Washington slept one night in Watertown. Washington was in command of the Revolutionary War. He had his headquarters at Longfellow's house and took command of the army under the Washington Elm.

Paul Revere and a man named Dawes, rode to tell the people the English were coming. Dawes rode farther than Revere, but he had no poet to immortalize him, as Revere had.

The Revolutionary War broke out. The Americans were not victorious at Bunker Hill, but were at other places. They declared their independence from England July 4, 1776. Amongst those who signed the Declaration of Independence were, George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Adams, John Adams, Charles Carroll of Carrollton, John Hancock, Benjamin Franklin, Robert Morris, and others.

George Washington was elected first president of the United States.

MARGARET DOYLE,
44 Eliot Street.
(11 years of age.)

A BRIEF OUTLINE OF AMERICA WITH LOCAL COLOR

From the time of John Cabot, 1497, until the time of Captain John Smith in 1614, when he was exploring Massachusetts, America was only a place for Europeans to marvel at; but from that time until the difference with King George III of England, settlers were chiefly concerned with the subjection of nature, and making terms with the Indians.

The river flowing through the present day Watertown was named by Captain Smith, Massachusetts River. The name was, in 1614, changed to Charles River, in honor of King Charles.

The town site was first called [illegible] Richard Sphinnatt's Plantation, but was named Watertown [illegible] because had the Revolutionary [illegible] government, and was the [illegible] of John Eliot's first sermon to the Indians. In industry the town was a leader and it was here that [illegible] the Provincial Assembly [illegible] where the Supreme Court [illegible] which separated the Province [illegible] Declaration of Independence was first read. [illegible] Revolutionary War and [illegible] hundred and ninety-six [illegible] January 6, 1776 [illegible] the Revolutionary War [illegible] Revolutionary War [illegible] Revolutionary War [illegible]

Palmyra (Mo) Journal 4/10/24

18-4-4D

April 10 1924

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators and safety belts, Revolutionary descendants, and the entire men of the United States Army as "extras."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is "working out admirably," and things in several cases—notably in reproduction of the battle scenes—were more secure, more attractive to take "shots" of the actual sites rather than stage them in small concerns, for obvious reasons. A number of such scenes were shot in Ohio, in the vicinity of Washington, and in the shadow of the Capitol and Mount Vernon, during the last few days.

It is after the battle of Lexington, with the Minutemen in hot pursuit of the British regulars, that the Minutemen are being photographed in Massachusetts, and it is at Concord that the famous bridge is being photographed. Later, the scenes will be taken in Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, Nevada, Utah, Arizona, New Mexico, California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan

Philadelphia Pa Inquirer april 6 1924

THE CALL BOY'S CHAT

KNOWING HIS GREAT AVERsion to snow and winter weather, I was somewhat surprised when the Old Stager came into the room humming a breezy tune and apparently chock full of joy. I asked if someone had died and left him a large amount of money, or whether he had dined well.

To which he replied, rather scornfully, I might add, that he had not cancelled his working duties that he might enjoy the fruits of a benevolent benefactor. He added, however, that he had had the pleasure of dining with one of our great film directors and that he had also had a delightful talk with one of our well-known playrights. The former he revealed was David Wark Griffith and the later Jules Eckert Goodman, whose latest submission for our approval is "Chains" at the Walnut.

"I presume each of these persons gave you some food for our chat," I said, and he replied:

"Most assuredly so. I was particularly interested and amused at Mr. Goodman's description of the trials and tribulations of a playright. He told me that possibly the most delightful occupation in the world is the writing of a play. It is also the simplest, he declared, with a tone of sarcasm in his words. As nearly as I can recall the description it went something like this:

"'All you need is a ream of fairly good white paper and a more or less working typewriter—and there you are. You sit down before that typewriter and, while you smoke a pipe or cigar, you conjure up a group of interesting people whose characteristics and emotions will clash and you proceed to let them clash. For about a year you watch them and note down as they love, hate, antagonize and strike flint against each other and so finally you have used up about the ream of white paper, have calloused two fingers of your left hand, the thumb and one finger of your right hand from hitting keys of your machine and you have a play.

"'Your next step is to take your play to a manager. He listens as you tell him all about it, and then suggests that you read it to him. Or, perhaps, he prefers to read it himself. In that case, he will take it home at once, and the next morning you will receive a hurry telephone call from him asking you to call at once. "I have read your play," he says when you get into his inner office, "and I want to do it." A plain business statement, colorless and to the point. So you settle the terms as quickly as possible in order to get his real views of your play. "It's a great drama," he says, "by far the greatest you have ever written—a masterpiece." Please let me call your attention to these last two words, "a masterpiece."

"'So ends the first chapter. Could anything be more delightful or simple? But let us hasten to Chapter II. A week or so later the manager again telephones the author asking him to come in. "I have been reading over again that play of yours," he says, "and I have given it to several people to read. Oh, no—none of the profession; just some ordinary theatre-goers. I didn't tell them a word about it; merely asked them what they thought of it. And they all picked out the same spot—that place where Jenny refuses to marry Tommy because she doesn't happen to love him. They all say—and I agree with them—she loses sympathy there. And if your heroine loses sympathy at one point your play goes to pot. Now, I think you ought to take this manuscript home and read it over very carefully. I believe you have a good piece of property, but it needs work." Kindly note that the "masterpiece" has now become "a piece of property."

"'Well, you go home and you work over it and change it here and there, and in due course it reaches rehearsal. The stage director grasps you warmly by the hand and assures you that as soon as Mr. Blank (the same being the manager) gave him the play and he had read it, he "simply went crazy over it." The leading lady now comes up and tells you she read the play to her mother, and they both went "wild over it." And," she adds, "I have never spoiled a failure." Whereupon the director, fearful lest enthusiasm may rob him of an alibi he may need later, sums up, "The play has a wonderful chance."

Kindly observe that the "piece of property" has now become a "chance." The first week of rehearsals is—well, just rehearsals. Changes are being constantly made in the cast. Everyone is working very hard and everyone is so busy trying to get hold of the more realistic ideas of love and business that there is time for nothing else. But during the second week things start to happen. It usually comes out of a clear sky and begins something like this:

"'But, Mr. Director,' this from the leading lady, 'I simply can't speak that line. It isn't my idea of what a woman's first is.' The director turns to the author and notes the look somewhere in the ceiling of the dark shaggy beard and says, 'Well, what about that, Jenny?' And so the author comes up, and he makes some thing with more feeling and more, oh, love and more throbbing and all. The author remembers a line from a Greek play and suggests it. Jenny rehearses it and it goes well. The author and director and Jenny are happy. The rest of the company are happy. The stage director is happy. The stage manager is happy. The author is happy. Everybody is happy. It looks like the play is going to be a success. The author goes home and he sits down and he writes a letter to his mother, and he says, 'Mother, I have written a play and it looks like it is going to be a success.' And he signs his name and he seals the letter and he puts on his hat and he goes out and he mails the letter. And then he comes back and he sits down and he lights his pipe and he begins to think. And he begins to think that the play is not quite what it should be. He begins to think that the play is not what it should be at all. He begins to think that the play is not what it should be at all, and that the author has made a mistake in the first act, and that the author has made a mistake in the second act, and that the author has made a mistake in the third act, and that the author has made a mistake in the fourth act, and that the author has made a mistake in the title, and that the author has made a mistake in the author, and that the author has made a mistake in the mistake, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's mother, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's father, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's brother, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's sister, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's cousin, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's aunt, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's uncle, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's dog, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's cat, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's canary bird, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's goldfish, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's parrot, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's monkey, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's pipe, and that the author has made a mistake in the author's tobacco

N.Y. Times April 11 1924

WAR VETERANS JOIN FIGHT ON MEMORIAL

Legion Official Declares Service Men Oppose Accepted Design and Park Site.

TO MAKE PROTEST TODAY

Many Organizations Will Attend Estimate Board Hearing in Effort to Block Project.

Veterans of the World War, including men who are high in the councils of the American Legion, oppose the erection in Central Park of a permanent war memorial and will be represented at a hearing before the Board of Estimate at 10 o'clock this morning at the City Hall. They are among the latest to join in the city-wide protest. Twenty-eight civic, business, political and charitable organizations also will be represented at the hearing in opposition to the project.

Mary Pickford, in a letter to William Bradford Rouiston, counsel for the Parks and Playgrounds Association, declared that she was misrepresented as a park invader in the statement issued by City Chamberlain Berolsheimer last week following her visit to Mr. Berolsheimer in the interests of a motion picture college. The letter follows:

"I read your statement in THE NEW YORK TIMES on April 4, to wit, that all the Mary Pickfords and D. W. Griffiths will never get their motion picture theatre school in Central Park. I assure you that, while it is not my privilege to side with either political faction, I quite agree with your statement regarding the park.

"The site of the college was not discussed at the meeting, and, in fact, from things I heard, I believe it was to be elsewhere in the city. It was purely an unselfish motive that prompted my going to the City Chamberlain to request that the motion picture art should be included in the plans for the college for the theatre, and I am sure a public-spirited man like yourself would not stand in the way of anything which is for the benefit of the same class of people who enjoy your beautiful Central Park—the great mass of people in New York, the United States and, in fact, the whole world.

"While I am pleased with your liking my suggestion of education through the screen, still I have no idea of giving up the dramatic part of it, as to my mind entertainment is almost as essential a part of the day's routine as education."

Veterans to Protest Today.

The fact that veterans of the World War were dissatisfied with the plans for the war memorial was first disclosed by Edward E. Spafford, Commander of the American Legion, New York State Department, at the last hearing before the Board of Estimate. After hearing the design of Thomas Hastings criticised by architects who said that the central theme of the work was a fountain, which "speaks of frivolity and joyousness" and "not of the spirit of sacrifice, gratitude, reverence, patriotism and the heroic dead," Commander Spafford said that the veterans desired a memorial that would represent the service man, "both crippled and uncrippled," who had done his bit in the war, and that the design did not embody the ideas of a memorial entertained by the service men.

The design will be elaborated this morning by E. L. Cousins, for three years a member of the National Executive Committee of the American Legion and chairman of its Committee on Memorials. He said that other officials of the Legion would try to be heard at the meeting.

"We are against the use of Central Park as a site for any kind of memorial building when other sites are available," Mr. Cousins said.

Delegates Adopt Resolution.

H. A. Mastbaum, President of the National Sculptors Society, following a meeting of the Executive Council, yesterday said the following resolution had been adopted:

"Resolved, That the National Sculpture Society renews the use of any part of Central Park as a site for the erection of a memorial that is worthy of the memory of our soldiers, sailors and marines who served in the World War."

Among those who have signed a protest against the use of Central Park as a site for any kind of memorial are Mrs. Ogden Mills, President of the Women's Municipal League; Mrs. Frederic Ellis, President of the Women's City Club, and Mrs. Charles Sabin, President of the Women's Auxiliary of the Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society.

Thieves Get $125 Saved By Widow for a Tombstone

Mrs. Marie Aiello, widow of William Aiello, who was a member of the New York Fire Department and who was killed on duty at a fire in Twenty-seventh Street, Manhattan, just a year ago, will not erect a monument at the head of her husband's grave on Good Friday next, the anniversary of his burial, because a thief entered her apartment at 12 North Washington Place, Astoria, last Tuesday and stole $125 she had saved to pay for the tombstone. Mrs. Aiello has four small children and she has had a difficult time providing for them from the pension she receives from the city. The money, together with a diamond ring which her husband wore at the time of his death, and another diamond ring which her husband gave her on their wedding day, Mrs. Aiello kept in a pocketbook in her home. Thieves got it all while she was shopping.

N.Y. Sun 4/11/24

Plays and Players in These Parts

Forecast of High Jinks in Midocean—Memories of Talent on the High Seas.

By ALEXANDER WOOLLCOTT.

It ought to be fairly easy to get up an endurable ship's concert during the next voyage of the Olympic. When she sails on Saturday her passenger list will bristle with such names as D. W. Griffith, Mary Garden, Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford and the like. Then if the luckless wight on whom pressure is brought to manage the concert is really bright he will be careful to exhume from his cabin one Noel Coward, a young and sprightly English comedian, whose antics would be more amusing, we think, than the stately didoes of Mr. Griffith or even the elegant art of Citizeness Garden.

It was Mr. Coward who wrote the words and music of three of the best numbers in the "Charlot Revue" and he has been in America for the purpose of blending his saucy thoughts with the melodies of Jerome Kern for the new Kern show that is shortly to be done in London. Coward seems to have been born into the world just to write songs for Beatrice Lillie who, in the present revue, is limited to his "There's Life in the Old Girl Yet." We suggest to the Olympians that, in particular, they molest Mr. Coward with frequent demands for his own gloomy rendition of "We Must All Be Very Kind to Aunt Jessie."

* * *

The last (and only) time we crossed on the Olympic, the Fairbanksses were also aboard. They were returning from their not especially furtive honeymoon. It was the period of rest after that amazing visit to London when the old town went mad and the entire population of the Empire tried to get into their hotel at once. Traffic came to a standstill and even the King, on his way back to Buckingham Palace for a cup of tea, was believably rumored to have been stalled for twenty minutes in Piccadilly because of his immovable subjects' conviction that Mary Pickford was about to pass that way. Or perhaps he let the car loiter in the sneaking hope that he might get a sight of her too. At that time the Americans in the Savoy bar at cocktail time made a rather noisy point of being bored by the whole agitation and those of them returning on the Olympic let it be known on the way down to Southampton that if these spoiled favorites, then hurrying across Normandy, expected any flattering curiosity from them they were doomed to disappointment. But one could not help noting that though Doug and Mary did not push off from the Cherbourg until midnight none of the passengers had turned in for the night when they did come aboard. Those who had rather planned to perish the two celebrities by not looking at them at all were thwarted in this demonstration of superiority by the fact that the devastating couple meanly kept to their suite and worked like beavers all the way over. Indeed, they came out only at sundown, for a brisk half hour's charge around the promenade deck, during which brief parade all the supine passengers in the deck chairs developed crick in the neck and eye strain in their efforts to get a good look at both of them without seeming to emerge from their fascinating books.

* * *

Some years ago, a desultory voyage on an off season minor liner was rendered entertaining for us by the profound melancholy of the concert manager who had rashly undertaken to arrange a program and then found the passenger list barren of talent. There was not a name in the lot that he had ever heard before. There was, to be sure, an ex-Governor General of the Philippines, but it seemed improbable that he would care to sing or feel equal to a sea ballad. There was, as we recall, a deep sea diva, but she was ill and immured. The manager was quite forlorn. He came to us for advice and, perhaps, a wild fiction that we might be induced to sing a group of old French songs. Homeric laughter was his reward, for, as it happened, there was one person on board who could give a whole ship's concert unaided. Uncommunicative and unsociable, given to hiding beneath a parasol in odd and unapproachable corners of the deck, was a slender, dark woman who from under lowered lashes lost no observant eye on the Comedie Française as it strained its past but around the promenade. Her name was then not especially well known, for it was in the days when it was not thought an act could do anything except announce from stalls to the Princess Theatre for two or three months in a drama. Her name was Ruth Draper.

* * *

On this, what is London the Olympians will find themselves confronted with the agony of building photos in the "The Prince and the Pauper," in lieu of which production [illegible] Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Griffith [illegible] Monday night, when a crowd [illegible] Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Griffith [illegible] Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Griffith [illegible] Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Griffith

Boston Transcript april 12 1924

Washington Times 4/12/24

Boston Post Transcript

David Wark Griffith Slashes Freedom's Crescent Down the Screen

The Battle of Bunker Hill

Spectacular Canvas From the Director's Current Historical Film of Revolt and Sacrifice, "America"

UNCLE DAVY DREAMS BUT THUS: $ $ $

By JIM RING.

Once upon a time (which is the way all moral stories should begin), there lived in New York a struggling movie director whom the office boy called "Mister Griffith."

Mister Griffith was an actor by profession, and a business man by instinct. He developed a habit of picking winners in the free and easy actor market of that primitive day, and his company grew and prospered.

Quite suddenly there was an unexpected cessation of news from the Biograph offices. Soon, over the country, reports spread that this guy Griffith was making a picture called "The Birth of a Nation." The uninformed said to themselves and to others, "It's a picture about the revolution." But, as everyone knows, it wasn't.

Not so long ago, over in the vicinity of Fort Myer, Mr. Griffith (famous as the maker of "The Birth of a Nation") put his company through its paces for a new supermagnigiorious spectacle with the working title of "America." To the public, this name conveyed no idea of the picture's content. The public had learned, since "The Birth" first flickered bravely before an awed herd of spectators, that most movie titles mean even less than subtitles.

More recently, word came down from New York that Mr. Griffith was showing a new picture in the metropolis. It was about the Revolution, and it was called "America."

With the passing days, as critics gave of their musings to the people, all became advised that Mr. Griffith had scored again by glorifying the ride of Paul Revere, by making this episode about 100 per cent more exciting than the actual event.

"America" will be at Poli's in Washington soon, and then you may judge of its merits for yourself.

* * *

The fact that Griffith has made another picture is not half so interesting as the story of how Griffith did it. As we said before, if Griffith is a genius at all, he is a business genius. As far as art goes, he is a capable show man. He knows his public and he knows the fundamental desires of his audiences. But first and foremost comes his ability to keep money coming to him and working for him. He drives hard and fast bargains, and if he can get anything free, he deigns to accept it and makes the giver like it.

Mr. Griffith allowed himself to be persuaded by the Daughters of the American Revolution to make his latest production. After his customary worried hemming and hawing, he accepted the job, for altruistic reasons. The D. A. R. clapped its collective hands in glee. From all quarters came those anxious to assist. Fort Myer's soldiers were dressed in uniforms of the Continental Army and gladly performed for the battle scenes. Every possible aid was put at Mr. Griffith's finger tips. With the drowsy nonchalance which is so typical of him, he took what he wanted and rejected the unavailable. There remained nothing but to sell and distribute "America" at the best possible advantage—which, you may be sure, Mr. Griffith has done.

* * *

Well, you may say, what of it? Has he done anything wrong? No. Isn't he entitled to a profit commensurate to his great task? Why, certainly. Isn't "America" a good picture? We haven't seen it, but we'll bet it is.

Then what's the idea of telling about Mr. Griffith's working methods? Well, we thought you might be interested. Griffith is a big man in the movie industry, feared, loved, hated, and respected. But he was no idling dreamer when he made "The Birth of a Nation," and he was less so when he made "America."

No Griffith spectacle can ever contain greater human interest than his own biography. He has lived a full life, and he has had a hard time in reaching the eminence which he now commands. He has made actors and actresses who were unable to act unless he directed them. Some strayed out of his company, lured by big contracts, and they proved to be terrible flops. Others stayed with him, until the Griffith principles of acting were so deeply imbedded in their personalities that no other director could or would make them respond to his orders.

There is an element of greatness in Griffith—a strange, a peculiar greatness of personal power that is given to few men in such brimming measure. This fortunate kink in his inner being commands him. It is this that makes a Griffith picture one that can be only a Griffith picture. He is the unique figure in the world of the moving picture today—alone of his heights, superior to the point of arrogance, actor, director, exploiter, financier!

If the New York dailies is to be credited, you will see that "America"—and especially Paul Revere's ride—is another milestone in Griffith's march into immortality.

PHOTOPLAYS NEXT WEEK

Majestic—America

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH'S new historical romance, "America," now tenants the Majestic Theatre. The film summons as background the earliest battles of the Revolution of '76—Concord, Lexington, Bunker Hill—reveals the sufferings of Valley Forge, and goes into details of the fighting against British and Indians in western New York. A slender thread of sentimental adventure holds the piece together; yet it prevails most in the moments when it ranges widest over Colonial legend and far-flung skirmish-line. The ride of Paul Revere makes the most thrilling incident in the whole; the rescue of the heroine by the hurrying horsemen—inevitable interlude in a Griffithian work—brings conclusion. Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Lionel Barrymore and a lengthy cast are pliable and expressive material to the director's purposes. Rounding out the sixth week.

Wy American 4/12/24

THE Olympic to-day will carry a number of people who are well known in motion picture circles. David Wark Griffith will be a passenger. He is going to Italy to look over the offer made him by Andrea Serrao to come to Italy and produce pictures.

MARY PICKFORD

Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks, accompanied by Mrs. Charlotte Pickford and little Miss Pickford Rupp will also be aboard the liner.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/12/24

Carol Dempster & Lionel Barrymore in "AMERICA" Shubert PITT

Los Angeles (Cal) News 4/12/24

Cambridge (Mass) Tribune 4/12/24

Hartford (Conn) Times April 11 1924

'AMERICA' ESSAY CONTEST CLOSES TUESDAY APRIL 15

Word comes from New York that Mr. Griffith is immensely pleased with the "America" essays written by the school children of Cambridge, which are appearing in the Cambridge Tribune—and he wants to read them all.

The High Lights in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country

The first noted event in American history is the discovery of America, by Christopher Columbus, on October 12, 1492. He sailed from Palos, Spain and after many hardships finally reached land. When he set out he had intended to find a new way to the Indies by sailing westward. After reaching land he left some men and sailed back to Spain. As he failed to find any rich spices or other treasures he was arrested. When he was released he made one more trip and then died.

After the discovery of America other brave men set out to explore the New World. The first one was Ponce de Leon. De Leon was getting old and wanted to find the fountain of youth about which the Indians told him. It was a wonderful land for him. He set out and finally found Florida.

Most Explorers and Rulers would not be used as much as the French language.

All who are Americans can feel proud to think how brave our ancestors were, and what struggle they had to overcome in this vast wilderness, which has become one of the leading nations of the world.

This is what I call the "High Lights in American History and What They Have Meant to Our Country."

EDITH T. PINKOS.
(Age, 11 years.)

Other prize winners this week were: Hilda Berley, Mary Lynch, Louise Guerin, Avedis Terzian and Milton Talent.

Camden (N J) Courier 4/12/24

News-Herald 4/12/24

IN REVIEW

"One of Many" Thought Food Yellow Press Wants a Girl

—By L. B. Fowler—

YESTERDAY, this department received another communication from someone signing himself "One of Many," which is worthy of being reported in these columns. The body of the letter shows constructive thinking and offers food for thought. Why the young man—assuming the individual is a young man—did not give his name is a question; it would have been withheld if requested.

Note carefully what the author has to say:

* * *

A few days under the heading of "Girls, Do We Need Be Taken Up A Warning" the writer is an accident dramatic on a production which we hope will be one of the big pictures of the year, not to the position leaves a lot of what he wishes to talk about.

A great percentage of the people of Los Angeles do not appreciate the motion picture industry belong to them.

They are interested at almost every

It is almost impossible to show any kind of a function without announcing the well-known point of discussion and in some place or another it will up at all.

* * *

Now we find as were informed [illegible]

SCRE[illegible]PIC OF REVOLUTIONARY WAR

Hartford (Conn) Times 4/12/24

Theological Student Said to Be Greater Lover Than Valentino

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen—has been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars.

The new luminary in the film world is none other than Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the War of American Independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined Griffith in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton, whose fine acting, noble figure and frank, firm visage is one of the outstanding features of the latest Griffith success.

Althe Griffith discovered and made Barthelmess, the Gish girls, Mae March and many other present-day favorites of filmland, the first time on record that he publicly enthused over a young actor happened in the case of Hamilton, who, in two brief years at the Griffith studios has developed from an "extra" into a star of the first magnitude.

"That boy," exclaimed Griffith, after seeing Hamilton as Nathan Holden in "America," "will be the great lover—indeed, the greatest lover—of the screen. He will go far. I have never told a young actor for whom I could predict such a brilliant future as I predict for young Hamilton."

Hamilton was born in Lynn, Mass., and studied theology four years before starting to break into the movies thru the "extra" route. In "America," he plays the role of a Lexington express rider, friend of Paul Revere, and minute man, who later becomes a member of Morgan's Riflers and leads the charge which saves thousands of Washington's men at Fort Sacrifice.

News-Herald 4/12/24

Carol Dempster, Beautiful Star in D. W. Griffith's Screen Masterpiece "America" at Poli's Theatre, Hartford, All Next Week

Hartford (Conn) Times 4/12/24

Character a Real One

Persons who have seen "America," the new D. W. Griffith picture at the Chestnut Street Opera House, have doubtless been under the impression that the role of Nancy Montague, played by Carol Dempster, is purely fictional. But such impression is erroneous. Nancy Montague was suggested to Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story of the play, from the character of Ethelyn Byrd, of Virginia. She was said by her contemporaries to be the most beautiful woman in America.

It is a matter of record that Miss Byrd, who was of aristocratic lineage, was sent to England to be presented at the court of King George III. Her great beauty was thoroughly appreciated by His Majesty, who spoke in complimentary way about the young colonist.

Wy Journal, Bay 4/8/24

Peterburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 12 1924

WASHINGTON'S SIZE AND STATURE VERIFIED

Boston American 4/12/24

Pittsburgh Pa Press 4/13/24

NEIL HAMILTON GIVEN UNUSUAL OPPORTUNITY.

Neil Hamilton, who plays the part of the captain in the romantic Morgan's Riders scenes of D. W. Griffith's great film, "America," now being shown at the Pitt theater, is distinctive in that he is the first young man of equal experience to be given so important a role. No other young actor has had such an opportunity unless backed by a record of successful efforts. He is the son of an attorney now living in New Haven. Ann. Athol, Mass., is his birthplace, and his education was gained in New Haven. His mother hoped he would enter the ministry, and guided this ambition by entering him for a year course.

Neil Hamilton.

CAROL DEMPSTER and RILEY HATCH in "AMERICA"—MAJESTIC

Philadelphia Record 4/13/24

SCENE IN "AMERICA" CHESTNUT ST OPERA HOUSE

Pittsburgh Pa Press 4/12/24

PITT—"AMERICA."

United States regular army soldiers making their appearance in a domestic motion picture for the first time in history, caught the thrilling battles of Lexington, Concord Bridge and Bunker Hill in the first part of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodramatic epic of the War of Independence, which will begin the second week in Pittsburgh at the Pitt theater tomorrow afternoon. The role of Paul Revere is one of the big thrills, and practically every outstanding figure of Revolutionary days figures in the story.

The second chapter, Lexington and the capture of Major Pitcairn, the raising of the Declaration of Independence and Washington's inaugural are among the most vivid scenes ever filmed. Paul Revere and Lionel Barrymore play the parts of "America" was written by Robert E. Sherwood and the big production was made by Jesse L. Lasky and Adolph Zukor. Mrs. Lasky produced it. Mrs. Lasky introduces prominent people in the production, the day it opened there was Pat Harrison, the presiding officer in the senate, who was in the city on a visit. Pittsburgh Press

Boston Herald 4/13/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE

Baltimore American and Sun

PATRIOTIC FILM AT ACADEMY THIS WEEK

"America" Dramatizes Sacrifices of Colonists During Stirring Scenes of '76 Form Background; Pleasing Love Story

"AMERICA," D. W. Griffith's patriotic drama, and its sequel, "America and the Law," are the feature pictures at the Academy of Music for the week beginning today. The first picture shows the American Revolution and the second is a sequel of it.

The scenes in the Griffith film are laid in Colonial days and the story is a romance of the Revolution. The author, Robert E. Sherwood, has woven into the story the famous incidents of the Revolution, the battle of Lexington, the battle of Bunker Hill, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the inauguration of Washington, the Battle of Yorktown, the surrender of Cornwallis, the Treaty of Paris, the Constitutional Convention, the Whiskey Rebellion, the Alien and Sedition Laws, the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions, the Hartford Convention, the Dorr Rebellion, the Mormon Rebellion, the Dred Scott Decision, the Fugitive Slave Law, the Kansas-Nebraska Bill

SCHOOL STUDENTS, Marked in Crusade Against Vice ng in Kalamazoo, Will Graduate Only to Go to Prison Cells

AMERICAN REVOLUTION LIVES AGAIN IN FILM

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster).

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in a love scene.

The Minutemen prepare to defend historic Buckman tavern.

Samuel Adams greets a visitor to the Hancock-Clarke house, Lexington, Mass.

United States regulars garbed in homespun, refight the battle of Bunker Hill (center).

Miss Irma Harrison with the drum actually used at the battle of Lexington.

How Big Battle Scene Was Made

It was near the quaint old village of Somers in the green hills of Westchester county, New York, that the battle of Bunker Hill was fought again. Of course there was no actual fighting, but in order that the D. W. Griffith picture, "America," which is now at the Chestnut Street Opera House, might have additional suggestion of actuality, Bunker Hill was decided upon for presentation. Naturally it was impossible to take the soldiery for the combat to the original site—it is now the location of a monument. So last September an American expeditionary force, consisting of the Eighteenth Infantry, supplemented by a small detachment of the Sixteenth, left quarters in New York harbor for the scene of anticipated battle.

The troops were intended to be a part of the picture—and an important adjunct, be it said. New drilling had to be learned. For instance there was the forming in fours, in the style of 1776. Then there was the manual of arms—an entirely unfamiliar procedure to the soldiers of today unaccustomed to the flint-locks and their ram-rods. It was discovered that a new sort of tactics had to be adopted.

"The 'taking' of the Battle of Bunker Hill required about two days," said Griffith the other day during a visit to this city. "The battle consisted of three main assaults on a redoubt and breastworks at the top of Breed's Hill. It was a thrilling sight to see the British troops move slowly and steadily forward. There were the Minute Men, and Prescott shouted to them 'Don't fire until you see the whites of their eyes.' There were three charges—and in the last the men had thrown away thir knapsacks. In this charge the British, as you will remember from your history, used the bayonet.

"I want to pay tribute to the men who participated in this and other battles in 'America.' It was the discipline of the army that made this possible. They marched up the hill to music of the Eighteenth Infantry band, and went bravely into volleys of firing. When anyone fell, as though killed or wounded, there was a most remarkable realism. Being on the ground made it seem a great tragedy. I went up to one man after the smoke had cleared, and we had stopped 'shooting' the camera, to ask him how he had managed to die with such wonderful realism. 'I learned it in the Argonne,' he said."

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger April 13 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 4/6/24

Music in Griffith Film

In the presentation of D. W. Griffith's new picture, "America," at the Chestnut Street Opera House, there is an important adjunct in the music played by the orchestra. Griffith is always most careful in the selection of music for any production with which he is associated and in this case he saw to it that there should be some appropriate melody for each incident, and, in many instances, distinctive melodies for certain characters. The love motive, for instance, is that delectable "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes." It comes to the fore with considerable frequency, but as the picture deals with American events in the Revolutionary Wars, there are national anthems and a number of sectional melodies to augment interest. "Carry Me Back to Old Virginny" may seem a little out of place in a Revolutionary story, but Griffith explains that the selection of music was not chronological, that he thought first of all to find something appropriate in melody and then to fit that selection to the incident. The tunes of Revolutionary days would not be familiar for the most part, but that has lived and that has found appropriate place in the musical score of "America" is "Yankee Doodle."

"Do you know that Mrs. Alan Hartwell Strong, of Philadelphia, owner of the house of "Yankee Doodle," is intending to present that ancestral estate to the Commonwealth of New York at the anniversary of Albany this spring?" said Mr. Griffith. "The place is at Fort Crailo and it antedates the house by more than a century. As we are on 1776 there was an old garden on the property and one of the Revolution stones is of the year 1776. The Van Rensselaer family owned the property originally and Mrs. Strong is a descendant of the first owner. It is to make the place a permanent memorial.

"It was there that it was at Fort Crailo the young Dutch musician, Jonathan Hasey, wrote the words of "Yankee Doodle." The tune came back to the colonies and the words sung by the British soldiers who had come to America as a jest, was sung by the Revolutionists when Fort Ticonderoga fell into their hands. There this young musician was imprisoned by the British and forced to leave the country. He went to Holland and there he died. The tune has lived and the words have been sung in Europe and in Asia. Thus this song has become the most universally recognized of any song in the world. It is the only song that has been sung in all the countries of the world. It is the only song that has been sung in all the countries of the world. It is the only song that has been sung in all the countries of

REVERE'S RIDE AND BATTLE ST

"The Midnight Ride of Paul Revere"—"Listen, my children, and you shall hear," goes Longfellow's poem, but now the school children can see Paul in his famous ride as well, in the film, "America." Here he is, riding "to spread the alarm through every Middlesex village and farm." Over a fence, down a lane—a rap on the door—"The British are coming! Up and to arm!"—and on and on, till all the hardy farmers are aroused and belligerent, ready to "fire the shot heard 'round the world."

The Farmers "Gave Them Ball for Ball," sang the great Cambridge poet, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, "from behind each fence and farmyard wall, chasing the Redcoats down the lane." The retreat of the British from Concord 149 years ago this 19th of April as reproduced by D. W. Griffith in his new movie of tremendous scope, "America."

"If You Want to Have a War, Go to Hugh Hasty"—And it begins all right. The film land of patriots in the Lexington inside [illegible] Hugh Hasty, the [illegible] man, [illegible] and [illegible] land man [illegible] of [illegible] Lexington [illegible] the girl with her [illegible] "America" [illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette Times 4/3/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press 4/13/24

"AMERICA" TO REMAIN AT PITT THIRD WEEK.

The D. W. Griffith patriotic photodrama, "America," has taken firm root at the Pitt theater, and the engagement will be extended during the week of April 12, with matinees daily. Schools in all parts of the city are taking advantage of this opportunity to bring the history of the Revolutionary war clearly to the children by reserving large blocks of tickets for their classes.

Carol Dempster.

Neil Hamilton and Carol Dempster have the leading roles in the cast, [illegible] thousands of people.

Cleveland O. Plain Dealer April 13 1924

Neil Hamilton, Minute Men, Carol Dempster and Lionel Barrymore in "America"

PITT

Cleveland Ohio News 4/13/24.

Philadelphia Pa Record 4/13/24

Joke on Griffith

Before D. W. Griffith sailed for Italy last Wednesday some of his friends played a good joke on him. At a dinner which he attended last Monday night he asked one of the guests what he thought of "America." This guest, who had been prompted by the jokers, replied:

"Why, I thought it was wonderful, Mr. Griffith, but why did you show a car track in the Paul Revere scenes? The picture would have been more effective without such an anachronism."

Naturally Mr. Griffith was amazed at this statement and he asserted that it could not be. In fact, he appealed to several of the other guests to back him up. But one by one, those who were in the plot, admitted to him that they had seen the stretch of car track on the road ridden by Paul Revere but had refrained from mentioning it as it might hurt his feelings.

The result of the plot was so successful that the producer rushed over to the theater and watched the film for the hundred and first time only to discover that there were no car tracks in any of the scenes. And it was not until then that he realized that he had been the victim of a practical joke.

It was suggested to Mr. Griffith that a good way to advertise "America" would be to have Douglas Fairbanks in his make up as "The Thief of Bagdad" ride Paul Revere's horse down Broadway shouting "Obey the Ten Commandments" and then enter the Forty-Fourth Street theater where "America" is showing.

Mr. Griffith and Amerigo Serrao sailed on the Berengaria on Wednesday to confer with the banking group in Rome that is financing two new pictures to be made in Italy possibly under Griffith's direction.

Notables of Film World Go Abroad

MARY PICKFORD FAIRBANKS and her husband, Douglas, the latter's mother and other members of her family are among the passengers aboard the Olympic, a White Star liner on its way to France. D. W. Griffith is also on board the ship and is going to Rome via Paris for the filming of a new picture.

Sailing on the Adriatic, also a White Star liner, is E. Hodgson Smart, portrait painter, who is going to England to make the portrait of England's new premier, Ramsay MacDonald.

Hamilton's Film Career Is Notable

Young Leading Man in "America" Is Now in Demand—He Has No Exaltation of Pride.

THOSE who have seen "America," the D. W. Griffith picture at the Chestnut Street Opera House, and who are given to prognostication, predict with every confidence that Neil Hamilton, the up-standing young chap who has the heroic role of Nathan Hayden, will some day rival in popularity the handsome Rudolph Valentino. Hamilton has a splendid athletic figure but still more important, he has the suggestion of manliness so appealing to men and women, alike. His work in "America" indicates a fine histrionic and his abilities have already been recognized by a number of producers of pictures who have sought to obtain his services. Indeed he is at present engaged in the leading role of a new picture for a well-known company, having been released temporarily by Griffith, it under that the work might be under taken.

Hamilton is truly a Griffith "find." His first screen appearance was in "The White Rose," and he did so well in the picture that Griffith has contrived to secure the young man and has done everything possible to make him a star. Of the person, the actor who plays the role of Nathan Hayden, was of interest, for it was only last year at the [illegible] [illegible]

The handsome of Hamilton is [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

San Francisco Chronicle
LEADING NEWSPAPER of the PACIFIC C
Twelve Pages SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, APRIL 13, 1924.
Rotagravure Pictorial Section

Coquettes

A CHARMING FAIR

Pittsburgh (Pa) Gazette-Times April 13 1924

Little Tales of Players In Pittsburgh This Week

NEIL HAMILTON, who plays the hero of "America," the romance of the Revolution, now in the Pitt, was born in Lynn and was educated in Athol, Mass. He has nothing of the screen star about his manner. He is a former student of theology.

Characteristic of him was his remark when, following the brilliant premiere of "America" in New York, he was told that he had "arrived" in the movie world. Where the average boy of his age would have thought of how success meant a new automobile, plenty of spending money or for similar things, Hamilton exclaimed: "Then I can have mother and dad take a nice long trip and enjoy themselves."

His theological studies have left their mark on him. His voice is low and vibrates as he discusses those nearest his heart, and there is about his personality a constant suggestion of the ecclesiastic.

"I gave up theology because I was convinced I was not fitted for such a career," he explained. "It may sound foolish, but the stage and the pulpit were the only careers I desired—so I finally tried the stage. I had always been a movie fan. In Athol, and later in New Haven. I went to every picture that came to town and I read everything I could find about movies. I could tell you the color of the eyes of every star and all their history.

"So it was natural that instead of trying to get on the stage in the beginning, I should try to break into the movies. I will never forget the day when I left New Haven to take New York by storm, leaving the old folks at home to await my immediate and brilliant return.

"It was the first time I had ever been away from home. When we reached 125th street the great size of the metropolis awed me so that I burst into tears and wept. I was still crying when, for the first time in my life, I reached Broadway. And I was such a "hick" that I went into the cigar store at the corner of Broadway and Forty-second street to ask where Broadway was.

"I had $25 to last me until I got a job—which I imagined would be the minute the world knew I was in New York. I went around to the studios day after day, while my $25 dwindled lower and lower. I was broke, discouraged, and about ready to start walking back to home and New Haven, when I was given a job as an extra at $5 per day—when I worked.

"That was two years ago. Since then I have played in stock and have been with a traveling show. I had almost forgotten my determination to become a star in pictures, when came two bolts from the sky, one a request to call at the Griffith studio, and a similar request from another studio. I went out and met Mr. Griffith—and here I am."

TO HIS ancestors goes the credit for the strength of Sigmund Breitbart, the Polish giant and strong man who is to be one of the features in the Dawn at the week April 14. At least that's the way Breitbart has figured it. The explanation seems to lie in the fact that for generations the Breitbart family has been famous for the physical power of its men in the little town of Lodz, in Poland. There Breitbart's grandfather is said to have once unharnessed a lame horse, put the horse in the cart and dragged cart and horse home from the market.

His father, now 65, still is swinging a hammer in his little blacksmith shop in Lodz, where Sigmund as a boy used to amaze the other children by twisting horseshoes. His grandmother on his father's side lived to be 113 years of age, and her father died at the age of 113.

Contrary to the usual habits of the strong man, Breitbart does not train rigorously. He rests a great deal, endeavoring to spend 12 hours a day in bed. He is massaged daily, from head to feet. His food is of the simplest, and he eats but one regular meal a day, in the late afternoon. He rarely eats meat, never touches potatoes or desserts, and lives for the most part on fresh fruits and, although at one time a smoker, he has now completely foresworn tobacco.

Like many men of great physical strength, Breitbart is diffident and modest. He cannot bear the sight of blood.

Breitbart has only one explanation of his great power. In his broken English, when he was first in Pittsburgh last November, he said: "It's a gift. It is a talent. It is like music, painting, acting, writing. It is something inside you. If you have it not, you cannot hope to achieve it."

Hartford (Conn) Courant April 13 1924

'America,' Epic of Screen at Parsons' This Week

Presents in Graphic Form the True Story of the Struggle for Liberty—Settings in Actual Locale of Revolutionary Events.

"America," D. W. Griffith's screen epic of the War of American Independence, described as the supreme effort of this great director and one of the outstanding film masterpieces of all time, will have its premiere at Parsons' Theater beginning tomorrow night, with performances twice daily thereafter for the entire week.

"America" is undoubtedly one of the most significant films ever made. Not only is its story the true history of America's struggle for liberty, but its settings are the actual locale of the action of the events of the most glorious chapters of America's history.

For years Griffith has been preparing to make a film dealing with the American Revolution. He had amassed a wealth of data and had even prepared a story. But the matter lay dormant until the Daughters of the American Revolution, seeking a means of making a contribution to the sesquicentennial of the struggle for freedom, prevailed upon him to undertake the task of putting the ideals of our forefathers into motion picture form.

Fortunately Griffith received the voluntary assistance of practically every historical and patriotic society in the country, not only in the labor of digging out forgotten facts but in the loan of historical homes and relics; and as volunteers to act as extra people. This enabled him to produce many scenes on the exact sites of the original happenings, using appurtenences actually used and using descendants of the original heroes as actors.

The result is a stunning picturization of America's great struggle, with such characters as George Washington, Patrick Henry, Lafayette and Paul Revere shown in true relation to their great parts. A graphic telling of the immortal story, floating a banner of beautiful romance across the scenes of America's high adventure. It is described as the most thrilling and satisfying motion picture among all the great superspecials that have been made.

"America" is the most stirring thing of its kind ever made; vivid; historically accurate and fascinating and brings every bit of patriotism to the boiling-over point. It is the living, breathing document of the sacrifices and idealism of the men who freed America.

Dallas Tex Herald 4/13/24

The eminent D. W. Griffith has sailed for Europe [illegible] director, megaphone and a distinguished company of players to film exterior scenes for "The Dawn," an original screen story by the English author, George Moss. Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton will have the leads.

Carol is a "natural" daughter of California. Like Janet Johnston she was, at the start of her career, one of Ruth St. Denis' pupils and toured the country as one of the Denishawn dancers. She is another Griffith "find," and has worked with him almost exclusively. In two of his earlier pictures, "The Love Flower" and "Dream Street," she had the star parts and later appeared in Griffith's "One Exciting Night" and "America." She also took a leading part in "The White Rose," in which Mae Marsh "came back" after a somewhat protracted absence from the American screen, and again in "Sherlock Holmes," a Goldwyn picture.

While there may be some difference of opinion regarding Carol's histironic ability there can be none regarding her dainty and refined portrayals. She makes no appeal through the bizarre in either appearance or actions.

New News April 13 1924

(NEWS photo)

A reversal of form we could call this: Instead of shooting pictures D. W. Griffith, famous film producer, was the target, withal a not unwilling one, of battery of movie cameras aboard the Olympic, on which he sailed to arrange for new picture in Rome.

Washington Star 4/13/24

Something About "America"

"AMERICA" is said to embody more distinct novelties in motion picture production than any of the masterpieces of Griffith.

Because the production was undertaken at the instigation of the Daughters of the American Revolution, representatives of which were present at the filming of the various scenes, and through Secretary of War Weeks the United States Army co-operated, Mr. Griffith, to achieve the most meticulous accuracy from a historical point of view, established a research bureau to delve into the historical documents housed in public and private museums and collections throughout the country. This staff of experts, among whom are numbered leading authorities on the revolutionary period, have been required to settle every mooted question in regard to the most minute details of the war of independence.

Patriotic organizations throughout the country, it is said, not only volunteered their services in the research work, but, defying custom and tradition, took from museum cases and private vaults which housed them for years invaluable relics of the revolution for use of the famous director, and so Mr. Griffith was able to use as properties for his scenes antiques from the shrines of the revolution which have never before been photographed.

Instead of taking the scenes on one location they were taken on the battlefields where the action really took place, and Mr. Griffith, accompanied by his experts, historical, military and technical advisers, with his entire company, toured the country in special cars, staging scenes on such widely separated points as Lexington Common, Washington's home at Mount Vernon, Valley Forge and the old North Church in Boston.

The famous ride of Paul Revere was filmed on the road over which he rode. In cases where the erection of monuments or modern improvements made the "shooting" of scenes impossible Mr. Griffith has included scenes of the actual historical sites, weaving them into the action of his story with a mastery of which he is eminently capable.

Perhaps of all the innovations the most unusual is the use of large units of the Regular Army of the United States in several battle scenes. Infantrymen and cavalrymen, clad in the garb of British grenadiers and in the buff and blue of Washington's Continental Army sweep majestically through the action. This is claimed to be the first time that units of the Regular Army have ever appeared in a dramatic film or that Uncle Sam's soldiery has ever donned costumes to appear before the motion picture camera.

The major battles of the revolutionary war, from "the shot that was heard 'round the world" on Lexington Green to the engagement which culminated in the surrender of Cornwallis, are shown in this extraordinary photoplay, and dramatic episodes from Paul Revere's ride to the signing of the Declaration of Independence.

Baltimore Sun April 13 1924

"Dawn Of A Tomorrow" To Be Shown

"When A Man's A Man," "The Eternal Three," "The White Tiger," "The Day Of Faith," "Why Women Remarry" And "Steadfast Heart" Booked

"AMERICA," the D. W. Griffith spectacle picture of the American War of Independence, which was reviewed in this section a few Sundays ago by our New York critic, will be the attraction at the Academy of Music this week.

One of the most thrilling episodes of the production, it is said, is the well-known historical ride of Paul Revere. It is only necessary to quote a paragraph from Thomas B. Hanly's criticism in the New York Morning Telegraph to get a thoroughly comprehensive idea of what the film is like. He says:

"Upon a screen of well-nigh limitless dimensions the man has projected the immortal story of the sacrifices of the American colonists to win freedom from the British Crown, and he or Robert W. Chambers, the author, has interwoven in it all love romance of a Tory maid for a patriot soldier and officer as it was bested by the machinations of Walter Butler."

It is not amiss at this juncture to mention the various players who have leading roles. Lionel Barrymore is Walter Butler, Louis Wolheim is Captain Hare, the aide of Butler, who is a villain, and others in the cast include: Lucille La Verne, the star of the successful stage play "Rock Me," Dorothy Dunganter, featured in "The Rose" and other Griffith pictures, Neil Hamilton, Rice [illegible]

Boston (Mass) Advertiser 4/13/24

"AMERICA" TRIUMPH OF SCREEN HISTORY

Little connected with the picture industry has done more for its advancement than D. W. Griffith, whose first great production was a sensation of the theatre. In "America," now at the Majestic, he has made the historical narrative of the Revolutionary patriots a whirlwind of adventure. Mr. Griffith has never been more artistic in the matter of spectacle—he may have gone a step farther, but "America" stands above his other works in spirit and beauty.

A pretty love story is woven through the patriotic theme, with Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton as the lovers. Lionel Barrymore is the arch-villian. The performance reaches a dramatic peak in the famous ride of Paul Revere, a sensational screen effect. As a New Year writer said—"Verily, Verily—David Wark Griffith has done it again."

Washington (DC) Herald 4/13/24

A Highbrow Indian

The student of American history will find many illuminating touches in D. W. Griffith's "America," which comes to Poli's next Sunday. There are few more interesting, yet more slightly known characters in that period of American history than Joseph Brant, the Indian. Brant, chief of the Mohawks, differed from the majority of his tribe in being a deeply learned man. Greek and Latin were familiar languages to him, and his knowledge of science, history and the classics was far more extensive than that of the average educated man.

Philadelphia (Pa) North American 4/13/24

D. W. Griffith To Be Here During Home Coming Week; D. M. Jones Heads Orchestra

Two of the most interesting bits of gossip for Film Fans gleaned in recent months came yesterday when it was learned that D. W. Griffith, probably the most famous of all picture producers—and a Kentuckian—will come here in June for the Kentucky Home Coming celebration; and that Ottie M. Jones, one of the best known and most successful orchestra leaders in the South, has been engaged to lead the augmented orchestra at the Mary Anderson Theater when that house changes its policy next Sunday.

Mr. Jones, who formerly conducted at the National and at other houses here, needs no introduction to Louisville audiences. His work has always been of the highest order, his musicians the best that could be obtained and as the director at the Mary Anderson he is expected to set a record that can not be beat. He succeeds Earl Keller and is already busy with his first week's program.

The news regarding Mr. Griffith, and his return to his native heath was contained in a letter to Col. Fred Levy, in which the man who is responsible for "The Birth of a Nation," "Orphans of the Storm" and—his latest—"America," declared that he is 'Coming Home in June."

"Indeed I am looking forward with great expectations to coming back to my native state, during Home Coming Week," is the way part of the letter to Colonel Levy reads. "Also I shall be most happy to avail myself of your kind invitation to be the guest of the Rotary Club. However, owing to the press of getting "America" finished and other matters, I shall leave the details to you."

Mr. Griffith, who was born and reared in Lagrange, Oldham County, has been here but few times since he went to New York and the Kentucky Home Coming celebration committee is planning to make this just a memorable occasion.

Both of the local film houses [illegible] Griffith's [illegible] and the Mary Anderson are embracing the opportunity to prepare for the coming of the famous director with [illegible] and real film pictures. Both houses have made ready for the change and it is [illegible] that Manager Hunter will [illegible] the film world [illegible] Louisville [illegible]

Washington DC Post April 13 1924

STARS IN "AMERICA"

Philadelphia (Pa) North American 4/13/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press April 13 1924

SCENE AT VALLEY FORGE IN "AMERICA"

Philadelphia (Pa) Record April 13 1924

St Louis (Mo) Post-Dispatch April 13 1924

Griffith Finds New Star.

A second and greater Valentino—a new "great lover" of the screen is said to have been discovered by David Wark Griffith, who discovered and "made" a majority of the present day movie stars. The new luminary in the film world is Neil Hamilton, the sturdy, handsome, young American boy who plays the leading male role in Griffith's "America," the romance of the war of American independence, now the sensation in New York and Boston. Critics of both cities have joined [illegible] in forecasting a most brilliant career for Hamilton.

Toronto (Canada) World 4/13/24

GRIFFITH IN ITALY.

The Italian Government is negotiating with D. W. Griffith for the production of Gustave Letton's "Last Days of Pompeii." Mr. Griffith is reported to accept. It seems the most famous of all the American directors has financed his film productions with ease in every important country abroad, but always finds difficulties in doing so in the United States. Despite his many successes Griffith is accompanied [illegible]

Oklahoma City Oklahoman 4/13/24

Griffith To Confer With Rome Bankers

Oklahoma City Times 4/13/24

Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer 4/13/24

Chicago Tribune 4/13/24

Buffalo (N Y) Courier April 13 1924

GRIFFITH "AMERICA" COMING TO SHUBERT-FEAR

New Telegraph 4/13/24

Chicago (Ill) American 4/13/24

"America" Closes Six-Week Run Tomorrow

Norwich (Conn) Bulletin 4/13/24

Hartford (Conn) Record 4/13/24

Fort Worth Star-Telegram, April 13

4P

First Flappers were in Washington's Time

Diaries and Love Letters of Colonial Belles Recently Uncovered for Film "Tell On" the Girls of '76

The modern girl's vanity case replenishes her store of beauty and her daring dress enhances, or she thinks it enhances, her charm, and she has her "line" of frank gossip which she is boyishly open in discussing

Girls of today are chided because they smoke cigarettes, and they are told they have more vices than the girls of any other period in the world's history, but——

Back in George Washington's day the girls engaged in the less dainty habit—on the sly of course—of sniffing snuff! As bad as cigarettes, wasn't it?

The Colonial maiden was as demure as her sister of today is bold and she relied on arts which seemed more to conceal than reveal in her social accomplishments, but her longings for freedom and self-expression were as keen as those felt now

The modern girl, athletically inclined, the 'thrill-hunter," likes nothing so much as a seat at the ringside in the boxing arena or at a wrestling match, but——

One hundred and fifty years ago the Colonial belle dressed herself in male attire and sallied forth with the boys to witness a cruel pigeon shoot

Dorothy Miss Amerling of 1924 Bobs bobbed hair, short skirts and sports costumes she is denounced as bold and bad, but——

The Colonial flapper openly revolted against the cumbersome hoopskirt and refused point-blank to powder her hair

Modern women of independence are compared to the flappers who flouted the laws of the fashion world of today, but——

The girl of the American Revolution was bold in spirit and manner, as shown recently in the battle "scene" above

"GEORGE WASHINGTON was not only the Father of His Country; he was also the father of independent woman.

"Meticulously conventional in regard to rules governing the dress and habits of his Cabinet, he was far too wise to attempt to dictate to the wives of its members.

"Before the American Revolution women looked up to their husbands as infallible beings, just as the men looked up to the ruling kings and overlords; when they imbibed the doctrine of the fallibility of those sovereignties from the lips of their men folks, they in their turn revolted against home government.

"The flapper and frivolous women of today have nothing on their ancestors of 180 years ago. For every caprice and impropriety practiced by femininity in 1924, there is a corresponding peccability to be found in the records of the social season of 1776."

It took [illegible], one of the leading motion-picture directors, just about a minute and a half to make the above statements, but it took him more than two years to collect the data which led to these conclusions.

"America"—a ten-reel feature, founded on the story of the American Revolution—was opening simultaneously at the Criterion studio in Long Island when the director paused for half an hour to give some interesting intelligence on his and concerned at that period. The scenes had been made at the request of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and private diaries and letters passed to Griffith and many of the period had been taken out of their safe vaults to add company, thereby lending beauty to the more prosaic and private records of historical documents in current periodicals.

"Do you really believe that the story of the flapper took place during the Revolutionary period?" he was asked.

"Certainly," the director answered decisively. "The letters and diaries at hand prove it. It is certain that the women who lived in the pre-Revolutionary period were just as independent and always been unrestrained. The men paid deference to the king and his representatives, but the girls and daughters gave no quarter. Their language is unusual and colorful.

"Yes, I'm sure they taken taking chew in their lives, and they smoked, too, in their own way. Many times I have seen them with their pipes and cigarettes. Of course, they were not supposed to do it, but they did it just the same. Nothing stuff was certainly a common social habit. But the young ladies of the 1776s indulged in private.

"I played for two months at the Criterion here in Gardenville going over the lines and scenes. King Cupid was the best Amerling philosopher that was conceived in a par with reality.

"Of course, she wasn't supposed to go. But we found records where girls dressed up in boys' clothes and attended these affairs. It is recorded as the scandal of the social season in the annals of a Southern family that a prominent young lad had attended a duel and had fainted when she witnessed the cruelty practiced on scared birds, and was thus discovered."

"How did the girl of the 1776s break loose? How was the flapper born, and who was the ringleader?" was the next on the list of questions.

"After Washington became President he insisted on the men wearing powdered hair, but the ladies insisted on going unpowdered, and the Father of His Country was far too wise to interfere with them. He had plenty of troubles without that.

"Dorothy Quincy was the first flapper. At least she was the first prominent beauty who became known for her reckless and sport pursuits. She lived quite much alone to the younger set.

"By the way, the modern slang terms, she's a tiger and he's a tiger, originated at this time.

"Dolly Madison, who was considered the most beautiful girl in America, was much adopted in Elite Society. Madison lived in London, he paid her a crude compliment. Said he: 'I have three most beautiful flowers in your country, but I didn't know they had pick them in both there.' The other expression was found in a young girl's diary, where she says that she wished her mother would quit talking about the good old days and come in the 20th century.

"Many men these days make remarks which are rather derogatory to the ladies, but they're not a patch on what they used to say in those days of old when knights were bold and supposedly gallant."

AND from one of the many books of reference the following extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, a distinguished Massachusetts clergyman, in Boston, is taken:

"When I hear an inquisitive gentlemame inquire what dress the Queen is in this week, what the modus operandi of the court, I look at her as the very giscard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing," scolded the dominie. "She is fitter to be kicked, if she were of kickable substance, than either to be honored or honored."

This excerpt was brought to Mr. Griffith's attention.

"Oh, yes, the ladies were used to that sort of thing, especially in New England. But they had lots of fun on the side."

"How did they compare with the modern girl as described recently by Dr. Charles Smith, of Roanoke College?" it was asked. "He drew a perfectly heinous picture of her as a hard-drinking, cigarette-puffing, boisterous Amazon. He excused her on the grounds that she was an intoxicant; that she hadn't found herself yet, and was the victim of rapid economic and industrial changes which have left her without an anchor."

"As a matter of fact," he replied quietly, "the modern girl has found herself. The 'flapper' has taken nearly 150 years to come into her own, but she has done it very successfully.

"As for smoking, it concerned whether the approval of young ladies smoking cigarettes or not, it must be acknowledged that it is a decided habit they nothing stuff. That wasn't social and proper, of course, even in those days. Nothing stuff was certainly a common social habit. But the young ladies of the 1776s indulged in private.

"I played for two months at the Criterion here in Gardenville going over the lines and scenes. King Cupid was the best Amerling philosopher that was conceived in a par with reality.

"Many men these days make remarks which are rather derogatory to the ladies, but they're not a patch on what they used to say in those days of old when knights were bold and supposedly gallant."

AND from one of the many books of reference the following extract from a sermon preached by the Rev. Nathaniel Ward, a distinguished Massachusetts clergyman, in Boston, is taken:

"When I hear an inquisitive gentlemame inquire what dress the Queen is in this week, what the modus operandi of the court, I look at her as the very giscard of a trifle, the product of a quarter of a cypher, the epitome of nothing," scolded the dominie. "She is fitter to be kicked, if she were of kickable substance, than either to be honored or honored."

This excerpt was brought to Mr. Griffith's attention.

"Oh, yes, the ladies were used to that sort of thing, especially in New England. But they had lots of fun on the side."

"How did they compare with the modern girl as described recently by Dr. Charles Smith, of Roanoke College?" it was asked. "He drew a perfectly heinous picture of her as a hard-drinking, cigarette-puffing, boisterous Amazon. He excused her on the grounds that she was an intoxicant; that she hadn't found herself yet, and was the victim of rapid economic and industrial changes which have left her without an anchor."

"As a matter of fact," he replied quietly, "the modern girl has found herself. The 'flapper' has taken nearly 150 years to come into her own, but she has done it very successfully.

"As for smoking, it concerned whether the approval of young ladies smoking cigarettes or not, it must be acknowledged that it is a decided habit they nothing stuff. That wasn't social and proper, of course, even in those days. Nothing stuff was certainly a common social habit. But the young ladies of the 1776s indulged in private.

"I played for two months at the Criterion here in Gardenville going over the lines and scenes. King Cupid was the best Amerling philosopher that was conceived in a par with reality.

"Of course, she wasn't supposed to go. But we found records where girls dressed up in boys' clothes and attended these affairs. It is recorded as the scandal of the social season in the annals of a Southern family that a prominent young lad had attended a duel and had fainted when she witnessed the cruelty practiced on scared birds, and was thus discovered."

"How did the girl of the 1776s break loose? How was the flapper born, and who was the ringleader?" was the next on the list of questions.

"After Washington became President he insisted on the men wearing powdered hair, but the ladies insisted on going unpowdered, and the Father of His Country was far too wise to interfere with them. He had plenty of troubles without that.

"Dorothy Quincy was the first flapper. At least she was the first prominent beauty who became known for her reckless and sport pursuits. She lived quite much alone to the younger set.

"By the way, the modern slang terms, she's a tiger and he's a tiger, originated at this time.

"Dolly Madison, who was considered the most beautiful girl in America, was much adopted in Elite Society. Madison lived in London, he paid her a crude compliment. Said he: 'I have three most beautiful flowers in your country, but I didn't know they had pick them in both there.' The other expression was found in a young girl's diary, where she says that she wished her mother would quit talking about the good old days and come in the 20th century

Baltimore News April 15 1924

NEWSBOYS TO FIND TREAT IN "AMERICA"

Fifteen hundred newsboys and carriers of The Baltimore News are due for the treat of their lives next Saturday, when they will be the guests jointly of The Baltimore News and the management of the Academy of Music at a special screening of the great Griffith super-picture "America."

"The finest picture ever made," the newspaper critics in New York described "America," and The Baltimore News critic, who saw the picture screened before the State Board of Motion Picture Censors, can only concur in this opinion and add that, if anything, the New York consensus understated the case.

Scenes Are Realistic.

The picture, which is based on the story of the American Revolution, shows that romantic and inspirational crisis in the history of the United States as no dull school textbook or even the liveliest of novelists could.

It doesn't describe the heroic defense of Bunker Hill or the solemn triumph of the surrender of Lord Cornwallis' army at Yorktown and ask the reader to picture these scenes in his mind. It reproduces them, just as they happened, so one can almost imagine one's self actually there.

The picturization of Bunker Hill is perhaps the big scene of the picture, although there are so many big scenes it is difficult to select any single one as superlative.

In it one sees the British lines making their slow march up the hill in the face of the determined colonists entrenched behind earthworks. It shows the Americans holding their fire under General Warren's immortal order, "until you see the whites of their eyes."

Then, with the red-coated advance only a few yards away, the blaze of the American volley is shown; the British wither and shrink under the skillful marksmanship of the colonists, the line staggers, falters and is thrown back.

Third Advance Depicted.

Beating at the retreating backs of their troops with their swords, the British officers reform the line at the foot of the hill, and again the "thin red line" begins the weary climb. Again they are beaten back, to be reorganized yet once more, and this time take the hill and send the Americans into full retreat, for General Warren has been killed and the colonists have exhausted their gunpowder.

This is only one of scores of thrilling things that happen in the story which The Baltimore News have in store for its readers next Saturday. There are three solid hours of entertainment, with not a dull moment in them, and when it is over one realizes, as never before, at what a cost in lives and in suffering the United States of America bought its national independence.

Hartford (Conn) Times April 15 1924

"AMERICA" GIVES HISTORY THE SPUR

Film Speeds Up Olden Days to Pace That Thrills.

[illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 4/15/24

CRITICS "AMERICA" VS. AND OTHER FILM HITS

[illegible]

Baltimore News April 15 1924

The advent of a new D. W. Griffith photoplay is always interesting, as Mr. Griffith is the outstanding figure among film producers. "America" deals with our country in Revolutionary War days. I am informed that "America" was filmed under the guidance of a special corps of research experts and historians, including representatives of the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Sons of the American Revolution, the Lexington Historical Society and similar organizations; that Secretary of War Weeks assisted by turning over various Regular Army units, who appear in costume in the massive battle scenes; that Griffith used historic houses, actual battle grounds and the shrines of American liberty for the scenes, descendants of the leading families of Revolutionary days as extra people, and drums, pistols, flintlocks and even uniforms which saw service in the War of Independence as properties.

I am also informed by the [illegible]

Baltimore News 4/15/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE AND CAROL DEMPSTER IN "AMERICA" AT ACADEMY

Washington (DC) Post 4/15/24

Patronesses for Benefit Film.

Mrs. Calvin Coolidge heads the list of patronesses for the special performance of D. W. Griffith's new film spectacle, "America," to be given in Poli's Monday evening for the benefit of Walter Reed hospital, the performance being donated by Mr. Griffith in recognition and appreciation of the cooperation extended to him here by government officials and others while "America" was being produced.

The other patronesses are Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. John W. Weeks, Mrs. Curtis D. Wilbur, Mrs. Harry New, Mr. Hubert Work, Mrs. James J. Davis, Mrs. Henry C. Wallace, Mrs. David A. Reed, Mrs. Francis E. Warren, Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Mrs. Eliot Wadsworth, Mrs. Parker Corning, Mrs. J. Mayhew Wainwright, Mrs. George Barnett, Mrs. Charles Boughton Wood, Mrs. Larz Anderson, Mrs. Truxton Beale, Mrs. Marshall Field, Mrs. J. A. Johnston, Mrs. Clarence O. Sherrill and Mrs. Eugene Hale.

One hundred seats have been taken in the center of the house for wounded men from Walter Reed hospital.

The committee on arrangements is composed of Mrs. James W. Wadsworth, jr., chairman; Mrs. Thomas Bell Sweeney, Mrs. Eldridge Jordan, Mrs. Charles Warren, Miss Margaret Lower, Mrs. W. L. Finley, president American Women's league; Miss Marjorie Wright and Mrs. Scott Thomas.

The following have taken boxes for the fashion stroll, to be held at Fort Myer, April 19, at 5:00 o'clock and 8 o'clock: Secretary of War and Mrs. John W. Weeks, Assistant Secretary of War and Mrs. Dwight Davis, Gen. and Mrs. W. A. Holbrook, Gen. and Mrs. John L. Hines, Mrs. James W. Wadsworth, jr., Mrs. Joseph A. Latimer, Mrs. H. G. Shaffer, the Hungarian legation, Mrs. John Hays Hammond, jr., and Mrs. H. G. Leigh, Mrs. Dwight Davis, jr., Mrs. John H. Sherry, jr., and Mrs. H. G. Davis.

Among those who will appear in the fashion show drill are Misses Marie Hoff, Ruth Frederick, Marjorie Hall, Martha Hunt, Esther Pierce, Dorothy McKinney, Helen Clement, Ward Hill, Mary Hunter, Mary Hunter, Mrs. Mary Hunter, Lucy Hunter, Mrs. Mary Hunter, Mrs. Mary Hunter, Mrs. Mary

Baltimore News April 16 1924 — Baltimore Sun April 16 1924 — Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/16/24 — Washington (DC) Times 4/17/24 — Baltimore (Md) News April 18 1924

"AMERICA" IS ON VIEW AT ACADEMY

D. W. Griffith's Latest Picture Stirring Days of Revolutionary War Days.

By NORMAN CLARK

This man, David W. Griffith, certainly does know how to put pictures on the screen that will stir an audience to enthusiasm. His latest photoplay, "America," which began an engagement at the Academy Monday night, had a packed house almost continuously popping its palms.

"And "America" is a stirring picture. It treats of stirring times and stirring people.

The motion pictures are doing much to acquaint Americans with the history of their country. "The Birth of a Nation" taught us of Civil War days; "The Covered Wagon" brought before our eyes the struggles of the pioneers to conquer the West, and now "America" lets us see a reproduction of scenes and events just prior to and during the Revolutionary War period.

Magical Names.

Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill—magical names—they are all to be seen in "America." Patrick Henry, Thomas Jefferson, Samuel Adams, John Hancock—heroes all—they live again and speak some of their famous words as characters in this newest Griffith drama.

For a story on which to thread his historical incidents Mr. Griffith has selected a tale by Robert W. Chambers. The Montagues of Virginia are faithful followers of King George, who thinks the American colonies are beginning to act a bit uppish and should be put in their place. The Montagues—father, son, Charles Edward, and daughter, Nancy, do not look favorably upon this liberty talk of Patrick Henry and other members of the Virginia Assembly.

Word is brought South by Nathan Holden, a handsome young dispatch rider, that King George has closed the port of Boston. War talk fills the air. The Minute Men get out their muskets and the British soldiers begin to march. The signal flashes in the Boston church tower and Paul Revere begins his famous ride. And what a ride this is! It is perhaps the most exciting part of the photoplay. Mounted on a wonderful horse that leaps fences, stone walls and jumps across brooks, Revere dashes through the countryside spreading the word—"The British are coming!"

The Minute Men!

Then we watch the little band of Minute Men as they take their stand at Lexington and at Concord. Later we behold the Americans intrenched on the top of Bunker Hill and the gaily uniformed British marching heavily up.

The notorious Capt. Walter Butler and his cutlass play an important part in the story. In the role of Butler, Lionel Barrymore does an impressive piece of work. Carol Dempster is at her best as Nancy Montague, and Charles Mack is fine as her disinherited brother who lays down for the cause of America. Neil Hamilton makes Nathan Holden a manly fellow.

"America" is worthy of the talents of D. W. Griffith.

1500 NEWSIES TO BE GUESTS AT 'AMERICA'

Civic Leaders Congratulate The Baltimore News for Treat to Be Given Carriers.

With bands blaring and banners flying, 1500 newsboys and carriers of The Baltimore News will march from The Baltimore News Office Saturday morning to the Academy of Music, where they are to be shown a special screening of D W. Griffith's historical super-film, "America."

Baltimore streets will be entirely deserted of juvenile News venders, it appeared likely today, as every boy who could possibly convince Vattier Snyder, circulation manager of The Baltimore News, of having carried or sold one copy of the paper, besieged The Baltimore News Office for a place in the parade and the entertainment to follow.

News Is Congratulated.

Governor Ritchie, Mayor Jackson and officers of such organizations as the D. A. R., the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars personally congratulated The Baltimore News and representatives of Mr. Griffith today for having made it possible for so many of the youth of the city to witness a picture so inspirational of the principles upon which the nation was founded and educational of the events which made American independence possible.

"America" is really a sugar-coated textbook of the American War of the Revolution. More vividly, more eloquently, more thrillingly than the most interesting writer could describe it, the picture portrays the bitter struggle between Great Britain and her American Colonies and the eventual victory of the patriots.

The story begins with the imposition of the stamp taxes, and the defiant protests it brought forth from such early Revolutionists as Patrick Henry, Samuel Adams, George Washington and others.

Then is shown the "shot heard around the world," when at Lexington Major Pitcairn gave the order to fire upon the patriots drawn up on the public square—the order which lost to Great Britain the wealthiest continent in the world.

Historic Battles Depicted.

The Lexington-Conbord battle is shown at length, as is the battle of Bunker Hill which followed. The sufferings of the ragged, ill-shed Continental Army at Valley Forge, the days of Washington's hopelessness and prayer, and then finally the decisive triumph at Yorktown complete the picture.

To describe a film or play as educational sometimes has the effect of driving potential patrons away. This will never be the case with "America," however.

One sees a thrilling picture first. It is only after the entire story has been shown that one realizes one knows more about the American War for Independence than ever before.

PITT—"America" Film.

D. W. Griffith's story of the days that brought forth our Nation, opened its second week in the Pitt yesterday. It is hard to tell which made the most noise, some of the audience or the orchestra; for the audience was in a tumult from the ride of Paul Revere down to the surrender of the British at Yorktown.

After a tendency of some historians to belittle the days and men of '76, it is good to see before us the minute men of Lexington and Concord, little bands of farmers and workmen, falling in line to battle against the regulars of the British army. Those of us who thrilled when he read in schoolbooks about Washington, Putman and Paul Revere, Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill and Bennington, can't help but feel a new pride in being by birth or adoption an American. The same drum that called the minute men together on the common at Lexington beats the call of assembly. The ride of Paul Revere is as electrifying as in history or in Longfellow's poem.

The second part, the Mohawk Valley of New York, shows the British campaign to exterminate the settlers. The siege of Fort Sacrifice, the ride and rescue by Morgan's Rifles, are history before your eyes, recalling days around our own Fort Pitt. In the Valley Forge scene, the moving of a wagon by starved, bloody-footed soldiers, starts the house cheering.

Carol Dempster does the best of her career. Outstanding is the acting by Lionel Barrmore as Butler, the tory captain. Neil Hamilton as Captan Nathan Holden is a virile patriot. Charles Mack, the Scranton boy, in the part of Charles Montague, bred a tory, but falling into line at the first shot in defense of his country, is ideal in his character.

Washington (DC) Star 4/17/24

SOCIETY FOLK BOOST FILM BENEFIT

Coolidges Accept Box for Showing of "America."

"All Washington," from the President and First Lady down through the various ranks of society, seem to feel personally responsible and are lending their efforts for the success of the special showing at Poli's Theater next Monday night of "America," the new D. W. Griffith picture. The producer, in appreciation of the help given him by the men at Fort Myer, is contributing the proceeds of the opening night to the fund of Walter Reed Hospital.

President and Mrs. Coolidge will occupy a box. Others who have taken boxes are Secretary Mellon, Secretary Weeks, Col. Arthur O'Brien, Miss Alice Clapp, Mrs. John A. Johnson, Mrs. Morris Ernest Locke, Senator and Mrs. David A. Reed and Mr. Belsito, of the Shipping Board.

Mr. Griffith will entertain a box party of leading members of the cast.

As part of the contribution of representatives of the Cabinet, army and navy, and other official elements, General Pershing, Senator Wadsworth, Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt, Congressman John Philip Hill and Congressman J. Mathew Wainwright have agreed to "boost" the benefit performance with brief talks to be broadcast by the radio broadcasting stations. Congressman Wainwright will speak tonight and Senator Wadsworth on Saturday.

Members of the women's committee are selling tickets in the lobby of Poli's.

PRESIDENT WILL SEE 'AMERICA' PREMIERE

Many Other Notables Also to Be Present at Griffith Production, Monday.

AIDS THE WAR WOUNDED

Poli Performance Receipts Go to Walter Reed Patients.

With the President and Mrs. Coolidge in a box, surrounded by society leaders of Washington in adjoining boxes, "America," David Wark Griffith's historic film drama, will receive its premier Easter Monday night at Poli's. The entire proceeds of the performance will go for comforts for men at Walter Reed Hospital.

Society leaders have been selling tickets for a week. Mr. Griffith tendered the use of the film and Leo S. Leavitt, manager of Poli's, offered the theater gratis for the benefit. Mr. Griffith will entertain in his box a group of stars appearing in the photoplay.

Among those who will be in the boxes, in addition to the presidential party, are Secretary of the Treasury Mellon, Secretary of War Weeks, Representative Ogden Mills, Senator and Mrs. Reed of Pennsylvania, Col. Arthur O'Brien, U. S. A.; Gen. and Mrs. Johnston, U. S. A.; G. W. Belsito and Miss Alice Clapp.

Women in Charge.

The committee which has been in charge of arrangements is composed of local women, who saw an opportunity to make the initial performance of "America" a means of aiding wounded veterans who fought for America. The committee members follow: Mrs. J. W. Wadsworth, jr., chairman; Mrs. Charles Warren, Mrs. Thomas Bell Sweener, Mrs. Eldridge Jordan, Miss Marjory Wright, Mrs. Scott Thrown, Mrs. W. L. Finley and Miss M. H. Lower.

Radio enthusiasts during the past few days have been hearing of the show. Last Friday night Senator Wadsworth of New York made the announcement; on Saturday, Assistant Secretary of the Navy Theodore Roosevelt, jr., made it; on Sunday, it was Gen. Pershing; last night, Representative John Philip Hill of Maryland; tonight, it will be Representative Wainwright of New York; tomorrow night, Dwight Davis, assistant secretary of war; Saturday night, Senator Wadsworth, and Monday night, Music, from WEAF, in New York.

Saturday Evening Gazette 4/17/24

D. W. Griffith's "America."

Sir Percy Sykes of London, England, former commander-in-chief of the British forces in Persia, and authority in royal court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photo-drama of the war of independence, which will have its premiere at the Van Curler theater May 1, 2 and 3. Until Sir Percy, who has been thrice presented at the court of St. James, as well as at the royal courts of India, Persia and other Eastern countries, volunteered, Griffith and his research workers were at a loss to learn the details of court ceremonies in 1775, for despite the voluminous writings of the diarists of that period, none of them described formal court etiquette in detail. Just prior to Sir Percy's arrival, Griffith, after months of search, had engaged a foreign actor who bore an uncanny resemblance to the best authenticated pictures of King George III, for that role. So much did this actor look the part and play it that Sir Percy, a deep student of George's reign, seemed to forget that he was dealing with a modern actor, and when addressing the latter always did so with a deep bow and with the [illegible] his majesty will reign—"

Schenectady (NY) Union-Star April 16 1924

"America" Will Be Exhibited at the Van Curler

Washington (DC) Times 4/16/24

Griffith Film to Play at the Majestic

"America," David Wark Griffith's latest masterpiece, will open the movie season at the Majestic Theatre here on May 4. It will be the first of big releases to show on the screen of the Majestic after the regular vaudeville season closes.

In connection with the showing of "America" a special music score has been arranged for Lloyd Fisher's orchestra. This score, together with the picture, has been lauded by all the newspaper critics who have seen the showings in New York, where after a showing of approximately 10 months of preparation it is still in its second week at the Broadway theater, playing to capacity every day.

[illegible]

WATCHING 'EM STRUT

By Nelson Robbins

[illegible]

Pittsburgh (Pa) Chronicle Tel. April 19 1924

Buffalo (NY) Enquirer 4/19/24

HIS HISTORIC CAREER FEATURES FILM

GEORGE WASHINGTON

Warrenton (Va) Enquirer-Democrat 4/19/24

MAYOR TO LEAD NEWSBOYS ON WAY TO SHOW

1500 Workers for The Baltimore News Will See Historic Film "America."

Mayor Howard W. Jackson personally will lead 1500 newsboys and carriers of The Baltimore News Saturday morning in the parade from the City Hall plaza to the Academy of Music, where the boys will be the guests jointly of The News and D. W. Griffith at the special screening of Mr. Griffith's new super-production, "America."

Just before the march is started, promptly at 8 o'clock, Mayor Jackson will address the boys briefly, touching on the miracles of progress and national growth which the American Revolution made possible for the United States, and bidding them never to lose their pride in their American citizenship.

Police to Lend Hand.

Arriving at the theatre, the boys will sing "America," led by Dr. Chas. G. Woolsey, widely known Baltimore soloist and song leader. They will pass into the theatre for three hours of the most exciting film ever staged.

Gen. Charles D. Gaither, Police Commissioner, has not only furnished a squadron of mounted police to escort the paraders but has guaranteed cessation of traffic along the line of march which leads from the plaza south on Holliday street to Baltimore, west on Baltimore to Howard and north on Howard to the Academy of Music.

Army men, from President Coolidge down to the rear-rank private, who have witnessed "America," have given the picture the stamp of approval.

Pershing Lauds Film.

General Pershing saw a screening of it in New York shortly after his return from his European survey, and gave an address over the radio last Sunday, in which he described the inspirational patriotism about which the story is built.

Hundreds of Baltimoreans picked up this address and hundreds of others heard of it from their friends which the management of the Academy of Music holds partly responsible for the packed houses which have greeted "America" at every performance.

Muir Points to History.

Major General Muir, commander of the Third Corps Area, is another high Army officer who saw "America." He said:

"The Baltimore News cann[illegible] strongly [illegible]

Seattle (Wash) Post Intel 4/19/24

Griffith May Make Pictures in Italy

D. W. Griffith has accepted an invitation from a syndicate of Italian bankers to go to Rome to confer on the production of a series of motion pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Heren, member of the mayor's cabinet of Rome.

This action on the part of the banking group has the full approval of the Italian government, and brought from the syndicate this statement:

"We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward restoring the picture making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is, perhaps, the first time an American artist has been officially invited by another nation to resuscitate an art activity. The difficulties have matured so in the matters of the story to be produced, but it is understood the producers [illegible] giving the work of Mr. Griffith's "America," which has proved to be one of his most popular screen productions. This action of the Republicans was made by Mr. Griffith for the [illegible] is now working on an [illegible] at the Forty-eighth Street Theatre, New York, and the [illegible]

Chicago (Ill) Journal 4/19/24

Schwartz-Erch

ANNOUNCED by Joseph N. Y. [illegible] as the greatest film ever given the public, acknowledged as being the supreme effort of D. W. Griffith, master director of the moving picture industry, and admittedly of the greatest possible educational and historic value, "America," opens tomorrow night at the Shubert Teck theater for a two weeks' engagement.

Every school child in Buffalo should see the film work that throws new light on important historic events of the revolutionary period of American life, gives reliable scenes in which reliable and proved accounts are again acted before the eye of the camera, and touches again the spark

Lionel Barrymore in "America," the D. W. Griffith master film.

Buffalo (NY) Enquirer 4/19/24

D. W. GRIFFITH'S COLOSSAL NEW SPECTACLE, "AMERICA", IN WASHINGTON.

NEIL HAMILTON

Who plays Nathan Holden in D. W. Griffith's "AMERICA" to be seen in Washington at Poli's Theatre, beginning Monday evening, April 21st.

[illegible]

Washington (DC) Herald 4/18/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 4/18/24

By VIRGINIA DALE

[illegible]

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

(Center) United States Regulars in Homespun, Relight The Battle of Bunker Hill

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and military heirs, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "extras."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of big battle scenes—there were more men actually take "share" of the movie which Griffith stages as their opponents, to enter in with them in small companies, for use in mediaeval dramas. A number of such attempts were dropped by their troopers in New York, and the global opinions and time consumed until the new Griffith picture has been released.

The enthusiasm of Griffith's co-operating in "America" was, perhaps, not so understand by the fact that to prize in operating the motion battles of the War of Independence with other facility in personal account for the fact of the fact that have met at trade, and were that these were concerned in the event that Pioneers of various patriotic societies to join through the courtesy of the Griffith force in personal in the Motion Pictures, and the Griffith Pictures, and the Griffith Pictures, and the Griffith

Daily Hampshire Gazette april 19 1924 Washington Star 4/20/24

Lionel Barrymore, who takes a leading role in "America," the Griffith picture coming to Washington.

"AMERICA" IS ACCURATE FROM HISTORICAL STAND

Griffith Used Relics of the American Revolution in Making Film

When the Daughters of the American Revolution requested D. W. Griffith to make "America," his photodramatic masterpiece of the War of Independence, which will have its premiere at the Academy of Music, beginning Thursday evening, also Friday and Saturday afternoons and evenings, the first thing he did was to send research experts to Boston to study the authentic records of the beginning of this country's struggles for freedom.

The D. A. R. wanted "America," as its contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the Revolution, and as such Griffith wanted to make his film absolutely accurate from the historical standpoint.

The research experts secured the co-operation of the Massachusetts Historical society, the Lexington Historical society, the Boston Athenaeum and other organizations to such an extent that they not only aided in the difficult task of uncovering long hidden Revolutionary history, but also loaned invaluable relics for use as properties in the picture.

Because of their courtesy Griffith was enabled to take many "shots" for "America," on the actual sites, and to use such valuable relics as the drum actually beaten at the battle of Lexington, Major Pitcairn's pistols, and original flint locks and powder horns which figured in the famous engagement on Lexington green, where 70 colonists stood their ground against 800 trained British redcoats.

One extremely interesting scene shows State street—King street—as it appeared in 1775, with the old state house in the background. The set for this scene, which modern buildings made it impossible to take on the actual site, was reconstructed

Carol Dempster in "America."

Washington Post April 20 1924

"AMERICA," PATRIOTIC FILM HERE

Griffith's Latest Camera Study Opens at Poli's Tomorrow—First Performance for Soldiers.

At Poli's theater tomorrow evening D. W. Griffith's newest film spectacle, "America," will have its first Washington presentation. This latest effort from the hand of the master of the screen comes heralded by much enthusiastic advance report and is said to surpass in magnitude and glowing interest even Griffith's earlier triumphs, "The Birth of a Nation," "Intolerance," "Hearts of the World," "Broken Blossoms," "Way Down East" and "Orphans of the Storm."

In "America" Mr. Griffith has chosen for his period of the story the time of the Revolution, and has shown the genesis of the Revolution, the forming of the Union, the Battle of Lexington, the Battle of Bunker Hill, the Battle of Yorktown, the Treaty of Peace, the Ordinance of 1787 and the Adoption of the Constitution.

Philadelphia Pa Inquirer 4/20/24

Tall Timber Actor Affies With Griffith

Philadelphia North American 4/20/24

HARRY O'NEILL.

Appears this time to the spectator as Paul Revere in "America," at the Academy of Music. He does not use the ride he is inclined to take a [illegible]

Baltimore Sun april 20 1924

Revere Rides Alone In "America"

April 20 1924

REVOLUTIONARY WAR SUBJECT FOR FILM

MUCH OF GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" MADE IN TOWN OF LEXINGTON.

Announced as the supreme artistic effort and achievement of David Wark Griffith, "America," the photodramatic epic of the war of the colonies for freedom from English rule, will have its Southern premiere at the Majestic Theater for one week beginning April 27.

Still running to capacity houses in New York, Philadelphia and Boston, "America" has received the enthusiastic praise of the combined newspaper critics in these cities. They hail it as one of the outstanding film masterpieces.

The original score as arranged by New York music masters will be used by the Majestic Theater orchestra in the presentation of the picture.

Made Scenes in Lexington.

When Mr. Griffith went to Lexington to make scenes for "America," as requested by the Daughters of the American Revolution, for their celebration of the sesquicentennial of this country's freedom, everyone in the famous Middlesex town offered every possible facility.

John L. E. Pell, author of "Down to the Sea in Ships," who made the historical arrangement of "America," the story of which was written by Robert W. Chambers, the novelist, was the emissary chosen by Mr. Griffith to secure the co-operation of the Lexington authorities.

"It was characteristic of us as New Englanders that we didn't warm up to the idea at all at first," said Edwin B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society, in discussing the matter the other day.

To Obtain Realism.

"Cold as we had been to the proposition when it was first proposed, we speedily warmed up when we came to understand the great work Mr. Griffith had undertaken and the masterly manner in which he had gone about it," Mr. Worthen said. "If the United States Government could co-operate through having its War Department turn over regular army units for use in the picture, for the first time in history; if the leading historical experts in other sections of the country could give their valuable services; if the Virginia Historical Society, the Massachusetts Historical Society and other similar organizations could place at his disposal their entire personnel and their collections of relics, Lexington could do no less.

"When we learned that through Charles K. Bolton, secretary of the Boston Athenaeum, and senior warden of the Old North Church, those in charge of that famous edifice braving the fire risks and other dangers, had given permission for Mr. Griffith to wire the church tower for electricity in order that Paul Revere's two lanterns might shine brightly enough for screen purposes, we could hardly do less than offer Mr. Griffith every facility at our disposal. And so we told Mr. Pell that Mr. Griffith might count 100 per cent on Lexington.

"We had thought ourselves learned in local history and tradition, but we were astonished at the noted producer's extensive knowledge of the smallest details of Revolutionary history. Even his own research staff, delving long and deep into private records which we supplied, could add little to his vast knowledge of Lexington's early days.

Real Thrills Given.

"Griffith made the first scenes for 'America' at Lexington, reproducing the olden days so accurately that one can not help being amazed. During the filming free use was made of the relics owned by the Lexington Historical Society, which lends—to my mind, at least—a charm to 'America,' to be found in no other motion picture I have ever seen.

"I think the greatest thrill of my life was the one I got when for the first time I viewed 'America.' The sight of the little town of Lexington, as it was in 1775, springing into view on the silver sheet gave me a sensation I shall never forget. I forgot that I was viewing a reproduction, built with meticulous accuracy; I forgot that one of the several children in the picture was my own. I lived in the past; and my heart swelled as must have swelled the hearts of the gallant men of '75.

"Major Pitcairn's pistols, lost that day by the British commander during the retreat of the British from Concord, and since preserved in Lexington as priceless souvenirs of April 19, 1775, were taken from the glass cabinet in which they are kept for the first time in years and turned over to Griffith for use in his picture.

"The drum actually used at the Battle of Lexington, probably the most sacred musical instrument to American tradition, was beaten for the first time in more than a century, that every lover of his country who views 'America' might get a truer thrill than if some nondescript drum had been used.

Old Weapons Used.

"Flint locks and powder horns which did deadly service on that historic day when seventy-seven Americans attempted to block the progress of 800 trained and true regulars of King George III, were contributed to the Griffith cause, many of them by private families who regard these ancient weapons as their most precious heirlooms.

"Private letters and diaries yellowed with the age of 150 years, rough drawings made by eye-witnesses, and the most authentic prints were taken from public and private vaults to add the wisdom contained in them to the knowledge of Griffith's research workers.

"In staging his battle scenes Mr. Griffith had before him the descendants of men who actually fought at Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, consequently the scenes here were inspired and those who were killed or wounded dropped the same relative positions to their companions as did the original participants.

"In order to numerous into the actual scene of the battle and [illegible] actually, as many of the leading actors and characters in the play, Mr. Griffith was obliged to [illegible] the actual battle field, [illegible] the actual battle field, [illegible] the actual battle field,

Northampton (Mass) Gazette 4/19/24

Northampton Mass DAILY HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE, SATURDAY, APRIL 19, 1924. Northampton Ma

D.W. Griffith Makes "America" for D.A.R.

Patriotic Societies, Historical Experts and the U. S. Army Aid In Making An Unusual Picture.

Walter Butler (Lionel Barrymore) and Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster)

Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton In a Love Scene

The Minutemen Prepare To Protect Historic Buckman Tavern

Samuel Adams Greets a Visitor to the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass.

Miss Irma Harrison with the Drum Actually Used at the Battle of Lexington

WHEN the Daughters of the American Revolution suggested to David Wark Griffith that he make a photoplay based on the American Revolution, they started something.

As a result of this suggestion Griffith is not only making the desired film, but leading historians, patriotic societies, society women, descendants of Revolutionary heroes, and the United States Army itself is helping him, and if everything goes according to schedule "America" as the new film has been named, should surpass even the "Birth Of A Nation."

Probably no other film during its making ever created such widespread interest as that upon which Griffith is now working. This is due in part to its patriotic nature, which has already caused a revival of interest in Revolutionary times in the regions where the great conflicts of our first war were fought; and in part to the unusual way in which Griffith is making the picture.

Instead of building replicas of the historic buildings which must figure in any drama written about the Revolution, Griffith and his entire company of players, technicians and advisers, are traveling from place to place in special trains, and taking their scenes on the actual sites, with thousands of the general public as spectators, and society belles, Revolutionary descendants, and the enlisted men of the United States Army as "supers."

So far this experiment of "letting the public in" to view the actual filming of a motion picture is working out admirably, even though in several cases—notably in reproduction of the battle scenes—crude movie cameras were attempted to take "shots" of the scenes which Griffith staged at great expense, in order to sell them to small companies, for use in moving pictures. A number of such attempts were stopped by state troopers in New York, and the proper cameras and film were secured until the new Griffith scenes had been taken.

The enthusiasm of Griffith's assistants in "America" can, perhaps, best be evidenced by the fact that he was able to introduce the same battle of the War of Independence with some fidelity to the actual details, that he did last year in "Dream Street," when he had to produce the same battle in miniature, with the exception of the Indian, that Hancock's regiment of regulars had actually fought in the battle of Bunker Hill, and that the Indians had actually scalped the men who had fought there.

Griffith's aim in producing historical accuracy has been achieved largely through the establishment of a special bureau of research. This innovation, which has proven so successful, that the motion picture industry is contemplating establishing a similar institution under the directorship of Will H. Hays, counsel of insurance and scholars who were busy for months before the filming began, delving through the primary public and private collections of books, documents and prints for scenes in America.

Although it would seem that very little regarding such a well known incident as Paul Revere's ride through Middlesex to warn the Minutemen of the coming of the British troops, would be necessary to be found in the Revolutionary records, yet Griffith found it necessary to send a special representative to Boston to study the authentic records of the beginning of this country's struggles for freedom.

The D. A. R. wanted "America," as its contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the Revolution, and as such Griffith wanted to make his film absolutely accurate from the historical standpoint.

The research experts secured the co-operation of the Massachusetts Historical society, the Lexington Historical society, the Boston Athenaeum and other organizations to such an extent that they not only aided in the difficult task of uncovering long hidden Revolutionary history, but also loaned invaluable relics for use as properties in the picture.

Because of their courtesy Griffith was enabled to take many "shots" for "America," on the actual sites, and to use such valuable relics as the drum actually beaten at the battle of Lexington, Major Pitcairn's pistols, and original flint locks and powder horns which figured in the famous engagement on Lexington green, where 70 colonists stood their ground against 800 trained British redcoats.

One extremely interesting scene shows State street, then King street, as it appeared in 1775, with the old state house in the background. The set for this scene, which modern buildings made it impossible to erect on the actual site, was reconstructed under the direction of expert historians, with the aid of maps, plans and engravings found by local historical societies.

Some idea of the interest with which the filming of "America" is being followed may be gained from the fact that historical societies and descendants of Revolutionary heroes in sections where scenes were being taken, brought forth the one from the cases and treasure chests of their museums, the other from family vaults, invaluable relics of the Revolution, ranging from pistols, spurs, and drums, to garments and costumes crumbling with age, and offered them to Griffith for use in his picture. Because of this enthusiasm it has been possible to use as "props," in "America," historical relics never before photographed, instead of present day replicas.

Griffith's aim in promoting historical accuracy has been achieved largely through the establishment of a special bureau of research. This innovation, which has proven so successful, that the motion picture industry is contemplating establishing a similar institution under the directorship of Will H. Hays, counsel of insurance and scholars who were busy for months before the filming began, delving through the primary public and private collections of books, documents and prints for scenes in America.

Although it would seem that very little regarding such a well known incident as Paul Revere's ride through Middlesex to warn the Minutemen of the coming of the British troops, would be necessary to be found in the Revolutionary records, yet Griffith found it necessary to send a special representative to Boston to study the authentic records of the beginning of this country's struggles for freedom.

Carol Dempster in "America."

D. W. Griffith who made "America"

most widely known as an author of love stories, has written a number of historical novels, and is generally regarded as one of the best posted men in the country on the Revolutionary period. He has made a specialty of Indian lore, and has been able to give Griffith much assistance in making the Northern Indians who appear in "America" true to life.

When, for example, some one suggested an Indian raid with the redskins on horseback, Chambers called attention to the little known fact that the original inhabitants of our eastern coast never used horses, but fought afoot. Cham-as an e[illegible]duction of the various fields where the chief engagements of the war were fought.

Under the direction of regular Army officers an encampment for several thousand soldiers, with complete water supply, commissary, electric and sanitation plants was made, and a similar one for Griffith's large company of players. The whole encampment covered a neighboring hillside to the extent of a square mile.

Special trains carried the 18th Infantry from Forts Schuyler and Hamilton, and the 10th Infantry from Governor's Island, together with a 10 piece band from Fort Slocum, a commissary corps in command of Lieut. De Witt, and a medical unit under Capt. H. T. Dunn both the army at Slocum.

Reserve supply units assembled under command of Capt. Love of the camera from Camp the largest stock ever brought together outside of our encampments.

Other special cars and automobiles brought Griffith, his players, technicians and advisers, company of more than a thousand.

And the battle was on.

Griffith had searched on maps, plans to the general public to be present. And the general public came. The cars became more and more full each day. They came from all parts of the country, in automobiles they came in motor cars, they came on the trains—they came until at times there were 10,000 of these people in the vicinity of the camp. It was a matter of Griffith's ability to keep the army of Paying Guests had passed each day 20 miles out of Boston. It was the same story at the Hancock-Clarke House, Lexington, Mass., the famous bridge at Concord, and the ramparts hastily thrown up at Bunker Hill in the background.

From the valley to the brow of the hill, where stood a very high and very modern wooden structure, was a long stairway, and a series of telephone wires. It was from this structure, by means of field telephones, and mounted couriers, who dashed hither and thither like madmen, that D. W. Griffith and his staff of historians, military experts, and technicians, directed his players and United States Soldiers, refighting the battles of the War of Independence.

From the minute the soldiers arrived in camp they had been drilled in the manual of arms, in the tactics and strategy of Revolutionary times. During rehearsals they had donned their modern khaki and donned the market coats of grandfathers of King George the Third, and the buff and blue of Washington's Army.

Under the supervision of Army officers hundreds of Griffith players, dressed in real homespun, had learned the tactics of the Minutemen, and the workings of Brown Bess muskets, the powder and ball used by the Revolutionary soldiers.

Hundreds of soldiers had been transferred to Griffith, to march at the best camera from the prominent scenes of the Revolution. The selection of the men to portray Francis Marion, Pulaski, Kosciusko, the Polish and French aides of the Revolution and the other striking figures of the

Arthur Donaldson as Nick Fury

Seven miles up the valley horsemen are groomed, saddled and ready to ride; watch fires wait for the match on distant hilltops; out of sight thousands of British redcoats, Minutemen, Indians, early colonists, and members of the Continental Army stamp impatiently.

Generalissimo Griffith, surrounded by his staff, some in the smart uniforms of U. S. regulars, some in soft shirts and slouch hats stand in a group on the high wooden structure on the brow of the hill, whence a birdseye view of the whole range of hills and of the beautiful valley below, transformed into a Colonial town, may be had.

Rides up a courier. "The British are ready, sir," he announces. Over the field telephone comes word that the Indians are eager to be let loose on the peaceful and as yet unmenaced valley. From all over the area comes word that all is in readiness for the fray.

At last the director gives the signal. The action starts, while cameras grind furiously. On the concerts of Bunker Hill General Prescott calls calmly on and fire putting heart into his homespun and soldiers, and telling them not to shoot until "you can see the whites of their eyes," while the British advance in the formation of Brown's men. Over the memorable battle, and by the Brown rabble in the box.

"Fire," commands Prescott and the Minutemen obey. Down goes the front rank of the advancing redcoats back into the ranks behind them. The British fire. The Minutemen fire. Down goes the front rank of the Minutemen back into the ranks behind them. The British fire. While the redcoats march through Warren, but the Yankees contested a stand in the village of Charlestown. Behind the fields in and behind the stone walls of Charlestown, Bunker Hill, Prescott and Pitcairn, Warren, Pulaski, Kosciusko, Lafayette and Rochambeau and the other striking figures of the

And another scene has been added to "America."

Although, because the march of years and events, bringing modern surroundings to the battlefields of the Revolution, forced Griffith to take many of his larger scenes in this manner, he and his company have travelled through the country in special cars, taking the massive scenes on the actual sites.

Thus he and his company visited Lexington and Concord, where members of the Minutemen, descendants of the original heroes, dressed in their picturesque costumes were used as extra people. Paul Revere's ride was restaged on the road over which Revere actually made his famous nocturnal journey. The hanging of the lanterns in the Old North Church was redone in its original settings, and John Adams and Hancock were visited by the Hancock-Clarke house.

Thence Griffith and his players sped by special train southward through New York to the principal points of historic interest in New York and New Jersey, and on to Washington, and into Virginia.

The shrines of liberty around the National Capital were used. Lentions for numerous scenes. Then needing horsemen to portray Morgan's raiders, Griffith called upon the famous Third Cavalry, Fort Myers, crack mounted company of the Army.

With the same good [illegible] willingness displayed by Major Arthur Warren, and Colonel G. Fund, in command of the detachments sent from Forts Slocum and Schuyler and from Governors Island to make the battle scenes at Slocum, Major Walsenright, the Secretary of War Weeks, personally placed the resources of Griffith's crew, the special [illegible] around the various and [illegible] of the celebrated Slocum.

Colonel Hawkins, commander of Fort Myers, gave valuable assistance to Griffith's military advisers in use of the White Brown staff of [illegible] which [illegible] Revolutionary [illegible]

By through Griffith's [illegible] and his engineers, [illegible] Brown Bird [illegible] Washington, to the Brown [illegible] and Richmond military [illegible] [illegible] of [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"AMERICA" IS ACCURATE FROM HISTORICAL STAND

Griffith Used Relics of the American Revolution in Making Film

When the Daughters of the American Revolution requested D. W. Grifith to make "America," his photodramatic masterpiece of the War of Independence, which will have its premiere at the Academy of Music, beginning Thursday evening, also Friday and Saturday afternoons and evenings, the first thing he did was to send research experts to Boston to study the authentic records of the beginning of this country's struggles for freedom.

The D. A. R. wanted "America," as its contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the Revolution, and as such Grifith wanted to make his film absolutely accurate from the historical standpoint.

The research experts secured the co-operation of the Massachusetts Historical society, the Lexington Historical society, the Boston Athenaeum and other organizations to such an extent that they not only aided in the difficult task of uncovering long hidden Revolutionary history, but also loaned invaluable relics for use as properties in the picture.

Carol Dempster in "America."

Because of their courtesy Griffith was enabled to take many "shots" for "America," on the acutal sites, and to use such valuable relics as the drum actually beaten at the battle of Lexington, Major Pitcairn's pistols, and original flint locks and powder horns which figured in the famous engagement on Lexington green, where 70 colonists stood their ground against 800 trained British redcoats.

One extremely interesting scene shows State street, then King street, as it appeared in 1775, with the old state house in the background. The set for this scene, which modern buildings made it impossible to erect on the actual site, was reconstructed under the direction of expert historians, with the aid of maps, plans and engravings found by local historical societies.

Buffalo Ny News April 19 1924

[illegible] HEAD GREATEST VILLAIN OF COLONIES

[illegible] Griffith Picture Robbery [illegible] Walter Butler

[illegible]

Boston Transcript

[illegible]

[illegible] Film [illegible]

Moore Weekly (NY) April 19 1924

Woman's greatest Possession
Neil HAMILTON tells what it is Handsome young leading man of D. W. Griffith's "America" discusses fair sex and describes what is their rarest charm

By Regina Cannon

IS IT her beautiful eyes that he remembers? Is it the elusive dimple in her cheek that stays in his thoughts after the party is over and he has seen her to her doorstep? Or is it her vivacity and pep that he enjoys reflecting on—the thing that makes her "different" from any other girl in the whole wide world.

The boy next door may count beauty as woman's greatest possession; the young man across the street may root for personality, but Neil Hamilton, handsomest and most talented of the younger movie actors, says: "Graciousness is the thing!"

We were in a little nook just off the main dining room at the Algonquin, eating nut sandwiches and drinking Orange Pekoe. It was four o'clock and all New York, it seemed, was strolling in for its afternoon tea. We looked around anxiously to see all the celebrities we could discover.

"There's Ernest Torrence," we announced triumphantly.

"And," declared Mr. Hamilton, "there's Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford. There," he reflected, "is a symbol of 'graciousness'—Miss Pickford, I mean."

That being an indisputable fact, we turned our attention to getting Mr. Hamilton to talk about the fair sex.

"I like little girls," said Neil, "dainty, truly feminine girls—the clinging vine type. Please do not confuse this sort of girl with the dumb-bell. Nothing is worse or less interesting than dull, vapid, senseless human beings, and in this particular class of morons, the men out-number the girls."

This last statement greatly met with our approval, and then and there we raised our glass—of water—and toasted Mr. Hamilton. He's a clever, discerning young man and we'll never miss a picture he appears in.

"I like the old-fashioned girl," continued Neil enthusiastically. "There's probably nothing new or original in that statement. Lots of fellows say it for print. I say it because I mean it. I like a girl who is not too independent, who does not say, 'I'm perfectly capable of taking care of myself.' Of course, she is, or should be, in this year of 1924."

"Having apparently attained the use of reason," we supplied, "and the streets all being consecutively numbered."

"A woman may be beautiful, charming and clever," said Mr. Hamilton, "but if she lacks graciousness, she won't get very far in the world."

"Exactly," agreed Mr. Hamilton. "One usually takes for granted that a young woman is capable of looking after herself, so why announce it? That's when it becomes a question.

"A woman's greatest possession is, as I said before, graciousness. She may be beautiful, she may be charming, she may be clever, but if she lacks that paramount of all attributes—graciousness—she won't get very far in the social or business world. She won't be able to hold her friends after she gets them."

NOW we know why we lack friends. It is not, as we thought, a matter for us to take up with the Book of Etiquette. We could learn to remedy our fault from the interesting young man sitting opposite.

"What," we asked anxiously, "is the definition of 'graciousness?'"

Mr. Hamilton didn't hesitate a second. "Graciousness," he said, "is the ability to meet people on their own level. In other words, to make men and women feel comfortable and 'at home' when in your presence. It is 'to do and say the kindest thing in the kindest way.' Please don't think I'm handing out any Pollyanna stuff. I'm not.

"If, for instance, a girl is dining with a young man who isn't able to afford to take her to the hotel or restaurant he'd like to, she should make the best of it. She should not, as some girls do, take on a patronizing, supercilious air as if to say, 'My heavens, do such places really exist? It is really interesting to see how the other half live!'

"Please get me right. No girl would ever say as much to her escort, but she would act it, and remember the old one about actions speaking louder than words. The poor fellow would almost die of embarrassment and mortification and feel that he never should have invited her to share a dull, boring evening such as he could only afford to give her.

"IF a girl's only reason for going out with a man is to get him to spend money on her, she should stay at home. If she doesn't feel a genuine interest in the young man and find pleasure in his society, she ought to look about for someone who could interest her."

"Heavens!" we exclaimed. "Are all girls bad?"

"No girls are bad," said Mr. Hamilton thoughtfully. "They just have a tendency to be a little bit careless about another's feelings. It is, however, a fault that can be readily corrected if the young woman in question has any desire to 'get over it.'"

Mr. Hamilton asked us please not to quote him verbatim on this subject and we're afraid we've broken our promise to him. He said the girls would all be sore at him if they heard him "preach" about their shortcomings. He did promise, however, in our next interview with him, to lay the law down to the men. He has a few "nifties" he'd like to pull on them, too.

Neil Hamilton, who is the featured player in "America," Griffith's latest triumph, is, as we've said, a young actor of marked ability, charm and personality. Seldom has it been our pleasure to find a young man, who has attained so much popularity, so unspoiled. His first dramatic experience was with a stock company, where it was all he could do to make ends meet. A stock company's repertoire is very varied, of course, and there are always weeks when any one of the actors doesn't fit into a role. And so with Mr. Hamilton. The stock company would frequently present plays in which there was no part for him—and, of course, no salary. So he was always skating on the thin edge of starvation.

From there he finally turned in desperation to the insurance business, for which he was not at all suited. Finally, he went back to his professional career, where, of necessity, he posed for commercial advertising pictures—hats, collars and things like that.

It was at this point in his career that Mr. Griffith saw him—and when Mr. Griffith takes an actor or actress under his wing, it is the first milestone toward real success. It is this milestone which Neil Hamilton has at last reached and, personally, we predict that it will not be long before his name becomes a by-word with the fans.

Camden (N J) Courier Post Telegram 4/19/24

GEO. WASHINGTON WAS SIX FEET TALL

David Wark Griffith Confirms Size of the Father of His Country

DEWEY'S MEASUREMENTS ARE ALSO IDENTICAL

Official confirmation of the size and stature of George Washington was obtained by David Wark Griffith, when the producer of "America," visited Valley Forge as the guest of Rev. W. Herbert Burk, president of the Valley Forge Memorial Association.

Many historians contended that Washington was more than six feet tall and of corpulent form. Griffith's research workers, seeking authentic data for "America," with which photoplay the Daughters of the American Revolution planned to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country, learned from Washington's own letters to his London tailor that he was exactly six feet tall and of medium girth. Arthur Dewey, who plays Washington in "America," was selected not only because of his striking facial resemblance to the Father of America, but also because his measurements were identical with Washington's according to the latter's own letters.

Some persons throughout the country took issue with Griffith and his research workers on the question. In the museum of the memorial at Valley Forge, however, are preserved the riding breeches worn by Washington at Valley Forge, and measurement of these proved conclusively to Griffith that his research department had been correct.

During his tour of Valley Forge, Griffith decorated the grave of the unknown soldier of the Revolution, and also the shrine in the handsome Gothic memorial chapel, containing the bronze statue of Washington.

Griffith was impressed by the little chapel as being the most beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture to be seen in the world [illegible] most [illegible] Europe.

Washington (DC) Times April 19 1924

LIONEL BARRYMORE and CAROL DEMPSTER in "AMERICA", Poli's.

My Post April 19 1924

CHARLES MACK, CAROL DEMPSTER and ERVILLE ALDERSON in "AMERICA" at the 44th Street Theatre

Norwich (Conn) Record 4/19/24

Greenfield (Mass) Recorder 4/19/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" AT NORTHAMPTON, APR. 24

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "America," the photoplay of the Revolutionary War, is announced for three days at the Academy of Music, Northampton, beginning Thursday evening, April 24.

Still in the midst of an extended run on Broadway, the picture has received the enthusiastic praise of prominent critics as one of the most striking screen masterpieces of all time, and the screen adaptation of the master director is promised here problems to be the most perfect screen play of the period.

"America" is the story, in terms of a romance of Revolutionary days, of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, the Adams, Patrick Henry, Lafayette and many great Patriots of the period. Starring in a great cast of prominent players, the production is said to be the most pretentious ever made by the Griffith organization.

Chicago (Ill) News 4/19/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/19/24

Norwich (Conn) Record 4/21/24

Broadway Theatre.

"AMERICA." D. W. Griffith's screen epic of the War of American Independence, described as the supreme effort of this great director and one of the outstanding film masterpieces of all time, will have its local premiere at the Broadway for three days beginning tonight with matinee tomorrow and Wednesday.

"America" is undoubtedly one of the most significant films ever made. Not only is it story the true history of America's struggle for liberty, but the settings are the actual locale of the scene of the events of the most glorious chapters of America's history.

For once Griffith has been prepared to make a film drama with the American Revolution. He had assembled a wealth of data and had been prepared a score. But the practical formula with the Daughters of the American Revolution, making the drama of nothing a commercial success, prevented him from carrying the idea of filming the Revolution. Instead he turned to the Civil War and produced "The Birth of a Nation."

Baltimore Sun April 20 1924

A [illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger April 19 1924

Toledo (Ohio) Blade 4/19/24

Camden (N J) Courier 4/19/24

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger April 20 1924

Boston Advertiser 4/20/24

Norwich (Conn) Bulletin

Boston (Mass) Traveler 4/19/24

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Griffith Unknown Washington Dies

Baltimore Sun 4/19/24

Boston College Heights 4/19/24

Baltimore (Md) News April 19 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press April 20 1924

Baltimore News' Newsies See America

MAYOR AND "SEE AMERICA" BOYS

Mayor Jackson addressed The Baltimore News boys before they marched in a giant parade to the Academy of Music to see Griffith's movie masterpiece, "America," as the guests of Baltimore's best newspaper. The boys marched to the theatre, and stopped traffic and, probably for the first time in the history of the city, nobody minded.

TROMBONE KID LEADS PARADE

Traffic Is Forced to Suspend as Circulation Manager Takes Cohorts to Theatre.

Hot dog! Tell us! It was some pe-e-e-rade!

V. Snyder, Circulation Manager of The Baltimore News, said so. And V. Snyder knows. And even if V. Snyder didn't know, nobody in Baltimore could have seen that pe-e-e-rade and doubted that it was anything but a knockout success.

All the boys were there, about 1500 of them, including the "Sheiks of Pennsylvania Avenue." A miniature Uncle Sam, tall as a yard stick, and carrying an American flag in one hand and a tin trombone in the other, led them all.

Two mounted policemen cleared the way. All the traffic cops turned their Stop-Stop signs to Go-Go. The United Railways shut down. The Fayette street buses shut off their engines. Everything on Baltimore and Howard streets got out of the boys' way.

Mayor Is There.

Before they left City Hall plaza, just as Big Ben was booming off 8 o'clock, up came Mayor Jackson. Eight o'clock's pretty early for a Mayor to be getting down to business, and he said he missed his second cup of coffee so as to be there on time. He said:

"Boys, I'm sure you'd be able to sell more papers if you made this much noise on the street. I'm afraid you won't be able to hear what I say, but I don't blame you. I used to get up at 4 o'clock in the morning and sell papers myself."

The Mayor bowed and the boys gave him a great hand, augmented by a great howl of approval. Then the band struck up that "Linger Awhile" and the boys never hesitated. They set out two by two for the Academy, where, as the guests of The Baltimore News and D. W. Griffith, they were to see "America."

The first part of the column reached the Academy before the last part had left the Plaza. They filled the downstairs and the first balcony. V. Snyder made them a speech and they sang "America."

After that the other "America" flashed on the screen. When Paul Revere came thundering down the Concord road the boys gave a shout almost loud enough to be heard round the world. And when General Gage's red-coated grenadiers stormed Bunker Hill the boys couldn't wait until they saw the whites of the enemies' eyes before cutting loose.

Take it from us, it was a grand and glorious show.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA IS FEATURED IN "AMERICA"

By Burt McMurtrie.

PITTSBURGH when "Grant's Hill," the present site of the Court House and City-County buildings, was but a much-ambushed "hump" when from Garrison alley to Ninth st., and from Liberty to the Allegheny river was but a fortification known as Fort Lafayette; when the famous old Blockhouse that now stands upon the point as a monument to the achievements of our forefathers, a vast, wooded country settled with a hardy God-fearing people, who pushed forward into a great, strange land, seeking homes and a livelihood, despite the ferocious onslaughts of barbarous Indians and unscrupulous white men, such is the Pittsburgh brought to mind with the viewing of David Wark Griffith's historical epic of the photoplay world, "America," which recently opened in this city.

Those who know their history and are acquainted with the early days of Pennsylvania, the struggles and hardships suffered that this great industrial center of today might exist, have found considerable fascination in the film production, which Mr. Griffith seems to have produced with remarkable consistency and faithfulness to the actual locations and historical incidents.

INDIANS AT CAMPFIRES.

Where Killbuck, White Eyes, Shingis and Cornstalk, famous Indian chiefs, once lit their camp-fires and held eloquent councils with Jumonville, De Ligneris and Bouquet, Hibernians and Italians now inhabit the fields and river banks and instead of the echoes of the English drums, Scottish bagpipes and clash of arms upon the scarred sides of Mt. Washington and Duquesne Heights, can be heard the steam whistle and hollow reverberations of neighboring boiler shops. Squalid tenements crowd the narrow promontory where Robert de la Salle stood at the headwaters of the Ohio, in all probability the discoverer of the three rivers. The fort that Pontiac beseiged has disappeared. The painted post to which the Indian tied his victim, the wigwam, the wampum belts have vanished. Where today the thrifty housewife in Fort st., or Point alley and in the shadow of the Block House itself, may been seen doing their week's washing in front of their houses, little do they think of those Monday mornings when the women of the fort were escorted by bands of soldiers to the banks of the Allegheny, there to do their laundry. Julia Morgan Harding has written of these days in absorbing fashion to thousands of Pittsburghers familiar with her history of Pittsburgh's early life.

HOTBED OF BRUTALITY.

Western Pennsylvania was a hotbed of brutality and ferocious for many years, the Indians the central figures in the pursuit of inhuman treatment, goaded on to their unspeakable deeds by designing French and English, whose unscrupulous methods wrought havoc everywhere.

Possession of the Point, that place where the Monongahela and Allegheny rivers unite to form the Ohio, was the basis of this trouble, the French and the English battling for years over its possession. Forts were built, only to be destroyed, whole districts were razed in a single night, thousands of persons were killed, men and boys tortured beyond all [illegible] ing, and the same treatment dealt to their wives and daughters who were either killed or carried off by the redskins.

Mr. Griffith in his picture has shown in amazing manner the treatment dealt the colonists by the English and Indians during the Revolutionary period. Instigated by the agents of Great Britain, it was not long before a deadly struggle was on. Scalping parties of Indians ravaged the frontier, sparing neither age nor sex, and burning and destroying all that came in their path. Companies were formed to protect the settlements, whose headquarters were at Fort Pitt, and expeditions were made into the enemy's country, but with no very great success. Farms were burned to the ground, the farmers and their families forced to flee to the protecting shelter of the fort to escape the scalping parties.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA IN FILM.

Some idea of the despair and horror that filled the lives of our fathers of America can be gained in the viewing of "America." Mr. Griffith has taken the western Pennsylvania section, its trials and struggles, as one of the most important locales of his film. The rush of the people to the fort, the storming of the great wooden structure, the unspeakable despair and terror are all pictured by Mr. Griffith who has undoubtedly presented one of the greatest, if not the greatest historical feature ever produced.

In this picture he has shown Washington, Father of our Country, in this district. And the famous general was a visitor to Pittsburgh several times, his perilous crossing of the Allegheny an oft-told tale in these sections. Washington came to Pittsburgh as early as December 11, 1753, bearer of a letter from Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia to the commander of Fort LaBoeuf, on the site of what is now called French Creek. It was on his return from this trip that Washington twice escaped death. First from the gun of a French Indian and second in attempting to cross the Allegheny, which was filled with ice, on a raft that he and his companions had hastily constructed with the help of one hatchet between them. He was thrown into the river and narrowly escaped drowning. The party landed on Wainwright's Island, about opposite the foot of Thirty-third st. On making his report Washington recommended that a fort be built at the "Forks of the Ohio."

Pittsburghers will find Mr. Griffith's picturization of this section and the forts remarkably fascinating. The film holds double interest in that it does so consistently and faithfully present just those incidents which all true Pittsburghers cherish in their hearts as the history of the "Industrial Center of the World."

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 4/20/24

How Butler Took Part in Revolution

Robert W. Chambers Made Research to Discover Truth About Despicable Character.

CAPTAIN WALTER BUTLER, who appears in the D. W. Griffith picture, "America," at the Chestnut Street Opera House, has been branded as one of the most astonishing villains in all the history of this country. The role is played by that eminent actor, Lionel Barrymore, and he has made it an outstanding characterization—cordially hated by every loyal American who sees the picture thrown upon the screen.

For the wealth of detail that is given to the portrayal of the character Barrymore stands indebted to a large extent to Robert W. Chambers, the American novelist, who wrote the story that was used by Griffith in his screen presentation. Chambers is a close student of American history and he is particularly an authority on matters pertaining to the Revolutionary war in its conduct in the upper part of the State of New York. His country home is in that section and he has made a thorough tour of the country, following Indian trails, visiting principal scenes of attack and foray and assembling a vast stock of information through the collection of original documents, private letters, etc.

"Concerning this strange, sinister and unhappy young man," Chambers wrote in commenting upon Captain Butler, "the greatest of our historians, Fisk, remarks that he has been unable to discover in the character of Walter Butler a single redeeming trait." Naturally such a sweeping statement gave cue to Harrymore and in "America" it seems as though the Chambers denunciation, as remarked by Fisk, has not been without result. At the same time Chambers modified the statement as follows: "This seems to be too severe a judgment. In my possession is a letter written by Walter Butler to Peter Van Schaick which reveals in the writer both kindness and generosity. Otherwise the letter is characteristic of the young man, for, presently, he dies into a rage against some man who he believes has treated him with discourtesy. I think that Harold Frederick gave a true glimpse of Walter Butler—a momentary glimpse—but convincing.

"From what we know about young Walter Butler he was, in person, attractive; in mind, accomplished. His intense loyalty to his cause became an obsession. It amounted to madness—if indeed, the seeds of madness had not already germinated in this melancholy and disappointed young companion of Sir John Johnson. The debauchery of these two sons of the Tyron county landed gentry covered a trail that led from New York to Albany, to Schenectady, to Johnstown and to Quebec. There was, socially, no memory record; but there is no reason for going into it here. It may be that excesses unhinged Butler. His pride in his ancestry and connections, if indeed there were really such a descent, made him haughty, exacting and abnormally sensitive. For the rest, he was an exaggerated character of a poetic temperament wholly wrapped up in himself, a neurotic easily unhinged by excessive, swiftly inflamed to violence by fancied neglect or insult.

After his escape from imprisonment in Albany, the terrible directness of the [illegible] note to the American military [illegible] revealed the savage fire [illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger April 20 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Press April 20 1924

SCENE FROM "AMERICA" PITT

Buffalo (NY) Courier 4/20/1924

D. W. GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" OPENS AT TECK TONIGHT

Coming Attraction, Channing Pollock's "The Fool."

It is one thing to take a battle scene for a motion picture. And it is another thing to take a scene of battles of Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill, and make those scenes historically correct. But that, according to Edwin H. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical society, is what D. W. Griffith has done in "America," which will have its premiere at the Shubert-Teck tonight.

Mr. Worthen, who is a banker in Lexington, aided through the loan of historical data, and of invaluable Revolutionary relics, including the drum, flintlocks, powder horns and other implements actually used in the battle of Lexington, in making "America," which Griffith produces for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their Bicentennial celebration of the fifty American colonists who fell in the world premiere of the picture in New York.

Following this he said in his confession: "I am at a loss for words to express how deeply impressed I am with the picture. I had seen one and [illegible] of Lexington and Concord, and knew how accurately Griffith had [illegible]

Nashville (Tenn) Tennessean 4/20/24

WASHINGTON WAS SIX FEET TALL, PROVE!!

Measurement Proven in Research for Picture, "America."

Official confirmation of the size and status of George Washington was obtained by Dixie Walk Griffith, when the producer of "America," called Valley Forge as the guest of Rev. W. Herbert Burk, president of the Valley Forge Historical Association. Mr. Burk was convinced that Washington was more than six feet tall and of proportionate bulk, thus dispelling authentic data in the Griffith studios, Burk, in a letter to Griffith, said: "Washington was a giant in his day. He was a giant in his day. He was a giant in his day. He

Washington Star 4/20/24 Baltimore (Md) American April 20 1924

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/20/24

Washington (DC) Star 4/20/24

ARTHUR DEWEY and CAROL DEMPSTER
In the Photoplay "AMERICA" Poli's

CAROL DEMPSTER
IN "AMERICA"
ACADEMY of MUSIC

PITT - "AMERICA" - FILM

Life in Colonial Times.

LIFE in Lexington, Mass., in 1775 was somewhat different from today, according to scenes in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photo drama of the revolution, which President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington Historical Society is said to have declared accurate to the smallest detail.

In colonial days the tax on shoe leather was so high that even the daughters of the well-to-do farmers and villagers were accustomed to walk barefoot to the very edge of the town, in order to save their footgear as much as possible.

It was quite an ordinary sight to see some well dressed young woman sitting on a big rock at the edge of the town putting on her dainty shoes, after having tramped a mile or more barefoot.

In those days Buckman tavern was the chief hostelry of the town, and the rich travelers on their way north or south, their splendid coaches attended by numerous negroes, would pull up there for refreshment for man and beast.

Outside the tavern were usually to be found a group of idlers—males be it noted—smoking their long churchwarden clay pipes and discussing their neighbors' affairs.

The twelve-mile journey to Boston was made on horseback, as a rule, sometimes a whole family, father and mother and one or two children, piling on the back of some heavy, slow-moving, but patient horse, to make the trip.

In "America" Griffith has taken the opportunity to give a sort of panoramic view of the everyday life of the period in Lexington, as well as to show vividly the famous ride of Paul Revere and the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill.

Pittsburgh Pa Gazette-Times April 20 1924

Schenectady (NY) Gazette 4/20/24

"America"

Starting Monday, scenes for "America," D. W. Griffith's photo-drama of revolutionary days, which will come to the Van Curler theater May 1, 2 and 3, Griffith and his players traveled hundreds of miles in a special car, visiting the leading shrines of American history to restage historic events. They visited Lexington, Concord, Philadelphia, Washington, Yorktown and historic spots in Western New York.

STRAND

Thomas Meighan appears in "The

Boston Mass Post April 20 1924

Harry Oneill as Paul Revere and scene from D.W. Griffith's "AMERICA" - FILM

Washington (DC) Herald 4/20/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE IN "AMERICA" POLI'S

Washington Herald 4/20/24

Griffith's Snow Arrived, Averting Film Disaster

WITH a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture, "America," which opens at Poli's tomorrow evening.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights where the American army actually encamped during the Revolution. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the day of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States army, two companies of infantry from Governors Island had been waiting under instructions all that time for the first snowflakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north to the snow line for the Valley Forge scenes.

The weather man and fate carried the suspense to within forty-eight hours of disaster before obliging with a real snow that will carry the bloody footprints of Valley Forge into "America."

Additional interest attaches to the first Washington presentation of "America" tomorrow evening, in appreciation and recognition of the generous co-operation and aid extended to him by Government officials and in Washington and vicinity during the making of the film, Mr. Griffith has donated the first performance in its entirety for the benefit of the patients at Walter Reed Hospital.

This special performance is under the patronage of a distinguished group of Washington women, headed by Mrs. Calvin Coolidge and including Mrs. Charles E. Hughes, Mrs. John W. Weeks, Mrs. Curtis D. Wilbur, Mrs. Harry New, Mrs. Hubert Work, Mrs. James J. Davis, Mrs. Henry C. Wallace and others of equal prominence. Miss Carol Dempster, who plays the principal feminine role in "America," will be present at the first Washington performance.

Washington DC Star 4/20/24

Poli's—Griffith's "America"

FOR those born in another land interest, excitement and information are promised in D. W. Griffith's patriotic romance "America," which will be shown at Poli's Theater beginning Monday evening.

This picture shows the sacrifices which the early Americans made that this should be a country of the free. To present this most dramatic of stories in an interesting way, Mr. Griffith has arranged an impassioned and romantic love story with the events of the war of 1776 as a background.

The dramatic critics of New York and Boston agreed in their comments that it is one of the most thrilling and patriotic motion pictures ever made. Mr. Griffith, among directors, possesses eminent ability to present the delights of first love, and build a driving suspense through his stories to make them moving and hold the interest.

In this picture the theater goes to the beautiful daughter of the Virginia aristocrat and the handsome cavalier officer from France. This romance, the super-lover, is the central theme of the picture, while the American patriot, who leads the Revolutionary army, is seen in the role of the English officer, who, without leaving and ruins in their determination, "the cause of liberty" and "Washington and Liberty" are the cries of the American army. Lionel Barrymore, who plays the part of the English officer, is the star of the Lionel Barrymore Film Company and is well known to the public.

Pittsburgh Pa Press April 20 1924

Shubert-Teck

D. W. Griffith's Great Silver Screen Spectacle, "America."

When the Daughters of the American Revolution requested D. W. Griffith to make "America," his photodramatic masterpiece of the War of Independence, which will have its premiere at the Shubert-Teck Theater tonight, the first thing he did was to send research experts to Boston to study the authentic records of the beginnings of this country's struggles for freedom.

The D. A. R. wanted "America" as its contribution to the Sesquicentennial celebration of the Revolution, and as such Griffith wanted to make his film absolutely accurate from the historical standpoint.

The research expert secured the co-operation of the Massachusetts Historical Society, the Lexington Historical Society, the Boston Athenaeum and other organizations to such an extent that they not only aided in the difficult task of uncovering long hidden Revolutionary history, but also loaned invaluable relics for use as properties in the picture.

Because of their courtesy Griffith was enabled to take many "shots" and for "America," on the actual sites, and to use such valuable relics as the drum actually beaten at the battle of Lexington, Major Pitcairn's pistols, and original flint locks and powder horns which figured in the famous engagement on Lexington green, where 70 colonists stood their ground against 800 trained British redcoats.

One extremely interesting scene shows State Street—then King Street—as it appeared in 1776, with the old State House in the background. The set for this scene—which modern buildings made it impossible to take on the actual site—was reconstructed under the direction of several Romanesque, with the aid of maps, plans and engravings loaned by local historical organizations.

Baltimore (Md) American 4/20/24

Buffalo (NY) Times 4/20/24

On the other hand, no one has written to chide me for my enthusiastic reactions to D. W. Griffith's "America," which, tomorrow, enters upon the second week of its run at the Academy. Last Tuesday morning I wrote that this romantic-historical melodrama is the real thing. Having seen it for a second time, I agree with myself entirely. It's a fine achievement, a credit to everyone concerned.

Here, at least, I can concur with the aforesaid Quinn Martin, who says that "America" is a motion-picture which will set a new standard of achievement. If, like Mr. Martin, I have been a little uncertain in the matter of pre-eminence in the directing field, I now know that it has been because of Mr. Griffith's filmic pot-boiling with such unworthy offerings as "One Exciting Night" and the likes of that.

Any man who can turn out "The Birth of a Nation," which, to my mind, has never been equaled; "Broken Blossoms," the most moving photodrama I have ever seen, and "America," is worthy of the highest praise. In the picture at the Academy, there is history, there is romance, there is any amount of visual beauty. Mr. Griffith has combined the three with knowing hand. He knows his business.

In an article written by Robert W. Chambers, the scenarist of "America," for the New York World Mr. Chambers says that the picture at the Academy is not a history of the English occupation of America, not even a narrative of the Revolutionary struggle for liberty. What he and Mr. Griffith attempted to do was "to show something of the devotion and self-sacrifice of those who established our Republic."

Robert W. Chambers goes on to say that, in these days of unrest, we Americans ought to remember what it cost to win our freedom and establish this Government. Both he and Mr. Griffith believe that our liberty, won through years of untold suffering and self-sacrifice, is worth preserving, worth guarding from secret and insidious attacks at home, worth defending against treachery and overt aggression from without our gates.

"LET US FORGET" is the keynote of "America." "Be it remembered" is its running mate. So when it became known that Mr. Griffith and Mr. Chambers began to receive cordial encouragement from Federal and State authorities and from patriotic societies everywhere throughout the nation. The United States Army offered a regular regiment to fight the good fight again at Bunker Hill and Johnson Hill.

One reads that "they lacked enough in their British and Continental uniforms." After a few rehearsals they turned in quite well with the aid of the news that they actually fought at Valley Forge. Capture some parts in a night, and the pace of the revolution thereafter. It must have been a thrilling night to see Washington's army of starved shivering ragamuffins on Bunker Hill, Hope Hill, Brooks Marine, Fort Sullivan in short hands.

It is interesting to recall how Lionel W. Barrymore, who plays the part of Griffith's master of tactics, Lord Cornwallis, and who is well known in Pittsburgh, and who is a member of the Lionel Barrymore Film Company and is well known to the public, is the brother of John Barrymore, the great Hamlet of the stage.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/20/24

PHOTOPLAY MASTERPIECE REMAINS AT THE PITT

Baltimore (Md) American April 20

Baltimore (Md) Sun 4/20/24

GRIFFITH FILM TO STAY AT PITT FOURTH WEEK

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/20/24

PATRIOTIC BODIES TO ATTEND "AMERICA"

Easter week will be the occasion of many patriotic gatherings at the Majestic in honor of D. W. Griffith and his latest picture achievement, "America." The D. A. R.; G. A. R.; American Legion; Camp Fire Girls and groups of Boy and Girl Scouts have reserved blocks of seats for performances during the week.

Portland (Me) Telegram 4/20/24

Neil Hamilton, who scored a success in D. W. Griffith's "America," is playing a juvenile lead in "The Mountebank," the Paramount picture which Herbert Brenon is producing.

Washington (DC) Post 4/20/24

MAJESTIC THEATRE

Easter week will be the occasion of many patriotic gatherings at the Majestic in honor of D. W. Griffith and his latest picture achievement, "America." The army and navy (Hyde Park Garrison) will celebrate with a party of newly-made life members Tuesday evening. The D. A. R., G. A. R., American Legion, Camp Fire Girls and groups of Boy and Girl Scouts and C. A. R. have reserved blocks of seats for performances during the week.

Baltimore American 4/20/24

CAROL DEMPSTER
IN "AMERICA"
ACADEMY of MUSIC

Boston Mass Advertiser 4/20/24

Washington (DC) Herald 4/20/24

In "America"

Commander J. J. Gahan Issues Call to Members to Aid in Getting Capacity Audiences for Griffith's Newest Film, April 28.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun April 9 1924

Have Leading In Film "America" Now at the Pitt

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/20/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 4/20/24

Liberty Digest (NYC) 4/5/24

LETTERS · AND · ART

LITERATURE DRAMA MUSIC FINE-ARTS EDUCATION CULTURE

REDCOATS AND REDSKINS IN THE VALLEY!

Settlers at Fort Sacrifice holding the granary of our Revolution against Butler's Tories and Mohawks. Sacrifice is the keynote of "America."

GALLOPING THROUGH THE REVOLUTION

A GALLANT WHITE-FACED CHESTNUT, named Leaping Danger (or Laugh-a-Ballagh in his native hunting county in Ireland) appears to be the star of David Wark Griffith's first instalment of "America." Next to him comes his imperturbable rider, Harry O'Neil, who for his "Ride of Paul Revere" is placed by enthusiastic movie critics ahead even of such horsemen as Tom Mix and William S. Hart. Longfellow's "hurry of hoofs in the village street, a shape in the moonlight, a bulk in the dark," is visualized under the alchemy of Mr. Griffith, in a superb Irish hunter, beautifully ridden, who has brought every first-night audience of the film up shouting with excitement.

More daring feats, says one critic, may have been seen upon the screen, but none in which the audience seemed so swept away, as horse and rider went tearing to Lexington and Concord to warn the patriots. Another critic in the New York Times adds that no one who views this marvelous section of the production will ever forget Paul Revere's ride, or how man and horse took stone walls and hedges, leaped clean of nasty ravines, and won in the end, by a real exhibition of nerve and skill. Practically every other critic comments on the peculiar thrill of this "perfect movie episode." The effect of this spectacular dash, suggests the New York Herald critic, lies in the combination of artistry with tremendous historical significance. He terms it "perhaps the most 'thrilling episode the silent drama has ever achieved." Motion-pictures have been featuring wild rides for years, but nothing, other critics agree, has ever had quite the same heart-shaking effect on an audience. It only goes to show, points out one, the grasp of psychology shown by the director in realizing that just as Longfellow said:

> Through all our history to the last,
> . . . . . .
> The people will waken and listen to hear
> The hurrying hoof-beats of that steed
> And the midnight message of Paul Revere.

So much for the big episode of what is regarded by many newspaper writers as Mr. Griffith's most ambitious attempt to recreate on a panoramic scale one of the great periods of American history. The obvious comparison, of course, is with this same director's "Birth of a Nation" of ten years ago. "America," say many of them, is a far greater picture (tho there is little improvement in the battle scenes) and, indeed, it has a better right to be called the "Birth of a Nation" than the other.

"A living, breathing document of the sacrifice and idealism of the men who freed America," is the New York Evening Journal's characterization of the result. In the same vein, the critic of the New York Evening Telegram and Mail says that "to the student of history 'America' will be an inspiration; to the school boy, it will be an education, and to the man ignorant of his country's early struggles, it will be a revelation." Mr. Griffith comes in for the usual bouquets, and one critic in the New York World even goes so far as to say that with this production he "passes definitely into the ranks of those whom we think of as being immortals."

The most comprehensive summary of the film as a whole, from this same laudatory angle, is given by Thomas B. Hanly in the New York Morning Telegraph. After adding to the nosegays with the statement that "America" is a "masterpiece of exquisite photography and flawless direction," he goes on to say:

"Upon a screen of well-nigh limitless dimensions the man has projected the immortal story of the sacrifices of the American Colonists to win freedom from the British Crown, and he or Robert W. Chambers, the author, has interwoven in it all the love romance of a Tory maid for a patriot soldier and officer as it was beset by the machinations of Walter Butler.

"Around this story he has thrown the great scenes which brought cheers from the audience. You see Patrick Henry defying King George at Williamsburg, and a meeting of the Sons of Liberty in Boston. George Washington, John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Jefferson, John Adams pass before you, and you shift to England, the palace of King George III, or Parliament with Pitt and Edmund Burke pleading for moderation in dealing with the Colonies.

"You have Paul Revere's ride and the wonderful fight at Lexington and Concord. There is Bunker Hill and Valley Forge, the first Continental Congress and the Declaration of Independence, the march of the Washington Army south and the surrender of Cornwallis.

"Mr. Griffith introduces his audience to a company of very effective, most efficient players, even if he does not disclose any who seem likely to rank with the stars he has made in the past. Lionel Barrymore, as Butler, does some of the best work of his career, and Louis Wolheim, as Captain Hare, a villainous British aide of Butler, is devilish enough to suit anybody. Words of praise, as a matter of fact, must be said for the entire large cast."

Quite another point of view is represented by Robert E. Sherwood, writing in the New York Herald. After adding plaudits of praise for Paul Revere's ride which received and well-earned he has never heard in a movie theatre applause, too, he continues—formula has been reversed. Reapplause comes at the climax.

"In this instance, instead of at Revere's magnificently, Mr. Griffith saves very best for the climax, as he did in 'The Birth of a Nation,' 'Intolerance' and 'Orphans of the Storm.' It is safe to assume that, if D. W. Griffith had staged the Revolution, he would have forced Paul Revere to wait a few years.

"It's too bad he didn't. For, after the battles of Lexington and Concord, 'America' resolves itself into a mammoth and thoroughly lamentable anti-climax. There are subsequent moments of greatness—notably in the scenes at Valley Forge—but the general trend of Mr. Griffith's spectacle is down-hill. The later reels are incoherent and wearisome and the finish extremely flat.

"During the course of 'America,' Mr. Griffith turns more and more from history to fiction. At the start he introduces a number of characters who are obviously destined to carry the story with its incidental love interest. For a while these romantic people do not intrude too heavily upon the vastly more important drama in which they are called upon to play a part. But their prominence increases steadily, and in the latter half of the picture George Washington has faded into the background.

"The picture is evidently the first of a series which will ultimately carry Mr. Griffith through the entire course of American history. We hope that next time he selects a war in which the punch is delivered at the finish."

"LEAPING DANGER"

In the "heart-shaking" ride of Paul Revere.

Few critics are as harsh as this, but both the New York Times and The Tribune seem to feel that in the later reels of this production the villainy of Walter Butler is shown in far too much detail, as is also the fighting in the Mohawk Valley. Both make considerable distinction between Part I of America and Part II. Part I they characterize as superb, and admit that Mr. Griffith's method of obtaining suspense by cutting from one scene to another, then to a third scene, and eventually back to the first episode, is justified with the audience. But in Part II, as The Tribune puts it, Mr. Griffith's enemy begins to whisper at his elbow suggesting: "Suspense—hold your spectators in suspense. Make that scene longer—keep going back to it—make your characters suffer a lot, and your spectators will suffer with them." Only, says the critic, "they didn't." The Boston Globe also regretfully wishes that Mr. Griffith had made the second part "as really great in the annals of motion-pictures as the story of the fight against the British in Massachusetts."

In addition to the Paul Revere incident certain features in the pictures seem to stand out in the minds of most critics. The superb photography and the skilled handling of landscape and crowds, result in a series of views some of which have the charm of an etching, some the sweep and lift of a battle-picture by Detaille or Meissonier, and some the reminiscent charm of the historical paintings and engravings of our childhood. The Battle of Bunker Hill and the stirring scenes and gorgeous panoramic views of Lexington and Concord come in for due praise. Especially is the almost technically perfect handling of soldiers on both sides commented upon. It is one of the few productions in movie history, we are told, in which soldiers really look like soldiers, act like soldiers, and march with the practised swing to which the war has accustomed most of us. The reason for this, they say, is doubtless largely due to the fact that Mr. Griffith was loaned a whole regiment of United States Regulars, but even so the very utmost is made of them throughout.

Subsequent comment on the production has been much enlivened by a controversy in the New York Herald between Mr. Sherwood, already quoted, and Robert W. Chambers, who is responsible for the plot of the film. Mr. Sherwood questioned the importance to the Revolution of the warfare in northern New York with which Part II, is so largely occupied. In a spirited reply Mr. Chambers points out that the northern fighting prevented the Colonies from being cut in two, and adds:

"Mr. Griffith and I did not set out to make a picture of America in fourteen reels. A thousand reels could not cover the subject. Nor did we attempt in fourteen reels to make a picture of the American Revolution. What we did attempt to do is this—we tried to picture some of the sacrifices made by our forefathers in a fight for a square deal."

In remaining faithful to his fictional characters and letting them have leeway, notes the New York Journal, Mr. Griffith has made no mention of Benjamin Franklin, Major André, Benedict Arnold, Nathan Hale, Israel Putnam, and other Revolutionary characters of the highest importance. Other critics comment on the omission not only of Lafayette but also of such non-Anglo-Saxon characters as Sullivan, De Kalb, Von Steuben, Kosciusko, Haym Solomon, Herkimer, Pulasky, Marion, Schuyler, Franks, Crispus Attucks, and Montgomery. Here, they say, were Revolutionary characters of French, Irish, Scotch, German, Polish, Jewish, Dutch, Welsh and Negro blood. A wonderful opportunity to show the dissimilar races and types that thus united to form our Continental Army, and won the Revolution, was lost. The obvious answer, of course, has already been made—that Mr. Griffith and Mr. Chambers were not filming a historical essay, but a spectacle which had first of all to pay back the $950,000 alleged to have been spent upon it, and that they had put in all the history they dared.

Perhaps Mr. Griffith knows his public better than the critics, thinks the Journal writer. If he had put in too much history and taken away the story, he might not have had as successful a picture. The President of the Lexington Historical Society is apparently satisfied anyway, for she says:

"God speed you in this glorious work of telling the story of the sacrifices of your forefathers and in your patriotic mission of teaching a higher and a finer Americanism."

Baltimore (Md) Post 4/9/24

STORY OF 'AMERICA' BASED UPON FACTS

Boston Telegram 4/9/24

Our Movie Fans

Telegram 4/12/24

Griffith's "America" at the 44th St. Theatre

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 4/14/24

PLAN LAVISH OPENING

Chicago (Ill) Post

Griffith to Make Film for Italians

The Gem of th

D. W. GRIFFITH'S AT THE 44TH ST

Kansas City (Mo) Star 4/14/24

BODY A MEASURE OF MIN

LENGTH OF LIMBS AN INDEX TO INTELLECT, SCIENTIST SAYS

Buffalo (N.Y.) Courier 4/15/24

Period of George III is Faithfully Reproduced

CAROL DEMPSTER IS STELLAR PERFORMER

Sir Percy Sykes, of London, Eng., former commander in chief of the British forces in Persia, and authority in royal court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in America, the photodrama of the War of Independence, which will have its premiere at the Shubert Teck, Sunday night.

Until Sir Percy, who has been thrice presented at the Court of St. James, as well as at the royal courts of India, Persia and other Eastern countries, volunteered, Griffith and his research workers were at a loss to learn the details of court etiquette in detail.

Just prior to Sir Percy's arrival, Griffith, after months of search, had engaged a foreign actor who bore an uncanny resemblance to the best authenticated pictures of King George III, for that role.

So much did this actor look the part and play it that Sir Percy, a deep student of George's reign, seemed to forget that he was dealing with a modern actor, and when addressing the latter always did so with a deep bow, and with the words, "if his onles in 1775, for despite the voluminous writings of the diarists of that period, none of them described formal court etiquette in detail.

Norwich (Conn) Bulletin 4/16/24

BROADWAY THEATRE

"America", D. W. Griffith's photodramatic epic of the Revolutionary days, which has received the most superlative praise ever accorded any motion picture by the New York critics, will have its Norwich premiere at Broadway theatre, for three days beginning Monday, April 21.

The picture is merely an attempt to suggest the great sacrifice made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. No efforts were spared to have the historical incidents as correct as possible. The villages of Lexington and Concord were designed from authentic drawings and descriptions by writers of the day. The battle lines at Lexington are exact reproductions of the original. In the magnitude of his task, Griffith ever held to historic accuracy with remarkable fidelity.

Audiences are grasped with trembling and thrills as the little village of Lexington, birthplace of American liberty, comes before the eyes, the scenes taken on the very spot where American liberty had its beginning.

Never in filmdom has there been such a spectacle as the ride of Paul Revere. It is the most thrilling episode the screen has ever achieved, without an equal for spectacular dash coupled with tremendous historic significance.

To students of history it will be an inspiration, to the school-boy, it will be an education, and to the man ignorant of the country's early struggles, it will be a revelation.

This great drama will not be seen in any part of this district this year.

BROADWAY THEATRE

Los angeles (Cal) Examiner 4/16/24

Forum Is Built on Modern Lines

THE prologue to the screenplay is at last coming into its own. In the new Forum Theater at Pico and Norton, there will be two stages at either side of the main stage for the presentation of the filmplay preludes. The size, as to width, depth and height of these stages, will permit quite elaborate showings. For instance, when "America," the much talked of D. W. Griffith film, opens at this house about May 8, the prologue will present the address of William Pitt. This will be given from one of the stages by an actor (don't let any press-agent try to tell you that this part of the program will be handled by a "direct descendant" of Pitt himself). He—the impersonator of Pitt—will be surrounded by members of parliament. On the stage opposite him will be more parliamentarians, prepared by proper direction to react with historical accuracy and, one might say, with impressive vividness to Pitt's stirring words.

Carol Dempster has the leading feminine role in this very big motion picture, "America." Her support—and there are a great many actors—is headed by Neil Hamilton and Charles Mack. From Eastern reports, "America" is enjoying a warm approval and [illegible] of New York [illegible].

Norwich (Conn) Bulletin 4/17/24

Broadway Theatre.

Famed in poetry and prose, the historical ride of Paul Revere was never before invested with the significance the thrills and the daring that it is in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodramatic epic of the War of Independence, which will have its premiere at the Broadway theatre on Monday night, April 21.

And Mr. Griffith's picture gives the ride direct to Longfellow's poem on the ride, for while the poet stated that "Hardly a man now alive remembers that famous date and year," the vociferous applause which greets every hoofbeat of Revere's horse shows very well that women and children as well as men remember Paul, his steed, and the occasion of their journey very well indeed.

Revere is shown waiting in the moonlight on the Charlestown shore, "booted and spurred and ready to ride." The two lanterns flash, giving warning that the British are coming by sea, and then begins a ride through Middlesex county which brings every beholder to his feet. Over fences, stone walls and streams, across pastures, down lanes, and along the highway Revere's noble steed pounds his way at a furious gallop to the accompaniment of the heart beats of an audience aroused to the loftiest possible state of patriotic fervor.

Washington (DC) Herald 4/17/24

Reverting to the Washington premiere of "America," which D. W. Griffith will open at Poli's on Monday night with all the usual Griffithian pomp and ceremony, one was at first inclined to marvel at the presentation of a picture of this size so late in the season, and so soon after its New York opening.

On second thought, however, one recalls that the Daughters of the American Revolution, an organization which accorded Mr. Griffith its full moral support and encouragement, will close its sessions here on Saturday night. With the opening of "America" set for Monday, it will not be a difficult matter to constitute the premiere of Griffith's picture an informal but important part of the annual D. A. R. conclave and with the possibility of D. W.'s appearance in person, it ought to be easy to persuade the delegates to remain over for the opening.

If that can be done, we shall have an opening at Poli's on Monday night that should call out the society chroniclers and [illegible] carrying stories [illegible]

Norwich (Conn) Record 4/18/24

LIONEL BARRYMORE in D. W. Griffith's latest and greatest screen production "AMERICA," at the Broadway, April 21, 22, 23.

Same

Toledo (Ohio) News + Bee 4/17/24

On board the Olympic with D. W. Griffith and another [illegible] man. Both are bound for Rome, which leads one to believe that D. W. is seriously considering that Italian offer to film a picture down [illegible] of Europe.

Boston Advertiser 4/18/24

THE FAIR HEROINE OF "AMERICA"

Carol Dempster, wearing the quaint and beautiful feminine raiment fashionable in Washington's day, in "America," the D. W. Griffith classic of photodramatic patriotism now at the Majestic. Miss Dempster gives a performance of rare charm and delicacy.

AMUSEMENTS AMUSEMENTS

Waterbury (Conn) American 4/17/24

WASHINGTON WAS EXACTLY 6 FEET

D. W. Griffith's Research Workers Find Letter to Patriot's Tailor.

Official confirmation of the size and stature of George Washington was obtained by David Wark Griffith, when the producer of "America" visited Valley Forge as the guest of Rev. W. Herbert Burk, president of the Valley Forge Memorial association.

Many historians contended that Washington was more than six feet tall and of corpulent form. Griffith's research workers, seeking authentic data for "America," with which photoplay the Daughters of the American Revolution planned to celebrate the sesquicentennial of the freedom of this country, learned from Washington's own letters to his London tailor that he was exactly six feet tall and of medium girth. Arthur Dewey, who plays Washington in "America" was selected not only because of his striking facial resemblance to the Father of America, but also because his measurements were identical with Washington's, according to the latter's own letters.

Some persons throughout the country took issue with Griffith and his research workers on the question. In the museum of the memorial at Valley Forge, however, are preserved the riding breeches worn by Washington at Valley Forge, and measurement of these proved conclusively to Griffith that his research department had been correct.

During his tour of Valley Forge, Griffith decorated the grave of the unknown soldier of the Revolution and also the shrine in the handsome Gothic memorial chapel, containing the bronze statue of Washington.

Griffith was impressed by the little chapel as being the most beautiful specimen of Gothic architecture to be seen in the world, outstripping even the most noted cathedrals of Europe.

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/17/24

Producer of Great Revolutionary Play Now at the Pitt

David W. Griffith.

When the fair ladies of America in 1775 wanted a new silk gown they could not walk along main street and purchase it at their pleasure. They were forced to send to England for material and then wait many months before the silk arrived. And when the silk did come it did not arrive at a dock in New York but was forced to come by way of Virginia, in order to pass through the custom house at Williamsburg, Va. Today this same custom house, no longer by any means the only one in the country, is still standing, and it may be seen as a background of several scenes in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodramatic epic of the War of Independence, now playing at the Shubert Pitt theater.

NORWICH BULLETIN, TH

D. W. Griffith Producer of "America," At The Broadway, April 21, 22, 23

Hartford (Conn) Times 4/17/24

"AMERICA"

Difficulties in Making Snow Scenes for Griffith Film.

With a margin of less than forty-eight hours to be of any use in the picture, D. W. Griffith got his snowstorm for taking the Valley Forge scenes in his new picture "America" which is now being shown at Parsons' theater twice daily, at 2:30 and 8:15.

The scenes of Valley Forge are of urgent importance in the dramatic narrative. Mr. Griffith had prepared his log cabins along the heights, where the American army actually encamped during the Revolutionary war. These cabins were built in November, awaiting the day of snow.

Through the courtesy of the United States army, two companies of infantry from Governor's Island had been waiting under instructions all that time for the first snow flakes as a signal to march to the encampment.

The persistence of open weather changed the production schedule for "America" until Griffith had spent so much time taking other scenes that it was impossible for him to spend the additional days necessary to go north in the snow time for the Valley Forge scenes.

The weather was and late period, the suspense to which force-eight hours of disaster before changing with a fine storm that will serve the [illegible] footprints of Valley Forge [illegible]

Hartford (Conn) Times 4/16/24 Record 4/16/24

"AMERICA"

Historical Film of Revolutionary Days at Parsons.

A sick horse postponed the ride of Paul Revere from Boston to Lexington and Concord, while D. W. Griffith was there taking scenes for his historical film, "America," now being shown twice daily at Parsons'. Matinees at 2:30 and evening performance at 8:15. A committee of Lexington and Boston historians had agreed upon the color of the horse Revere rode, one

D. W. GRIFFITH.

Broadway Theatre.

America, D. W. Griffith's photodramatic epic of the Revolutionary days, which has received the most superlative praise ever accorded any motion picture by the New York critics, will have its Norwich premiere at Broadway theatre, for three days beginning Monday, April 21. The picture is merely an attempt to suggest the great sacrifice made by our forefathers that America might become a free and independent nation. No efforts were spared to have the historical incidents as correct as possible. The villages of Lexington and Concord were designed from authentic drawings and descriptions by writers of the day. The battle lines at Lexington are exact reproductions of the original. In the magnitude of his task, Griffith ever held to historic accuracy with remarkable fidelity. Audiences are grasped with trembling and thrills as the little village of Lexington, birthplace of American liberty, comes before the eyes, the scenes taken on the very spot where American liberty had its beginning.

This great drama will not be seen in any part of this district this year.

Broadway Theatre.

Besides an excellent program of five acts of B. F. Keith vaudeville the Burlington (Vt) Free Press 4/16/24

Northampton (Mass) Gazette 4/17/24

Washington (DC) Post 4/17/24

POLI'S

"AMERICA" COMING TO NORTHAMPTON NEXT WEEK

D. W. Griffith's Screen Epic of American Revolution Is a Graphic Film

Pittsburgh (Pa) Sun 4/17/24

THEATRICAL

Chicago Tribune 4/16/24 Norwich (Conn) Record 4/17/24

Griffith's America Coming May 3

Northampton (Mass) Gazette 4/18/24

PAUL REVERE'S RIDE HELD UP BY SEASICK HORSE

Amusing Incident in Connection With Filming of "America," Coming Here Next Week

A sick horse postponed the ride of Paul Revere from Boston to Lexington and Concord, while D. W. Griffith was there taking scenes for his historical film "America," which comes to the Academy of Music next week, starting Thursday evening and continuing through Friday and Saturday afternoon and evening.

A committee of Lexington and Boston historians had agreed upon the color of the horse Revere rode, one that resembled most of the editions. When the horse was finally shipped from New York and arrived at Boston through a stormy voyage, the animal was filled with pneumonia and was so sick that it was impossible to carry the representation of the ride, but when the horse recovered it was put into the station of being on the deck of a towing ship.

Lexington entered in heavily this morning of the picture. Not only were the streets of this village filled with soldiers, but the surrounding country was also represented. Among the soldiers were many who had served in the Revolutionary war, and who had been in the battle of Lexington. Many of the men who had served in the war were present in the uniforms they had worn

Post 4/18/24 Boston (Mass) Herald april 20 1924 No Adams (Mass) Norwich (Conn) Record 4/21/24 Transcript 4/21/24 Buffalo (N.Y.) Commercial april 21 19

Screen Gossip

LIONEL BARRYMORE

A "REEL" CELEBRATION

A very appropriate way to celebrate Patriots' Day would be to see "America" at the Majestic Theatre. D. W. Griffith Revolutionary war film is now in its last weeks and still going strong. Since the opening week many new scenes have been introduced and much irrelevant matter omitted, making a more closely knit and consistently exciting film, and that midnight ride of Paul Revere's as pictured by Mr. Griffith is just about the greatest thrill ever screened, and its telling effectiveness is tremendously heightened by its historical significance. Each pounding hoof-beat of Paul Revere's horse arouses one's patriotic blood to fever heat. Almost equally blood-stirring are the battle scenes at Lexington and Concord and at Bunker Hill.

Hartford Conn Times 4/18/24

HISTORIC FLAGS SET OFF GRIFFITH FILM "AMERICA"

A unique collection of revolutionary flags, in themselves a history lesson in the making of a nation, graces the boxes and balcony of the Majestic Theatre, where is being shown David Wark Griffith's remarkable picture, "America."

Close to the stage opening is draped a flag with the plain legend, "Liberty or Death," the words of Patrick Henry, who appears before the Virginia Burgesses in a scene which is reproduced in the film with great dramatic effect. With it are scores of other banners, each an exact duplicate of those borne by colonial settlers and by troops and ships during the revolution.

The collection, property of Telfair Minton of Boston, and loaned to the theatre management, has a double significance. The changes in and development of the flags into the Stars and Stripes follow, foot for foot, the making of the nation as shown on the screen. They were hung in place just prior to the holiday that celebrates events which, though centering in Massachusetts, set off the spark of rebellion and made the United States possible.

BORNE BY MINUTE MEN

Of absorbing interest, of course, is the replica of the flag carried by the Minute Men of Concord on April 19, 1775, and preserved in the Historical Society at Bedford. It has a red field with an arm appearing from a cloud, the hand holding a sword. There is a yellow scroll with the motto, "Vince Aut Morire"—Conquer or Die.

Of the collection not a few apply directly to local historical events. The Liberty Tree flag was carried by the Sons of Liberty when they met under an elm in Boston. The first flag to show 13 stripes, representative of the colonies, is the more interesting in that it was carried by the first troop of Philadelphia Light Horse when it escorted Gen. Washington from that city to Cambridge. The Grand Union, or Cambridge flag, raised over the headquarters of Washington at Cambridge, Jan. 2, 1776, was also carried by John Paul Jones and flew over the heads of the Continental Congress as it signed the Declaration of Independence.

There are, too, the flag carried by the Massachusetts troops at Bunker Hill, the pine tree flag of the Massachusetts colony in prerevolutionary days, and the linked-hand flag of Newburyport, dated 1775.

Other flags of general interest include: The Liberty Flag, flown by colonists on liberty poles as a protest against taxation; Rhode Island's white flag with a blue anchor and the word "Hope," which is said to be the first with 13 stars; the beaver flag of New York; the red, white and blue flag of North Carolina; the rattlesnake (Gadsden) flag of Virginia colony, the "Don't tread on me" rattlesnake flag of Westmoreland county, Pa., and the South Carolina flag such as flew over Fort Moultrie.

"PINE TREE" BANNER

A flag popular with the colonists throughout the revolution was the red ensign of Great Britain with the pine tree of independence substituted for the crosses in the canton. This is shown. The Betsy Ross flag, with its 13 stripes and the stars of the colony in a circle, the first real United States flag, is an outstanding banner. So, too, is the Connecticut flag of 1777, with its motto in Latin, "He who brought us over sustains us," and three grapevines representing the original Hartford, Windsor and Wethersfield colonies. An unusually handsome flag is the replica of the one given Count Pulaski by the ladies of Bethlehem, Pa., when he received his commission as a brigadier-general in the Continental army. It shows the all-seeing eye within a triangle and a motto signifying "No other governs." Almost alone among early American banners, it is quite ornate.

Of navy flags there are a number, such as were flown both by privateers and by regularly accredited men-of-war. They include the first Navy Jack, raised in 1776.

Running over the array of banners tells as hardly anything else can the story of the gradual growth of the flag; its attainment of 13, then 15, stripes; then its return to 13 stripes and the representation of the states by white stars in a blue field. The marvel grows that so singularly beautiful a flag should have resulted from so many experimental temporary designs.

The flag collection of which these are a part was made by Mr. Minton after many years of study of flag lore, historical documents and museum treasures. Each flag, as a result of his efforts, is declared to be an exact replica of the original in design and in color. To make sure of this in many instances he sent artists to sketch famous flags behind their glass cases in museums and in private collections, then superintended the dyeing of fabrics to get exact shades, and "stood over" flagmakers to make sure specifications were completely followed. The collection numbers about 150.

"AMERICA"

Arthur Dewey has Perfect Physical Likeness to Washington.

Located after a country-wide search, during which thousands of photographs were examined, and more than one hundred actors, including a number of Broadway stars, were interviewed in person, Arthur Dewey was selected by D. W. Griffith to portray the role of George Washington in "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence, now being shown twice daily at Parsons' theater with matinees at 2:30 and evenings at 8:15.

Dewey was selected because he was adjudged to have the most perfect physical resemblance to Washington. Before the final selection was made Dewey and several other applicants were taken to Washington, D. C., by Griffith, in order that he might compare their visages with pictures and statues of the first president.

Although some historical authorities claim that the Father of His Country was more than six feet in height, Griffith's research department unearthed an order written by Washington to his tailors in London, in which he described himself as "just six feet, and of medium build." It was found that Dewey was exactly six feet tall.

Dewey is a descendant of an old Revolutionary family, which in the last century migrated from Lexington, Mass., to the middle west, settling in Illinois. One of his ancestors, Ashabel Smith, answered Paul Revere's summons, and fought valiantly on Lexington

Washington (DC) News 4/18/24

Career Predicted for Neil Hamilton

D. W. Griffith Says Young Actor Who Gave Up Theology For Screen Will Become Greater Valentino.

By Rose Pelswick.

"That boy will become a second and a greater Valentino."

And David Wark Griffith, who made the Gish girls, Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Robert Harron, Richard Barthelmess and scores of other film favorites, can pick a star better than any other director.

Those who have seen Neil Hamilton on the back of the protector's speckled pinto, "America," now playing at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre, fully agree with him.

Hamilton's performance as Philip Morton proves that a great figure greatness stood for this photoplay lover. His acting, his horsemanship, his dashing, his manliness and good looks to make the hearts of serious matrons, and to set that type of young girls who dreamed Rudolph Valentino into ecstasy, distinctive appearance and a fine ability to act.

Hamilton's career began in earnest when he was a sophomore at Yale. Playing Hamlet, for four years, he was the leading man, and a prominent member of the Yale Dramatic Association. Graduating from Yale, he was offered a position with the Shubert organization and toured in a number of successful productions.

Hamilton's first role of young Kingsley in "Dulcy" brought him to the attention of Paul Dickey, who was producing "The Bad Man" with Frank Bacon. Dickey was so impressed with Hamilton's personality and acting ability that he gave him the part of Jack Ashton, the young lover, in "Tarnish," which ran for 500 nights on Broadway.

Hamilton's career took a sudden turn when he was offered the part of Philip Morton in "America," the Griffith production. After finishing the picture, he was cast for the part of Jack Ashton in the film production of "Tarnish," which is now being shown at the Rialto.

Hamilton's next role was that of Lieutenant Jack Ashton in "The Ten Commandments," Cecil B. DeMille's production, which is now being shown at the Rialto.

Hamilton's next role will be that of Lieutenant Jack Ashton in "The Ten Commandments," Cecil B. DeMille's production, which is now being shown at the Rialto.

NEIL HAMILTON

NEIL HAMILTON

Chicago (Ill) Journal 4/18/24

NEWSBOYS ARE ENTERTAINED AT THEATRE

Trouble Is Forced to Suspend as Circulation Manager Takes Cohorts to Theatre.

Not long ago I told you it was some one-man-show!

V. Snyder, Circulation Manager of The Baltimore News, said so. And V. Snyder knows. And even if V. Snyder didn't know, nobody in Baltimore could have seen that pandemonium and doubted that it was anything but a one-man-show.

All the boys were there, about 1000 of them, including the "Shake of Pennsylvania Avenue." A minstrel show then, but as a rule quick and screaming an American flag in one hand and a tin trombone in the other hand then all.

Two minutes afterwards showed the boys. All the money had turned upon the stage were in sight. The minstrel footlights went down. The Parsons street house shut in their faces. Trouble in Baltimore and Detroit around one of the boys was.

Nothing left but the dust, dust as the boys ran towards the Parsons theater. Dust in the eyes of the ushers, dust in the two ticket offices, dust in the lobbies, dust in the aisles, dust in the boxes, dust in the orchestra pit, dust in the balcony, dust in the gallery, dust in the stage door, dust in the dressing rooms, dust in the wardrobe, dust in the footlights, dust in the flies, dust in the gridiron, dust in the dome, dust in the cellar, dust in the boiler room, dust in the ice box, dust in the cooler, dust in the dust pan, dust in the dust cloth, dust in the dust bin, dust in the dust storm, dust in the dust bowl, dust in the dust heap, dust in the dust mop, dust in the dust rag, dust in the dust bag, dust in the dust cart, dust in the dust hole, dust in the dust pit, dust in the dust trap, dust in the dust chute, dust in the dust box, dust in the dust bin

Fay King Wants Broadway to Wear Sunbonn

In the Theaters

Opening at the Teck theater last night, and to remain throughout the week, is D. W. Griffith's latest film production, "America," an historical sketch depicting the history of the country from the time of the Boston tea party to the inauguration of Washington as the first president of the United States.

The unfolding of the love story of Nathan Holden, a spirited patriot of Massachusetts, and Miss Nancy Montague, the daughter of a Virginian who remains loyal to Britain, is the vehicle for a correct and detailed picturization of the important events of the colonial history, including the battles of Concord and Bunker Hill, Valley Forge and it's hardships, and Paul Revere's ride.

Neil Hamilton is seen as the spirited young patriot, and Carol Dempster is effective as Nancy Montague. Lionel Barrymore especially pleases as the cruel leader of the British and Indians and an aspirant for the hand of Nancy.

Last night the picture stirred the emotions of the crowded house to a spontaniety seldom witnessed in a Buffalo theater, where apathy and indifference only too often greet a performance. This was because every one seemed to feel that here was a masterwork that was a living, breathing document of that elusive something, called the American spirit. Then you realized as real by reel was wound up before your eye, that every foot of it was downright sincere art. No mere dramatic effects for the sake of creating thrill chasers. No mere sentimentality to merely entertain. Here were gathered together a handful of historical incidents that made American history, pure and simple, and yet so intense in sacrifice and heroism on the part of those sturdy forefathers as to give the Revolutionary War an altogether realistic meaning. A film of this kind substituted a whole course of subject reading.

Washington (DC) Times 4/22/24

GRIFFITH HITS HEART WITH "AMERICA"

D. W. Griffith's greatest thrill in the picturization of the vital drama that surrounded the birth of these United States is given in the memorable ride of Paul Revere to warn the minute men of the approach of the British forces. This incident he has screened for "America" in such a graphic manner that even the most blase will feel the blood quickened and stirred by a cross-country dash on horseback which ranks with the best moments of the Griffith film masterpieces.

Viewed at Poli's last night by a distinguished audience, "America," seemed to be generally accorded enconiums as a picture designed to arouse patriotic fervor for the suffering and sacrifices of the forefathers of the nation. Robert W. Chambers, who adapted the story for the screen, has injected romantic interest of certain appeal, and there are many scenes of the revolutionary skirmishes that will rekindle the spirit of 1776 in the average breast. The general treatment of a story tremendous in its possibilities, however, must be classed as missing greatness, even with such a directatorial genius as Griffith at the helm.

The photography throughout is strikingly beautiful and some of the important incidents and figures in American history are depicted with meticulous attention to detail. The historic Christ Church in the North End of Boston, the House of Burgesses at Williamsburgh, Va.; the Continental Congress of Philadelphia, Hancock Tavern at Lexington, and the Old State House of the Hub are among a number of the locations where exciting moments of the film drama are staged. George Washington, John Adams, Patrick Henry, William Pitt, the Montagues of Virginia, General Gage, General Burgoyne and other familiar figures in early history are among the characters seen in the course of the action. The picture closes with the inauguration of Washington as the first President.

Carol Dempster is a featured player, with Lionel Barrymore giving the most notable performance in the role of a British captain of raiders. Others who depict characters of prominence are Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack, Arthur Donaldson, Arthur Dewey, Neville Abteson, Frank McGlynn, jr., Lee Dugs, Louis Wolheim, Riley Hatch, Lucile La Verne, Erwin [illegible]

Buffalo (N.Y.) Morning Express April 21 1924

AMERICA FILM SURE THRILL TO ALL PATRIOTS

Griffith's latest spectacle a stirring drama of the country's history.

D. W. Griffith's spectacular film, America, making its Buffalo premier last night at the Teck theater, proved an interesting and thrilling dramatization of the country's history from the time of the Boston tea party to the inauguration of Washington as the first President of the United States.

The film is unusual in that it is historically correct and each detail has been carefully worked out to the characteristic Griffith style. Paul Revere's ride, the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill are depicted in an admirable realistic way, and all the romantic adventures of Paul Revere in Northern New York, the winter days at Valley Forge, the Boston massacre, the battles of Bunker Hill, the Tories and Indians and the romantic adventures of the Virginia scouts and officers, of the Revolutionary period are represented with telling evidence.

Interwoven in the unusual story is the love story of Nancy Montague, a Virginia beauty, and Nathan Holden, a Massachusetts patriot, who finally marry after the war. The Virginian, Lionel Barrymore, is the cruel leader of the British and Indians who seeks the hand of Nancy. Carol Dempster, who plays the part of Nancy, is charming in the role and Neil Hamilton is a fine young patriot.

Last night the picture was shown before a crowded house and the emotions of the crowd were stirred to the extent that it was a rare occasion when a spontaneous burst of applause was not heard. The photography throughout is strikingly beautiful and some of the important incidents and figures in American history are depicted with meticulous attention to detail. The historic Christ Church in the North End of Boston, the House of Burgesses at Williamsburgh, Va.; the Continental Congress of Philadelphia, Hancock Tavern at Lexington, and the Old State House of the Hub are among a number of the locations where exciting moments of the film drama are staged. George Washington, John Adams, Patrick Henry, William Pitt, the Montagues of Virginia, General Gage, General Burgoyne and other familiar figures in early history are among the characters seen in the course of the action. The picture closes with the inauguration of Washington as the first President.

Carol Dempster is a featured player, with Lionel Barrymore giving the most notable performance in the role of a British captain of raiders. Others who depict characters of prominence are Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack, Arthur Donaldson, Arthur Dewey, Neville Abteson, Frank McGlynn, jr., Lee Dugs, Louis Wolheim, Riley Hatch, Lucile La Verne, Erwin [illegible]

Greenfield (Mass) Recorder 4/22/24

"AMERICA" TO BE SHOWN AT NORTHAMPTON

Hazleton (Pa) Plain Speaker 4/22/24

"AMERICA" GREAT MOVIE LESSON

By ALICE ROHE
(Written for United Press.)

NEW YORK—Every once in a while something happens to prove the contention of the "intelligent minority" that the public appreciates better stuff than it is given. This something has happened with an overpowering argument in the case of D. W. Griffith's superb motion picture, "America." As is always true of whatever this master of the screen produces, the public demonstrates so enthusiastic an appreciation that the query naturally presents itself: "Why isn't an effort made to elevate the whole moving picture output to a high, artistic level?"

Of course, the answer must revert to one logical fact—there is only one D. W. Griffith. At any rate, Griffith's incomparable power of visualizing psychologically great historic moments is evidenced as never before in "America." One lives through tense and tragic hours in this making of our own country. It would take a soul dead indeed not to weep unshed tears at those pitiful, heroic moments in Lexington. And it is safe to say that in all motion picture annals nothing has approached the compelling realism of the midnight ride of Paul Revere.

It is not merely because Griffith has been able to use historical accessories that his picture is great. The drum used by the Minute Men is the original one. A number of the flint-lock guns used in the picture actually served in that historic encounter at Lexington. But it is that intangible spirit which Griffith transfuses into all his pictures—a complete sense of authenticity. Here are no anarchronisms. No banal sentimentality, characteristic of the average motion picture, taxes one's common sense. Instead we are swept on by the spirit of sacrifice, of courage— a spirit of participation. And a most important phase of this picture is the introduction of the sufferings of the Northwest—scourged by Indians, exploited by Butler.

Yet, above all the heart-stirring scenes in this finely co-ordinated picture of South, North and Northwest—all the phases of America's struggle for independence—nothing stands out so indelibly as that ride of Paul Revere's. Battle scenes, fighting, are more superbly represented than in any motion picture in that we never once lose the "two-sides" to the combat. But I doubt if any child of our present era—when the thing we call patriotism, which has been too often cheapened and betrayed in so many ways—can ever obliterate the memory of the scenes in "America," beginning with the flash of Paul Revere's lanterns from North Church tower.

No child should be permitted to miss the opportunity—and so far as that is concerned, no adult either. For Griffith has done a thing of incalculable value in this day of pseudo-internationalism and swaggering nationalism—he has stirred real patriotism—real love and appreciation for America and the ideals for which the men of Lexington, of all our early heroes, gave their lives.

Boston (Mass) Traveler 4/22/24

GRIFFITH CAST WAS HARD TO ASSEMBLE

Many Historical Characters that to Be Fit

Baltimore (Md) News 4/22/24

"AMERICA" AT ACADEMY

Carol Dempster Will Please Her Audiences in This Wonderful Production.

"America," the D. W. Griffith photoplay held over another week at the Academy of Music, is an historical romance against a background of the Revolutionary War. It presents the sacrifices of our forefathers in establishing a free and independent nation. Nathan Holden, a Boston patriot, meets the aristocratic daughter of a Virginia Tory and develops a romance.

Paul Revere warns the countryside—and the Revolutionary War begins. The hero saves his sweetheart and the refugees in the stockade. The British surrender at Yorktown. Neil Hamilton, Carol Dempster, Charles Emmett Mack and Lionel Barrymore head the great cast of players.

Philadelphia (Pa) North American April 22 1924

'AMERICA' CONTINUES RUN AT CHESTNUT

Griffith Film Has Compelling Romance Against Background of Revolution

Seldom are entertainment and education as effectively and vividly combined as in "America," David Wark Griffith's splendid screen production, which is enjoying a successful run at the Chestnut. Against a historically accurate background of revolutionary days, Mr. Griffith has developed a moving story with a compelling romance, as taken from a Robert W. Chambers novel.

The notable cast includes Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton in the featured romantic roles, while outstanding work is done by Lionel Barrymore, Lucille La Verne, Charles Emmett Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim and Riley Hatch.

Never to be forgotten by those who see them woven into this picture as integral parts of it are such episodes as the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, the Indian raids on the frontiersmen, the signing of the declaration of independence, Washington's winter in Valley Forge and the surrender of Cornwallis. All of these have their place, but are not permitted to swamp the romantic interest.

Baltimore (Md) News 4/22/24

CAROL DEMPSTER HERE TODAY

Miss Carol Dempster, leading woman of D. W. Griffith's "America," will appear in person this afternoon at the Academy of Music. Charles Mack, who plays a principal role, will also make a personal appearance.

The beautiful star, whose performance as the Virginia beauty has evoked high approval from both critics and public, arrives in Baltimore via the Pennsylvania Railroad at 3.10 P. M. from New York, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Grey. Mr. Grey is the general manager for D. W. Griffith.

The party will go direct to the Academy, where Miss Dempster will give an address on her experiences in making "America."

Baltimore (Md) News 4/22/24

"AMERICA" STARTS SECOND WEEK HERE

Northampton (Mass) Gazette 4/23/24

quette Aided in Picture Coming Here Tomorrow

Sir Percy Sykes of London, Eng., former commander-in-chief of the British forces in Persia, and authority in royal court etiquette, aided D. W. Griffith in staging several of the most spectacular scenes in "America," the photodrama of the

D. W. Griffith, producer of America, at the Academy of Music April 22, 23.

STARS IN "AMERICA" AND GRIFFITH AIDE WHO VISITED HERE

MRS. ALBERT L. GREY — Miss Dempster, the heroine in D. W. Griffith's "America," now playing at the Academy, spent just two hours and twenty minutes in Baltimore Monday afternoon. She is accompanied in the picture by

CHARLES E. MACK

CAROL DEMPSTER — Mrs. Grey, wife of Mr. Griffith's general manager, and Charlie Mack, an "overnight" star, who plays the juvenile role in the picture.

'AMERICA' STAR PAYS VISIT TO BALTIMORE

Charles E. Mack, Latest of Overnight Stars, Accompanies Miss Dempster.

Carol Dempster, heroine of D. W. Griffith's picture "America," one of the daintiest and most charming of actresses, spent just 2 hours and 20 minutes in Baltimore Monday on her way to Washington.

During that time she posed for a series of pictures, gave three interviews, made a personal appearance at the Academy of Music, where the picture is showing, and saw some of the city.

With her came Charles E. Mack, one of Griffith's newest "overnight" stars, who takes the juvenile role in the picture. "Charlie," as he is known to every person in the Griffith studios, was property man there.

One day when the making of "America" was in progress he was tearing around the lot "with a powder puff in one hand, a piano on his shoulder and a ladder around his neck," when Mr. Griffith spied him.

Heralded as Find.

"Drop 'em, Charlie, and c'm' here," commanded the great picture maker. Charlie was used to dropping things when he was commanded, so he shed the aforementioned adornments and—the next day he was heralded throughout the country as Griffith's newest "find."

But as to Carol—that delightfully modest young lady talked about everything but—Carol! She mourned the passing of Duse; she became enthusiastic over Billie Burke, Mary Hay, Mae Murray and other of her contemporaries.

She told delightful stories of the making of "America"—how one timid old soul in the little town where part of it was filmed declared: "Wal, there jest ain't no use a-trying to cross the street while that there gray car's in town," the gray car being Miss Dempster's roadster; how more than 10,000 people tore down a stone wall to watch the making of the battle scenes, and how long it was before she learned to "cry at a moment's notice, because Mr. Griffith insists on reality — no glycerine tears for him."

Lucky, She Says.

But—when her part in the big picture was mentioned:

"Why, I was just lucky to be in it, that's all."

And when her apparent youth became the topic of conversation, she blushed—yes, actually blushed.

"I'm not going to tell you my real age, because nobody believes me anyway, but—I never told this to anyone before—I still have a baby tooth."

And she proved it.

Boston American 4/22/24

GRIFFITH SUES JOLSON FOR $570,000

Claims Comedian Abandoned Part in Movie; Dramatist Asks $250,000

New York, April 22.—D. W. Griffith, Inc., began suit in the United States District Court against Al Jolson, the blackface comedian, claiming $570,000 for alleged breach of contract in connection with the agreement to appear in motion pictures under the direction of Mr. Griffith.

According to the complaint Mr. Jolson signed on the line above forty thousand dollars and received a part of the money and [illegible] the balance when he was ready to start the work. Mr. Griffith claims that Jolson failed to appear in the pictures and [illegible] the money.

Al Jolson

AL. JOLSON IS SUED AS CONTRACT BREAKER

Griffiths Asks $500,000, Producer's Lawyer Says.

Notice of an action against Al Jolson, comedian, was filed in the United States District Court today by D. W. Griffith, Inc., motion picture producers, and while the amount of damages sought is not named in the notice, it is said by representatives of Griffith, who is now in Italy, that it is $500,000.

These damages will be sought for the alleged breaking of a contract Jolson entered into with Griffith, lately [illegible]. The latter engaged Jolson to play a leading part in a picture to be called "Black and White." A large [illegible] was engaged and two scenes were [illegible]. When these scenes were [illegible] for Jolson he complained of [illegible] it and [illegible] for the [illegible].

My Sun 4/22/24

Griffith Sues Al Jolson For Random Damages

Lynn (Mass) Item 4/22/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" IS AT MAJESTIC, BOSTON

My World 4/22/24

GRIFFITH AMERICA THRILLS AT BROADWAY THEATRE

Baltimore (Md) News April 23 1924

N.Y. Hampshire Gazette 4/25/24 Tulsa (Okla) World 4/25/24 My. M.P. News 4/26/24

"AMERICA" PROVES GREAT PICTURE

Stirring Scenes of the Revolution Shown With Simplicity and Great Effect

SPECIAL MUSIC PLAYED

Less than a week ago Northampton celebrated Patriots' Day, or at least the banks closed on the 19th and the stores on the 21st, in observance of the holiday. We wonder how many people stopped to think what it was all about. Some may have paused a moment to consider the significance of the day, and yet had only a vague idea of Paul Revere, Lexington and Concord.

We wish D. W. Griffith's "America," which opened a three days' engagement at the Academy of Music last night, could have been shown here before April 19th. We wish everybody in Northampton who wants to know what the American Revolution really meant would make it a point to see this photo-play.

Last night, we went, along with several hundred, to see the latest Griffith production. And we never saw anything quite so good. The best thing about this great film is its simplicity. It would have been easy for Griffith to put on a spectacular show, depicting the Revolution as most of us imagine it. It is quite another task to present a true picture of these events, and this Griffith has done.

This wizard of the screen achieves a triumph in art by stripping the American Revolution of its traditional glamor, and revealing its true spirit, minus the hokum. For instance, the battle of Lexington. Do we see a company of natty Minute Men march out in perfect formation and rout the Red Coats? Hardly. The American fighters are simple men, ragged in formation, no two dressed quite alike, but fired with the genuine spirit of '76.

It's romantic, yes, romantic as life in those days really was, not as we have imagined it. And it's thrilling, fundamentally thrilling. The ride of Paul Revere is one of the most stirring scenes it has been our fortune to see. A magnificent horse, a fearless rider, and a momentous mission.

Washington at Valley Forge is another scene worthy of particular mention. The cruel hardships suffered by these heroes have never been so graphically portrayed. One shivers in sympathy as the ragged soldiers, their frost-bitten feet wrapped in rags, tramp through the snow.

It is impossible to continue picking out features of this remarkable picture. Suffice it to say it is a real drama of the American Revolution. The love theme is present, but not made the dominant note.

Neil Hamilton, a recent discovery of Mr. Griffith's, handles the role of the hero without trying to hog the stage, and Carol Dempster is a very attractive Southern beauty. We could ask for nothing more villainous than the part of General Butler as brought out by Lionel Barrymore. And we derived a little personal satisfaction from seeing that veteran actress, Lucille LaVerne, in a more pleasant role than is usually her lot. This time she was not an ogre, nor a drunkard, but simply a mother.

The music adds immeasureably to the effectiveness of the production, and a special orchestra plays the various selections with feeling.

One more word; we are glad to note that Griffith has succeeded in giving the picture of the War of Independence without instilling any anti-British propaganda. It is a fair picture. Burke, Pitt and others are seen in the English court pleading the cause of the American colonists, and it is brought out that only the King and his faction were responsible for the bloodshed.

We do not see how Griffith could have made a single change in "America" that would make it a better picture.

Mr. Jolson, Late of the Movies

We suppose D. W. Griffith has a good case against Al Jolson. The law requires that when one enters into a contract he must live up to it, or, failing to do so, shall be mulcted in such sum as is necessary to cover any damage that the other party or parties to the contract may have suffered from his dereliction.

Mr. Griffith, the foremost of picture producers, employed Mr. Jolson, the foremost of stage comedians, to take part in the making of several pictures. Mr. Jolson began to assist in the making of one, and then quit and announced his discovery that he was no motion-picture actor. Mr. Griffith is suing him for a half-million dollars, not because he is "no motion-picture actor," but because he did not keep on trying to be one.

Considering the reputation of Mr. Jolson as a comedian, we have no doubt he would have filled the bill and have satisfied uncritical audiences, and, no doubt, he would have been worth as much to Mr. Griffith as the latter demands. So it would appear that the latter should have a verdict for the amount sued for. But should not something be said for Mr. Jolson? As a phenomenon, he stands head and shoulders above all phenomenons of which or whom we have heard—the only man—or, for that matter, woman—in the United States who did not believe he was cut out for the movies or could not, at least, make a go of it if given a chance.

Mr. Jolson's experience has been that of many other eminent actors on the speaking stage, only he discovered his unfitness, or else perhaps rather, he sensed earlier a distate of his surroundings. A speaking actor depends much upon his environment, a sympathetic audience and his proximity to other players of training. He misses all those things when facing the cold, unsympathetic camera and finds himself in a mixed aggregation of characters, rather, automata. On the stage, to the actor all about him is real. On the lot, all is make-believe.

While, as we have said, Mr. Jolson could, no doubt, have made a success of a career in the movies, and his name alone would have been sufficient for that, he was a fish out of water. He could not stand the self-torture. Perhaps he would wince at disgorging a half-million bucks to Mr. Griffith, but even that would be less painful to him than a continuance of his movie career.

THERE was a goodly gathering of friends of various walks of life — men and women of the arts and professions at the pier to wish "bon voyage" to Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford and D. W. Griffith who sailed last Saturday on the Olympic. A host of cameramen and ship reporters were present to see that these personages were properly publicized.

The two stars are on their way to a Continental tour which will take them across several boundary lines — including the Scandinavian, while Mr. Griffith will hie himself off to Italy where he plans to make a picture sponsored by the Italian government.

Doug and Mary have accepted invitations from members of royalty. Among the rulers who have commanded the presence of the stars are the king and queen of Belgium and the king and queen of Sweden. Hospitality has also been offered by James M. Barrie, Lord and Lady Mountbatten and the Duke and Duchess of Sutherland. Mary also intends to run down to Derbyshire, England, and visit Haddon Hall.

Bakersfield (Cal) California 4/26/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" EPOCHAL PHOTODRAMA

By ALICE ROHE

(United Press)

NEW YORK, April 26.—Every once in a while something happens to prove the contention of the "intelligent minority" that the public appreciates better stuff than it is given. This something has happened with an overpowering argument in the case of D. W. Griffith's superb motion picture, "America." As is always true of whatever this master of the screen produces, the public demonstrates so enthusiastic an appreciation that the query naturally presents itself: "Why isn't an effort made to elevate the whole moving picture output to a high, artistic level."

Of course, the answer must revert to one logical fact—there is only one D. W. Griffith. At any rate, Griffith's incomparable power of visualizing psychologically great historic moments is evidenced as never before in "America." One lives through the tense and tragic hours in this making of our own country. It would take a soul dead indeed not to weep unshed tears at those pitiful, heroic moments in Lexington. And it is safe to say that in all motion picture annals nothing has approached the compelling realism of the midnight ride of Paul Revere.

It is not merely because Griffith has been able to use historical accessories that his picture is great. The drum used by the Minute Men is the original one. A number of flint-lock guns used in the picture actually served in that historic encounter at Lexington. But it is that intangible spirit which Griffith transfuses into all his pictures—a complete sense of authenticity. Here are no anachronisms. No banal sentimentality, characteristic of the average motion picture, taxes one's common sense. Instead we are swept on by the spirit of sacrifice, of courage—a spirit of participation. And a most important phase of this picture is the introduction of the sufferings of the northwest—scourged by Indians, exploited by Butler.

Yet, above all the heart-stirring scenes in this finely co-ordinated picture of south, north and northwest—all the phases of America's struggle for independence—nothing stands out so indelibly as that ride of Paul Revere's. Battle scenes, fighting, are more superbly represented than in any motion picture in that we never once lose the "two sides" to the combat. But I doubt if any child of our present era—when the thing we call patriotism, which has been too often cheapened and betrayed in so many ways—can ever obliterate the memory of the scenes in "America," beginning with the flash of Paul Revere's lanterns from North Church tower.

No child should be permitted to miss the opportunity—and so far as that is concerned, no adult either. For Griffith has done a thing of inestimable value in this day of pseudo-internationalism and swagging nationalism—he has stirred real patriotism—real love and appreciation for America and the ideals for which the men of Lexington and all our early heroes, gave their lives.

Philadelphia Record Philadelphia (Pa) 4/21/24

Navasota (Texas) Examiner 4/30/24

Philadelphia (Pa) North American April 20 1924

JOLSON, OUT OF FILM, SUED FOR $671,696

Griffith Seeks Damages for Blackface Star's Sudden Walkout Last June.

NO CONTRACT WAS SIGNED

Film Producer Alleges a Gentleman's Agreement and Lays Break to Temperament.

D. W. Griffith, Inc., began suit yesterday in the United States District Court against Al Jolson, the blackface comedian, claiming $671,696.13 for alleged breach of contract in connection with the actor's agreement to appear in motion pictures under the direction of Mr. Griffith.

The film corporation charges in its complaint that on June 16 last Mr. Jolson consented to star in a series of photoplays, which were to be supervised personally by Mr. Griffith. The complaint adds that Mr. Griffith, relying on this agreement, hired a number of subordinate actors and the necessary equipment to produce the first of the series in accordance with a scenario written especially for Mr. Jolson and designed to exploit his particular talents.

The complaint further charges that Mr. Griffith incurred great expense in the preparation and actually paid out in cash $71,696.13. According to the complaint, Mr. Jolson started on the first photoplay, but toward the end of June, 1923, suddenly and deliberately abandoned his work therein and refused to proceed further with his duties under his contract.

Mexico (Mo) Ledger 4/25/24

MOVIE NEWS

AMERICA'S GREAT MOVIE LESSON

By Alice Rohe.

NEW YORK, (United Press) — Every one in a while something happens to prove the contention of the "intelligent minority" that the public appreciates better stuff than it is given. This something has happened with an overpowering argument in the case of D. W. Griffith's superb motion picture "America." As is always true of whatever this master of the screen produces, the public demonstrates so enthusiastic an appreciation that the query naturally presents itself: "Why isn't an effort made to elevate the whole moving picture output to a high artistic level?"

Of course, the answer must revert to one logical fact—there is only one D. W. Griffith. At any rate, Griffith's incomparable power of visualizing psychologically great historic moments is evidenced as never before in "America." One lives through the tense and tragic hours in this making of our own country. It would take a soul dead indeed not to weep unshed tears at those pitiful, heroic moments in Lexington. And it is safe to say that in all motion picture annals nothing has approached the compelling realism of the midnight ride of Paul Revere.

It is not merely because Griffith has been able to use historical accessories that his picture is great. The drum used by the Minute Men is the original one. A number of flint-lock guns used in the picture actually served in that historic encounter at Lexington. But it is that intangible spirit which Griffith transfuses into all his pictures—a complete sense of authenticity. Here are no anachronisms. No banal sentimentality, characteristic of the average motion picture, taxes one's common sense. Instead we are swept on by the spirit of sacrifice, of courage—a spirit of participation. And a most important phase of this picture is the introduction of the sufferings of the northwest—scourged by Indians, exploited by Butler.

Yet, above all the heart-stirring scenes in this finely co-ordinated picture of south, north and northwest—all the phases of America's struggle for independence—nothing stands out so indelibly as that ride of Paul Revere's. Battle scenes, fighting, are more superbly represented than in any motion picture in that we never once lose the "two sides" to the combat. But I doubt if any child of our present era—when the thing we call patriotism, which has been too often cheapened and betrayed in so many ways—can ever obliterate the memory of the scenes in "America," beginning with the flash of Paul Revere's lanterns from North Church tower.

No child should be permitted to miss the opportunity—and so far as that is concerned, no adult either. For Griffith has done a thing of inestimable value in this day of pseudo-internationalism and swagging nationalism—he has stirred real patriotism—real love and appreciation for America and the ideals for which the men of Lexington and all our early heroes, gave their lives.

Post 4/8

AMERICA AT MAJESTIC ON MAY 4TH

"America," D. W. Griffith's photodramatic epic of the American revolutionary war has its southern premiere at the Majestic Theatre in Houston on May 4.

The picture hailed by newspaper critics everywhere as the outstanding film of the age and as Griffith's masterpiece carries the historical days of '76 through a wonderfully accurate portrayal on the celluloid.

In "America" the battles of Bunker Hill, Concord, Valley Forge and Lexington are filmed. Many of these battle scenes were taken on the exact locations of the original action. Descendants of men who took part in these original actions are cast as soldiers in the scenes.

The midnight ride of Paul Revere is shown in all its action. Critics in their reviews all agreed that this portion of the picture is the most sensational bit of acting and direction yet contributed to the silverscreen. It is this scene that has thrown theatre audiences into cheering applause that equaled even the applause that greeted the thrilling sweep of "Birth of a Nation" which up to this time has stood through the years as the greatest picture ever made.

A cast of music and stage effects were developed for the theater showing of "America." Chief among the stage attractions is the cast to Lionel Barrymore who portrays the role of Walter Butler, the cruel villain of the story. Lucile Lagerne takes the only feminine leading role in the film. She is playing opposite Neil Hamilton who as Captain Nathan Hale of Margaret Mayo's play the stellar role last year.

The strong music that characterized "Birth of a Nation" is included in a series of the music that was written for the showing.

Houston (Tex) Post 4/30/24

GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA" FEATURE AT CHESTNUT

Scenes of Revolutionary Days Are Shown With Much Historic Accuracy

Children fill the auditorium at the Chestnut Street Opera House at the daily matinees and are most demonstrative in reception of the D. W. Griffith picture of the Revolution, "America." The youngsters are thrilled by the re-enactment on the screen—as tho it were just happening—of such enthralling happenings as the ride of Paul Revere, the battles of Lexington, Concord, Bunker Hill, the Indian raids on unprotected frontier dwellers, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown and the life of the heroes at Valley Forge.

These scenes are but a small part of the detail of this picture, which, founded on a story by Robert W. Chambers, gives graphic presentation of a heart-touching romance. The picture, in fact, has the revolutionary war as a background for a most absorbing tale of love and adventure, in which the leading actors are a young couple, Carol Dempster and Neil Hamilton are, respectively in those roles. Griffith saw to it, however, that each historic incident that is included in the picture, is authentic in every detail, and so "America" is not only absorbingly interesting as a red-blooded story but is also of historical accuracy.

The cast includes Lionel Barrymore, Lucille La Verne, Charles Emmett Mack, Arthur Dewey, Louis Wolheim, Sidney Blatch and others.

Philadelphia Inquirer April 20 1924

Photoplay Magazine Chicago Ill May 1924

AMERICA—D. W. Griffith

MR. GRIFFITH has done it again. Has almost made another "Birth of a Nation"—but not quite. Nevertheless, "America" is an epic film and one of the greatest thrill pictures ever made. If you miss this picture, you miss something worth while—something that will not only give you a greater appreciation of motion pictures, but something that will make you pause and gaze with added reverence the next time you see an American flag.

No period in our history is so rich in romance as the struggle for independence and this is the period chosen by Mr. Griffith, with a story by Robert W. Chambers.

He has caught the spirit of our forefathers as we conceived it, and transferred it to the screen in such a way that you glory in being an American.

The first part of the picture treats of the causes of the Revolution and the events leading up to the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill. Nothing has ever been thrown on the screen that surpasses the ride of Paul Revere to arouse the Middlesex villagers and farmers.

In the second part of the picture, Mr. Griffith, realizing that it was impossible to tell the story of the Revolution in any one or any dozen pictures, has selected phases of it that vividly depict the sacrifices of the patriots in the struggle.

Notable figures of the American Revolution are presented, including Washington, Patrick Henry, John Hancock, Samuel Evans and King George III, and they is all he has interwoven a charming love story of the daughter of a Virginian Tory (Carol Dempster) and a young patriotic leader (Neil Hamilton).

Mr. Hamilton is pushed into stardom and [illegible] does the best work of his screen career.

Boston (Mass) Morning Telegraph April 25 1924

Boston (Mass) Evening Telegraph April 25 1924

AMERICA'S GREAT MOVIE

Amesbury Depicts War in Northern New York

CAROL DEMPSTER.

Most actors and actress choose the spectacular rather than the important events of a war as the subjects for their previous and their savings. But not so Griffith. He has produced that great epic, the most important, if not the greatest, event in the history of America, the Revolutionary War.

D. W. GRIFFITH SUES JOLSON FOR $560,000

Says Actor Quit Job in Film Movie Film

Bangor (Me) Commercial April 25 1924

AMERICA'S STORY OF FREEDOM'S BIRTH

Moving Film Play Will Continue At Academy of Music

Baltimore (Md) Catholic Review April 26 1924

Pittsburgh Gazette Times

PITT—"America" Film.

To his vivifying of our country's suffering in battling for freedom from a tyrant king, D. W. Griffith has added much in the way of romance between a colonial messenger and the daughter of a Tory whose sympathy for British rule brings out the opposition in our own land against which George Washington had to contend. The film is stirring. It gives such insight into heartaches in the making of our nation which brings a pang as no printed pages in school rooms can.

While the Griffith judgment to enhance the box office value of the picture has woven as much of a fanciful love story through a tapestry of history, it puts into the foreground an imaginary character who fills tenseest moments rushing to the rescue with his mounted troops—giving more of a galloping detour for a movie thrill men of a sustained sweep of action centering in the chief personalities and actualities of the Revolution.

The horsemen riding to the rescue supplied the unforgettable "punch" in Griffith's "Birth of a Nation," and this producer makes prodigal use of that scene in "America." The orchestra accompanying it in the Pitt Theater animates the rides with musical scenes, as it heightens the many other attractive scenes which elect interest to his first masterpiece.

The titling, by Robert W. Chambers, starts when Drayton raised the militia to help defeat the rest of the French and Indian war, and then begins presentation with a view of Lexington and home of Nathan Hale. And from by of a time when he [illegible] and Henry Morgan, Neil Hamilton has the romantic leading role, and he plays from colonial Barbara. It is a [illegible] to Virginia, after many days of [illegible] which is taken to Virginia to [illegible] the [illegible] of Lexington, or Valley with [illegible]

At intervals the prime drama [illegible] the people [illegible] Revolutionary War [illegible] Washington [illegible] Patrick Henry [illegible] Hancock [illegible] Samuel Evans [illegible] King George [illegible] Lexington, Bunker Hill, Valley Forge [illegible] Yorktown [illegible] Washington [illegible] Lexington [illegible] Washington [illegible] Lexington [illegible] Washington [illegible] Lexington

Brooklyn Motion Picture Magazine May 1924

Captain Butler in a heated conference with the Big Wigs on the left ... and Nancy and Nathan in a perfect Griffith love moment on the right

The Battle of Bunker Hill is one of the most thrilling episodes of the picture ... excelled only by the inspiring and breath-taking ride of Paul Revere. It was during this battle that the human toll was the greatest

A review of this epic film appears on page fifty-three of this issue And if these illustrations dont interest you sufficiently to see "America," we refer you to the editorial comments. Below is one of Captain Butler's off-moments ...

With the hero a Rebel and the heroine the daughter of a Tory and the sister of a Rebel and, therefore somewhat confused in her sympathies, the love scenes are frequently enacted under great physical difficulties. Witness the Romeo and Juliet episode on the left

"See America First"

When we hail your interest with the famous slogan which we have used as a title for these pages, we do so in all sincerity. For "The Sacrifice," the first of a series of motion pictures which D. W. Griffith will make chronicling America's history, is well worth seeing from a patriotic, dramatic and artistic viewpoint

The surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown is a thrilling scene which will stir patriotic quivers in the most blasé American. Arthur Dewey, a dominant and human George Washington, is seated upon the white mount

Carol Dempster is Nancy, the heroine of the love story upon which Griffith builds his historical events. The Tory seen with her in the silhouette above is Lionel Barrymore as Captain Butler

On the left, Nancy is presented to George III... and on the right is Neil Hamilton, whose Nathan Holden is one of the most likable heros we have seen on the screen in many a moon ...

Brooklyn M P Magazine May 1924

Liberty Magazine NY City 7/26/24

Scenes From Griffith Film "America," Add to Picture's Enchantment.

R YOUR ISEMENT

M.P. Classics-Brooklyn (NY) May 1924

The Picture of the Month

Selected by LAURENCE REID

IT is a mighty subject that D. W. Griffith tackles in "America"—a subject which reaches us at a rather late day considering its significance. Of all directors capable of treating it dramatically—of injecting it with the spirit of our forefathers who lifted us from bondage and made us a free and independent nation, Griffith is that man. If he has had the idea in mind to project at an appropriate time, we must assume that he has given it considerable thought. But has he? Ever since he produced "The Birth of a Nation," we have awaited the hour when he would strike again with a tremendous theme—and give us a work comparable to the masterpiece of the Civil War and the Reconstruction.

"America" is not the mighty, throbbing canvas that might be anticipated in view of the scope of the title. In regard to its spirit of sacrifice it does not fail. And Griffith, the master of dramatic effects, the builder of suspense thru his employment of his own screen inventions (the cut-back and the close-up), moves us with as thrilling individual scenes as has ever been caught by a camera.

He eclipses all his previous efforts with his spectacular dash of Paul Revere warning the countryside — and follows it up with a magnificent replica of the battle on Lexington Green. He brings his audience to a pitch of frenzied excitement. We become transported by a genuine patriotic fervor. We, who had been unmoved by revolutions in distant climes, are stirred by a reproduction of facts which made us a nation. The Battle Cry of Freedom reverberated thru every beat of the horse's hoofs. It sounded far and wide when the Minute Men returned the volley of the redcoats at Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill. And leading up to these introductory chapters of the Revolution we catch glimpses of patriots in rebellion; we are taken into Parliament and introduced to America's enemy, King George III, and America's friends, Pitt and Burke.

The picture here lived up fully to its significant title—even tho Griffith missed an eloquent opportunity to stage a picturesque reproduction of the Boston Tea Party. After Bunker Hill the salient figures and episodes are neglected—and "America," while still carrying out its spirit of sacrifice, resolves itself into a story of Indian warfare in New York State—which, because it failed to establish such vital personalities, landmarks and events as Benjamin Franklin, Ethan Allen, Major André, Benedict Arnold, Nathan Hale, Washington Crossing the Delaware, Hamilton, Burgoyne, the Hessians, the soldiers of Lafayette, the battles of Saratoga, Long Island, Monmouth, Fraunce's Tavern — and others that could be mentioned, proves disappointing in not being the complete record of the War of Independence.

(Continued on page 86)

Again Mr. Reid selects the first half of a picture for this honor. D. W. Griffith's "America" is his choice. Above is one of the many lovely and authentic shots, and in the circle is the remarkable characterization of George III.

True, Griffith might have made it episodic, treating it in such a manner, but it would have been more in keeping with its title. True, also that the salient events could not be recorded in full detail. Yet the director might have taken his fictional character and, also taking liberties with his idea, have projected him from Lexington clear thru to Yorktown and wrought the greatest epic of the screen.

Griffith disarms us by pointing out that "America" is a modest attempt to portray in a small way the sacrifices of our forefathers. But if Revere's ride and the battles of Lexington and Concord are so important, why not reveal more of Washington, who was chiefly responsible for our freedom? He fades into the background here — to emerge in isolated instances—such as consoling his ragged soldiers at Valley Forge. He fades to be replaced by figures of romance.

Robert W. Chambers, an authority on the Revolutionary War in general and the history of Indian warfare in New York State in particular, is responsible for the story—a glorified "Cardigan" — but after establishing such vital episodes as those mentioned above, he gives complete emphasis thereafter to the Tory, Walter Butler, and his Indian savages, who ravaged the Mohawk Valley. We grant that New York State was the granary—and that it was the strategic center of operations. But we see no reason why the second half of "America" should project its romantic figures so prominently, nor any reason why Griffith

Picture-Play (NY) May 1924

In for Mr. Griffith

Last month The Observer told you the sad story of how the unusually warm winter had kept D. W. Griffith from getting necessary snow scenes for his historical picture, "America." It looked for a while as though he would have to dispense with the scenes showing the army at Valley Forge, a circumstance that caused Mr. Griffith acute dismay. But weep no more for Mr. Griffith. Just ten days before the film was scheduled to open in New York there came a heavy snowfall to Valley Forge and the company notified by telegraph rushed down there. Everything was in readiness for them: the cabins and other "props" needed in the scene having been erected last November. Before the warm breezes carried the vagrant snow away Mr. Griffith had procured all the scenes he needed.

M.P. Classics-Brooklyn (NY) 5/1924

D. W. GRIFFITH suffered a severe collapse immediately after the opening in New York of "America." While the picture was being received with applause and cheers in the theater, Mr. Griffith and his staff sat in a draughty dressing room [illegible] the final reels of the film for the audience to see a few minutes later. With the audience and critics declaring it one of the great triumphs of his self-[illegible] career, a doctor was [illegible] his chest and chest with cold compresses in the dressing room, and demanding that he go to the hospital at once. His case was completely [illegible] to making the picture Griffith has worked seven days weekly [illegible] hours daily. His indisposition is a case [illegible] which just shows will [illegible] There is no [illegible] we will never understand about the movies, in this story [illegible]

Photoplay Magazine Chicago May 1924

Picture Play Magazine (NY) May 1924

The Screen in Review

Critical comment on the latest releases.

By Agnes Smith

Caricatures by Walter Kuhlter

EVERY so often—but only too infrequently—D. W. Griffith quits his Mamaroneck studio for Broadway with a few cans of film under his arm and proceeds to make a monkey of all the other directors of the stage and screen. And that goes for Professor Reinhardt. When he makes one of these little excursions and lands a one-hundred-per-cent hit on Broadway, somehow or other he manages to leave every one with the impression that, not only are all the other directors colossally ignorant of their craft but that they are incapable of learning anything.

For each Griffith picture impresses you with the melancholy thought that ten years ago this director set a standard for screen technique that never has been surpassed. And while you may sometimes be annoyed because he himself has not surpassed it, it isn't within reason to expect one man to carry on the entire progress of the screen.

All this is a prologue to the statement that Griffith's new picture "America" is the best thing he has done since "The Birth of a Nation." And I am not so sure that, as a fine display of the art of directing, it isn't the best thing that any one has done since "The Birth of a Nation."

The story of "America" is the story of the War of the Revolution and Griffith has achieved the immense feat of turning routine school history lessons into fine dramatic material. Even the remote George Washington comes to life under his spell and the Cause of the colonists becomes as real and as vital a thing as the Civil War.

Robert W. Chambers supplied the plot of the picture, which isn't much of a plot, but the value of Mr. Chambers' services may be seen in his interest in, and knowledge of, early American history. Griffith, following the simplest form of scenario construction and, at times walking step by step in the path of the development of "The Birth of a Nation," takes the story and makes it hugely exciting and enthralling in its interest.

The story belongs to Feud Series No. 1-A. The lovely daughter of a proud Tory falls in love with a handsome young nobody who is serving the rebels. Her brother, magnetized by the personality of Washington, deserts his father's cause to mix up in the battle of Bunker Hill. He loses his life and the girl, to spare her aged father, allows him to believe that the boy was killed fighting for his king, George III.

And then, ah then, up springs the Menace in the person of Captain Walter Butler, who, by throwing his Indian fighters to the side of the British, played an ignoble part in the war. In the crisis, Captain Butler, who has been wooing the lovely Nancy Montague, proves that he and his followers are No Better Than Beasts. And so Our Hero rushes to rescue the girl and her father from either death by the tommyhawk or the fate that is worse than death. At the moment that the hero wraps Nancy in his arms, Cornwallis surrenders to Washington and the orchestra bursts into the "Star-Spangled Banner." What could be fairer?

Lionel Barrymore plays the part of CAPTAIN WALTER BUTLER in D. W. Griffith's "America."

With only a hack story and a cast of limited ability, Griffith was working against tremendous odds. Therefore, "America" is a sheer triumph of directing. He is at his best, of course, in depicting the actual scenes from history. After watching his reproductions of the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, the stupidest schoolboys would be able to see just why the British campaign failed. Griffith directs a battle scene like a general turned movie director. His war scenes have not only the sense and design but also the spiritual significance of the conflict.

While "America" is whipped up to an exciting and melodramatic climax, the best scenes come during the first part of the picture. The ride of Paul Revere is a magnificent bit of pictorial description and if you fail to get a thrill from the "embattled farmers" defending the bridge at Concord, some one ought to summon you to Washington for investigation before a Congressional Committee.

It seems to me that "America" is Griffith's least sentimental production. In many of his smaller pictures he has spoiled his best effects by spreading the marshmallow sauce too thick. The pathos of "America" is always touching and nearly always dignified. To give you an example of his reticence in this particular instance I need only tell you that there is only one kitten in the whole film and that the colored servant doesn't try for any hokum comedy.

Most of the acting honors go to Carol Dempster. Miss Dempster is not, as the saying goes, a good film type. She doesn't look a bit like a movie actress and heretofore she has shown no instinct for the work. But in "America" she takes her place in the Royal Ranks of Griffith actresses. She has forgotten all her wistful mannerisms and she goes through the whole picture without breaking into one romping skip. Hers is a performance of charm, tenderness and real feeling.

With not a single old favorite to fall back upon, Griffith proves that he still is capable of training new players. I particularly liked the work of Charles Emmett Mack, who gave a delicate picture of the young aristocrat from Virginia who joined forces with the Yankee farmers of the North. Neil Hamilton made the hero, Nathan Holden, the most conventional figure in the picture but I recommend him to the girls as a likely looking young leading man. Lionel Barrymore, as the terrible Captain Butler, deserved more of a chance. I wish Griffith had made the villain a more dominating force in the story, for evidently Barrymore was just looking for more villainies to perpetrate. Barrymore is at his screen best under Griffith direction, as why shouldn't he be? For, if you remember, he was a member of the old Biograph Company that he first received his camera training. Another excellent actor in the cast is Erville Alderson, who makes the gentleman from Virginia look like a figure from an old print. Lucille La Verne contributes a striking bit with her usual skill.

Chicago Ill Post May 1 1924

Baltimore (Md) Catholic Review April 26 1924

"AMERICA" TELLS STORY OF FREEDOM'S BIRTH

Stirring Film Play Will Continue At Auditorium Of Music

Hamilton (O) Herald May 1 1924

Covington (Ky) Post 5/2/24

Schenectady (N.Y.) Gazette May 2 1924

Schenectady (N.Y.) Union-Star May 2 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Record 5/3

D. W. Griffith's "America"

D. W. Griffith's "America," the spectacle-romance of the war of independence, which comes to the Shubert Theater, starting Sunday, May 4th, brings to mind the fact that trench warfare had its birth at the Battle of Bunker Hill. The Minute Men were entrenched on the Brow of Breed's Hill, which the trained British grenadiers attempted to take by storm. Withholding their fire until the British were within a few inches of their guns, the colonials mowed down the grenadiers, who beat a hasty retreat down the hill. On the third assault, however, the grenadiers carried the trench, the colonials retreating to a redoubt.

In restaging this and other battles in "America," Mr. Griffith left no stone unturned to achieve strict historical accuracy. High officers of the United States Army plotted the battle, and regular army soldiers garbed as British grenadiers and as Minute Men, did the fighting. Owing to modern developments it was, of course, impossible actually to stage the battle on the hill to which it has given its name. Mr. Griffith and his forces scoured the country before locating in Putman County, New York, a conformation of territory which agreed exactly with the descriptions of Bunker Hill. The scenes of the hand-to-hand fighting in the trench are particularly effective and realistic, and picked men of the 16th and 18th infantry entering into the spirit of the action as no mere movie soupers could and handling their weapons in a manner to command admiration.

Buffalo (N.Y.) Times May 1 1924

BEAUTY

No matter how elaborate or spectacular a D. W. Griffith picture would be, it would be incomplete without a pretty woman.

For the leading female role in his latest masterpiece, "America," opening at the Shubert Sunday night, Griffith picked the beautiful Carol Dempster, who, of course, plays the heroine in the thrilling drama of the Revolutionary War.

MISS DEMPSTER.

Miss Dempster has appeared in other Griffith productions, but in "America" she has her first big opportunity to show just how good she is as a picture actress.

Houston (Tex) Post 5/2/24

Many Experts Here

Rarely no motion picture ever made employed so many experts in production as did D. W. Griffith's "America," which Sunday night opens a week's engagement and the screen season at the Majestic theater.

In order to insure historical accuracy more than 100 eminent historical authorities were consulted. In restaging scenes in Lexington and Concord, Griffith enjoyed the aid of President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington Historical society, Charles K. Bolton, president of the Boston Athenaeum and senior warden of the Old North church, advised on the scenes of that noted edifice; ranking officers of the United States army aided in restaging the major battles; G. Watson James, national historian of the Sons of the Revolution; President J. A. C. Chandler of William and Mary college, W. Jordan, curator of Independence hall, Philadelphia; W. Herbert Burk, D. D., of the Valley Forge Historical society, and Mrs. Laura Haines Cook, national president of the Daughters of the American Revolution, are among others who gave valuable aid.

The scenes at the court of King George III were staged by Brigadier General Sir Percy Sykes, lately commander in chief of the British forces in Persia, considered an authority on court etiquette.

"America" Thrills Many at Van Curler

The audience at the Van Curler last night sat eager and interested through over two hours and a half of film drama last night when the first showing of D. W. Griffith's "America" was shown for the first time [redacted] tense silence broken only occasionally by applause.

When the school boys and girls, especially the older ones who have some historical background for their impressions of the picture see it, it will be given twice today and twice tomorrow, there will be more applause at the dramatic historical places. Few grown ups like to confess they are moved to applause, and probably none will confess today that they wept very real tears over that ride of Paul Revere. It is just so tangled up with ones traditions of patriotism and the precious childhood's thrill over some beautiful voice reading the stirring poem, that when it all comes on the screen before one, with no jarring note, everything as it might have happened, well there is sincere cause for rejoicing that such things can be done. So why weep?

The picture as a whole has a grand sweep of historical reality which brings the tremendous theme of the American revolution as a dramaticunity before one. The brief scenes, such that in the Virginia legislature, in the English court and parliament, all too short because they were so beautifully done one wished them continued, were so well planned that each such glimpse brought out a whole line of thought on some important aspect of the situation of the time. The romance which is set in the stirring scenes of the revolutionary war is a charming story, beautifully acted by some of the principals of the piece and woven into the historical setting as only a master at historical story writing, assisted by one of the greatest photoplay men could do it.

At first the stirring scenes of the ride of Paul Revere and the beginnings of the fights of the Minute Men suggested that here was a return to the old fashioned school books glorification of war. But that was not so. The battles were just as bloody, the trenches at Concord just as grewsome, the savage fighting of man with man just as horrifying as those more recent scenes which have brought the world a little nearer to loathing war in all its aspects. And as to the glamour which time weaves round the wars of old times, wars upon whose terrors the civilizations of the world have been built because man knew no other way to win his way out of slavery, there is perhaps less of it than usual in this picture. Somehow remarked coming out to a man who was a surgeon in France during the recent war that it seemed just as bad as the picture showed it and he agreed war was bad anyhow.

The idea of liberty was stressed finely and without too much emphasis on the anti-British lines though that is one difficulty with such a drama, as it is with teaching children history and then expecting them to get the right perspective in the present day efforts at understanding among all nations. Butler and his horrible army make an important part of the story and the Butler part by Lionel Barrymore is superb.

Neil Hamilton is one of the finest of heros and an excellent actor in the part. He is closely seconded by the Charles Emmett Mack as the younger brother of the heroine who is killed fighting at Lexington with the Americans. He is most appealing in emotional expression and he has a profile that seems perfect. Graceful and pretty as Carol Dempster is as the little heroine she also shows some scenes of charm in emotional parts. Of course there are numerous fine actors and even in the great crowds there is excellent acting. The attack on the little fort into which the settlers of Cherry Valley went to save themselves from Butler's raid was almost too long to be bearable it was so full of terror and the actuality of that attack. But of course the young rescuers headed by Holden the hero come in time.

It is fascinating the way some of the historical characters are represented. Washington, Lafayette and many others who do not come directly into the story. Each is brought in with some significance, and each is admirably portrayed. It will liven many a history lesson and given many a boy and girl a new notion of the true sacrifices their forefathers

Covington (Ky) Post May 2 1924

Breath of Life Fills "America"

By MARIE A. CULLEN.

The breath of life fills D. W. Griffith's "America," which opened last night at the Van Curler to continue through Saturday. From the pudgy baby whose bewildered tears fell on the fingers of his dying mother, to Washington praying alone at Valley Forge, the film creates illusion which for almost three hours is accepted as the starkest reality. It remained for this picture to stir a Schenectady audience to unrestrained applause and to fits of weeping. In a fairly extended acquaintance with the output of the movies we observed for the first time spectators actually prompted to show their feelings without caring who knew it. It wouldn't be accurate to say applause swept the audience, but the audience was swept by applause, if that's what we mean. Or this: approval didn't break out in a meaningless pitter-patter, but came from persons stirred by what they were seeing, probably five gusts of it cracked above the orchestra. There was no scattered clapping.

What brought all this about? Chiefly Griffith and Robert W. Chambers aided by a cast which was great in spots. Some of the players are barely known to fame; there have been used before by this director. Two or three of his main characters accomplish more with the expression of an eye than some of their contemporaries under other direction convey with both hands and a couple of jars of make-up. He is a master of the seemingly unimportant. He— but all that is contained in the works which long ago established Griffith. In this film he uses all the devices common to his type and displays a few which detract not at all from the effectiveness of his offering. But was it optical deception that made at least three outdoor scenes seem studio-made?

The story covers the period just before and through the Revolution. It concerns the struggles of the colonies to avoid taxation and the love interest is supplied by the fortunes of the Montagues of Virginia. The father is loyal to the king, the son and dauphter lean toward the Americans and in the end the head of the family accepts their view.

The son fought under Washington, who was a family friend. The youth died for the cause before his father knew where his allegiance had been pledged, and upon the boy's death, during the illness of his parent, the daughter is forced to have the body carried to the old man's bedside. This scene necessitated a wide use of handkerchiefs, as did the earlier one where the girl said good-bye to her brother before he began his unending sleep.

All the highlights of early American history are faithfully pictured. The characters who were only that in books live in this picture, and they go about their affairs just as you have always imagined they did. Washington is, of course, the one the spectator is mainly curious about, and Arthur Dewey impersonates him without rubbing off the glamour.

The midnight ride of Paul Revere, done by Harry O'Neill and a highly intelligent horse, is more than just satisfactory. Take the children and you'll never have to ask them to listen again. Another realistic part was at Valley Forge. Here the sufferings of the soldiers, and Washington's affection for them, resulted in some of the best scenes in the whole three hours. Where reading can only hint of what the men went through, here it is shown at all its grimness. The bleeding feet bound by rags, the thin shoulders bending to the tasks of the camp, and the painful effort to keep cheerful in the face of black discouragement lose nothing in appeal as suggested by Griffith.

The shrines of American history are reproduced in the greatest detail. Some of the outdoor pictures, showing the hills and valleys over which the battle surged, are beautiful beyond description.

Carol Dempster as the girl is at her loveliest. Once or twice she fails to get the most out of an emotional scene, but she more than makes up for it by her beauty and by a certain elf-like quality which is wonderfully appealing. To see her with her father and brother in the Montague home prejudices the spectator in her favor at the start, and her scenes with her lover, Holden, played by Neil Hamilton, are likewise good. Hamilton, companion of Revere, acts with his dignity.

Lionel Barrymore is cast as Walter Butler and he does not get away from the Barrymore tradition of perfection. Lewis Wolheim makes a bloodthirsty Captain Hare.

The remainder of the cast is: Jennie Montague, Evelyn Addison; Charles Philip, Edward Montague; Charles Emmett Mack, Samuel Adams; Lee Drake, John Hancock; John Drake, King George III, Arthur Dearborn; William Pitt, Charles Dunstan; Lord Chatham, Harlan Knight; Lord Germain, Frank Clark; Patrick Henry, Frank Wilson; Thomas Jefferson, Frank Gilmore; Richard Henry Lee, P. H. Sweeney; Mr. Ashby, Sherman Bay; Captain Wallace, Ed Boyd; General Gage, E. W. Hoffman; Captain Montague, E. Mac Cullum; Captain Ferguson, Frank Dyer; Captain Hare, Lewis Wolheim; Captain Butler, Lionel Barrymore.

Chicago (Ill) Herald-Examiner May 2 1924

PICTURE GOES BACK TO REVELATION

CAROL DEMPSTER
Who Has Leading Part in "America"

When the fair ladies of America in 1775 wanted a new silk gown they could not walk along Main st. and purchase it at their pleasure. They were forced to send to England for material and then wait many months before the silk arrived. And when the silk did come it did not arrive at a dock in New York, but was forced to come by way of Virginia, in order to pass thru the custom house at Williamsburg, Va.

Today this same custom house, no longer by any means the only one in the country, is still standing and it may be seen as a background of several scenes in D. W. Griffith's "America," the photoplay now of the Way of Independence, coming to the Shubert Theater next week.

All materials imported into this country in 1775 had to pass thru this custom house, which is still in its original condition, and thru it were entered not only milady's dresses and jewels, but her household furniture, much of her food, and the rare wines for her husband's cellar.

Griffith and his large company traveled over a good deal of the eastern part of the country in special cars in order to take as many as possible for the scenes for "America" on original sites, and in Williamsburg, practically unchanged since revolutionary days, they found much excellent material, but none more picturesque than the old custom house.

PAINTING GIVES GENUINE THRILL

George Washington Almost Life-like in Portrait Painted by Stuart.

NOW IN THEATER LOBBY

Scenes From Griffith Film "America," Add to Picture's Enchantment.

[illegible]

Palisade (N.J.) Palisadian May 2 1924

NEW FORUM THEATER

Carol Dempster in "America," D. W. Griffith's big film which will open the new Forum theater May 12.

San Antonio (Tex) News May 3 1924

"America," Booked at Majestic

Griff's Way

There is no name in D. W. Griffith's "America," which Sunday night opens a week's engagement and the screen season at the Majestic theater, making for the Daughters of the American Revolution; which shows State street—then King street—Boston as it appeared in 1775. It looks but a minute. But it took six months to take it. To begin with Griffith's research department had to search through [illegible] of old documents [illegible] to find an accurate description of the street and its stores. Griffith insisted that the signs over the shop windows be just as they were in 1775, and that the windows be stocked with the same merchandise.

When the research department had finished the construction department started. First an exact replica of the street, then the houses and shops and their wares were built, and then the people of the street and the people of Lexington who have since [illegible] Griffith's story. Hundreds of people were spread over the [illegible] and the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] and [illegible]

St. Paul Minn Herald 5/3/24

Chicago (Ill) American May 3 1924

Chicago (Ill) American 5/3/24

Houston (Tex) Post May 4, 1924

D. W. Griffith's Epic 'America' Opens Today at Majestic Theater

"AMERICA," D. W. Griffith's screen epic of the war of American independence, which opens the Majestic theater's screen season with a week's engagement, starting tonight, although it did not begin to take actual form until last summer, has really been several years in the making.

For years Griffith has been preparing to make a film dealing with the American revolution. He had amassed a wealth of data and had even prepared a story. But the matter lay dormant until the Daughters of the American Revolution, seeking a means of making a contribution to the sesquicentennial of the struggle for freedom, prevailed upon him to undertake the task of putting the ideas of our forefathers into motion picture form.

Accepting this commission, Griffith's first act was to establish a special research bureau to complete his own efforts at obtaining the very necessary meticulously accurate historical information. The work of this bureau consumed months and took members of the research bureau across the seas to there inquire into the modes and etiquette of King George III.

Fortunately Griffith received the voluntary assistance of practically every historical and patriotic organization in the country, not only in the labor of digging out long forgotten facts, but in the loan of historical homes and relics, and as volunteers to act as extra people. This enabled him to reproduce many scenes on the exact sites of the original happenings ,using appurtenances actually used, and using descendants of the original heroes as actors.

Below, a visualization of a Revolutionary war battle, "America," directed by D. W. Griffith, Auditorium, beginning Monday night; above, left, Mary Newcomb, "East Street," Playhouse, beginning May 11, and, right, Ann Harding, "The Horse Thief," moving from the Harris to Cohan's Grand tomorrow; top, Juliette Day, "No, No, Nanette," musical comedy, Harris, tomorrow.

Producer Griffith, pretty Carol Dempster and Lionel Barrymore, three important factors in the photoplay.

Los Angeles (Cal) Express May 3 1924

Washington (DC) News 5/3/24

HISTORIC STRUCTURE IS SHOWN IN D. W. GRIFFITH'S LATEST

ONE of the buildings that is reproduced in D. W. Griffith's romance of the Revolutionary period, "America," coming to Los Angeles' newest theater, The Forum, May 15, is Buckman's tavern. It is shown in connection with the Battle of Lexington, in 1775—one of the finest representations of an historic event of great importance, yet brought to the screen. Much of the information that was utilized by Griffith and his staff in the recreation of the atmosphere and of the aspects of the period came from President Edwin B. Worthen of the Lexington Historical society. He had all sorts of documents and of drawings to furnish accurate information to Griffith and his assistants and each detail had the closest scrutiny before there was final adoption of the property.

Buckman tavern was the chief hostelry of the town. There wealthy travelers on their way north or south would arrive in their splendid coaches with numerous Negro servants. Outside the tavern usually were many idlers—men smoking long church-warden pipes and with no apparent object in life except to discuss affairs of neighbors. The 12-mile journey to Boston was usually made on horseback. Sometimes a whole family — father, mother and one or two children—would be on the back of a plodding, patient horse.

It was in these [illegible] everything for the colonists was imported from England. Strangely enough New York was not the port of entry. Instead, the goods that were sent from England arrived by way of Virginia, and were passed through the custom house at Williamsburg, Va.

That house is still standing and Griffith introduced it in several scenes in "America." The house is just as it was in those days when milady was dependent upon the customs officers there to pass upon silks, jewels and all sorts of wearing apparel. Much of her food went through that gateway and the rare wines for her husband's cellars were given entry by the gover[illegible] Williamsburg.

D. W. GRIFFITH

GRIFFITH LOOKED OVER 500 ACTORS FOR GEORGE ROLE

THE figure of George Washington, as shown in D. W. Griffith's colossal new film spectacle, "America," now entering its th[illegible]ful week at Poli's, was determined by a jury after months of careful research.

An old letter he had written to a London tailor immediately after the war offered the most accurate measurements of him physically.

He ordered suits of "best material, for a man just six feet tall, medium slender, and standing erect."

Many of Washington's portraits show him as an old man, and vary greatly in details of expression as well as size of features. When the jury, composed of three historians and eight others, had decided upon the appearance that history had recorded for the gerat leader, Griffith set about finding the actor to play the part.

He tested more than 300 actors, finally selecting Arthur Dewey as the most perfect type. Dewey is a descendant of revolutionary ancestors.

He was born in Colchester, Ill., where his parents still reside. He went on the stage when a youth and gained valuable experience during an exciting barnstorming career thru the middle west.

Lincoln (Neb) Journal May 4 1924

Filed at Last.

New York World: The long contemplated suit of D. W. Griffith against Al Jolson for $500,000 damages was filed in the federal courts yesterday.

It arose over the incident last July of Al Jolson leaving for Europe unexpectedly after he had first seen himself on the screen at the Griffith studio. In leaving the noted blackface singer left Griffith holding the bag in the shape of a large number of players which he had placed under contract at big salaries.

Action on the picture was halted until Griffith could bring Lloyd Hamilton from Hollywood as a substitute for Jolson's in the mean while, the sets had been erected and the company was still drawing salary, although not working.

The original name of the picture was "Black and White," and it has since been released as "His Darker Self," though not under the original banner.

St. Paul (Minn) Pioneer-Press May 4. 1924

Griffith's Forecast.

"Director Mark Griffith says that in a few years there will be no [illegible] film 'colony,' but that most of the picture making will be carried on within commuting distance of New York. And Irving Lesser of the Principal Pictures corporation, whose productions are all in Hollywood at this time, says it is only a matter of time until New York will be the headquarters of every branch of the industry.

"Of course, there are many more studios in the West than in the East. And still it is important to note that at this time arrangements are being made by a group of independent producers to erect what they say will be the largest studio in the world in the vicinity of Woodside, Long Island, that there are at least twenty-five studios in active operation on Manhattan Island, Long Island and New Jersey at this time. In the Astoria, Long Island, studio of Famous Players alone, five companies are busy. Probably 90 per cent of the motion picture work will be made here this season."

Houston (Tex) Post May 3 1924

Use ~~Three Weeks~~ to Film Ride of Paul Revere

"FIRST in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," will be the watchward of David Wark Griffith's historical tribute to George Washington when the Griffith photoplay, "America," is presented at the Auditorium Theater Monday evening, the full proceeds to go to the Washington Portrait Fund to keep the famous Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington in Chicago.

Several years ago, Mr. Griffith began planning an elaborate and accurate film story of the American revolution. His research staff had harvested many unusual and whimsical facts long shadowed as trifles, but vividly revealing the life of that day.

Urged by D. A. R.

In May, 1923, the Daughters of the American Revolution addressed a letter to the motion picture industry, inquiring why a firm of the revolutionary war had not been undertaken, and suggesting it should not be delayed.

Mr. Will Hays received the letter and asked Mr. Griffith to undertake the work. After carefully considering the magnitude of making this picture, Mr. Griffith consented. He believed it would be of moral value as well as passing entertainment for the American people to see again the bravery and unbreakable will that their forefathers presented against the agonizing woes and the hostile scourges through a cold, ill-dressed and hungry warfare without adequate arms or disciplined leaders.

He first took the ride of Paul Revere, a brief incident in the story, but one that required three weeks to film.

Every historic scene shown in the film was photographed in part on the actual ground where the historic action occurred. Mr. Griffith took his players to Lexington for scenes at the old Clark home showing Hancock and Adams arriving and leaving there. This is the same house that sheltered them in 1775.

Guard Against Fire.

Mr. Griffith went to the old North church, in Boston, where Charles K. Belton, president of the Boston Athenaeum and senior warden of Old North Church, permitted him to wire the belfry, the first time ever done. Police and fire guards were in constant attendance to guard against possibility of fire or damage. The scenes shown in the picture are actual photographs of this church which stands exactly as it did when Paul Revere received his alarm.

Through Secretary of War John W. Weeks, Mr. Griffith received the assistance of the United States Army in arranging the battle scenes. Maj. William C. Rose of Governor's Island sent the Eighteenth and Sixteenth Infantry under command of Capt. George T. Shank[illegible]

San Antonio (Tex) News 5/3/24

AMERICA' REAL EPIC OF SCREEN

SUPERFILM DEPICTING AMERICAN REVOLUTION OPENS AT MAJESTIC MAY 11.

HERALDED by reviewers as one of the outstanding screen masterpieces of all time, D. W. Griffith's epic of the War of American Independence, "America," will have its San Antonio premiere at the Majestic, beginning with a Sunday matinee on May 11. The engagement is for one week, with performances twice daily.

The presentation of what is described as the great director's greatest artistic achievement promises to be the most important motion picture event of the year.

Telling its romantic story by means of thrilling suspense, "America" [illegible] a tribute of beautiful romance given the birth of America's high ideals, thanks to Griffith's inspired direction, has given the screen the character of a work of art [illegible] to a time like this when the screen is overwhelming with the crude building of the drama.

Historically correct, as the battle scenes of America's struggle for independence take on the color of a romance, the story of Paul Revere's ride, Washington's [illegible] and the [illegible] of the Revolution, the story of the struggle of a young [illegible] who [illegible] to a time like this when the screen is overwhelming with the crude building of the drama.

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 5/3

A small army of artisans are giving their best efforts toward bringing William H. Hussey's long-cherished dream—the new Forum theater—into a finished reality in time for the dual premiere of David Wark Griffith's "America," and one of Los Angeles' finest cinema temples, on the evening of May 15.

Time, the intersection of Pico and Norton streets represents a beehive of activity out of which will emerge a masterpiece of Roman art when the day for the big event in things theatrical arrives a week from next Tuesday.

Nothing is being left undone that would tend to enhance the beauty of this motion picture temple that will reveal itself to the public for the first time coincident with the western premiere of Griffith's master gift to the screen, which takes its theme from the days when America was but a colony skirting the Atlantic coast.

Griffith's research for historical accuracy in his contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the birth of freedom in America probably that of Pansy and his associates in creating exact knowledge of Rome and the [illegible] for incorporation in architecture and mural paintings that line the walls of the new Forum. Many last minute details, a touch of the brush here, a lighting effect there, a tapestry changed to give a better blending of color, [illegible] the placing of extra [illegible] furniture and [illegible] other things that add materially to the impression [illegible] that the big new neighborhood theater which its promoters claim will be a gem in any city now in a great rush of [illegible] construction and Rome are [illegible] behind the day set for the premiere.

This theater will find several innovations in the art Forum, among them a parking station with reserve space for [illegible]

D. W. Griffith

Grand Rapids (Mich) Herald May 4 1924

D. W. Griffith, wizard of the screen, has accepted an invitation of Italian bankers to go to Rome to confer on the production of a series of motion pictures to be made there. This action on the part of the banking group has the full approval of the Italian government, and brought forth from the syndicate this statement: "We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward re[illegible] motion picture industry in Italy to its [illegible] health and prosperity."

Sunday, May 4, 1924 THE HOUSTON CHRONICLE

D. W. Griffith's Picture "America" Opens At Majestic

"America" and Its Making

San Antonio Tex Express May 4 1924

"America", Epic of Revolutionary Days, Coming

Here are some scenes from D. W. Griffith's newest film triumph, "America," soon to be seen at the Majestic Theater. The figure at the upper left is Arthur Donaldson in the role of King George IV, upper right shows George Washington at Valley Forge, below are the Minute Men going to the Battle of Lexington.

Huge Griffith Film Picturing Stirring Events in Country's History is Booked For Majestic.

D. W. GRIFFITH, responsible to a greater degree than anyone for innovations in the making of photoplays, and father of the motion picture as a vehicle for art, has again made a radical departure from established custom in the filming of "America," the titanic epic of Revolutionary days, produced at the suggestion of the Daughters of the American Revolution, which will be shown at the Majestic Theater all of next week.

In fact, it may be rightly stated that "America" embodies more distinct novelties in motion picture production than even the masterpiece with which Griffith hitherto has revolutionized the theater world.

Because of the fact that the production was undertaken at the instigation of the most prominent patriotic organizations, representatives of which are at present at the filming of the various scenes, and that through the power of War Works, the United States Army incorporated, Mr. Griffith was brought to achieve the most work ever accruing from a historical film.

It is this and he established a record by the number of reports to date into the historical documents housed in public and private museums and societies throughout the country. This wealth of reports, among which are included the battle narratives of generals and other officers who were in the thick of the fighting during the Revolution, have been the most minutely accurate in regard to the dress, manners, customs, and even the speech of the period, and have been used by Mr. Griffith in the production of "America."

Not only did Mr. Griffith and his company of 1,000 people, including the famous Lexington Minute Men, visit the various battlefields where the action really took place, Mr. Griffith, accompanied by his large staff of experts, which includes historical, military and technical advisers, and his entire company have been touring the country in special cars, staging the scenes for "America" on such widely separated points as Lexington Common, Washington's home at Mount Vernon, Valley Forge, and the old North Church in Boston.

The famous ride of Paul Revere, for example, was actually filmed on the road over which he rode. Even in cases where the erection of monuments or modern improvements made the "shooting" of massive scenes impossible, Mr. Griffith has included scenes of the actual historical sites, weaving them into the action of his story with a mastery of which he alone is capable.

But perhaps of all the many innovations in the filming of "America," the most unusual is the use of large units of the regular army of the United States in several battle scenes. Infantrymen and cavalrymen, clad in the garb of British grenadiers and in the buff and blue of Washington's Continental Army sweeps majestically through the action.

It is the first time that units of the regular army have been requested to a dramatic film, so that Uncle Sam's soldiery has ever donned costumes to appear before the motion picture camera. In staging the scenes in which the soldiers appear, Mr. Griffith had the aid of some officers on the retired roster of the territorial department and tactics as used during the Revolution.

The same tactics as the era from "the shot that was heard 'round the world," on Lexington Green, to the engagement which culminated in the surrender of Cornwallis, are to be shown in this extraordinary photoplay, and its dramatic episodes from Paul Revere's ride to the signing of the Declaration of Independence will lend their inspiring atmosphere.

As a member of the Lexington Minutemen, descendants of the first armed patriots who in their brilliant buff and blue uniforms took part in several scenes filmed in Lexington, Mass., remarked "America" purely as an inspiration to patriotism should prove more valuable than all the histories

Los Angeles Cal News 5/4/24

LEXINGTON BANKER AIDED IN FILMING GRIFFITH CINEMA

YD

IT is one thing to take a battle scene for a motion picture. And it is quite another thing to take a scene of battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill and make those scenes absolutely historically correct to the smallest detail. But that, according to Edwin B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society, is what D. W. Griffith has done in "America," which will have its local premiere at the Auditorium tomorrow night.

Mr. Worthen, who is a banker in Lexington, aided through the loan of historical data, and of invaluable revolutionary relics, including the drum, flintlocks, powder horns and other implements actually used in the battle of Lexington, in making "America," which Griffith produced for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the war of American independence. He attended the world premiere of the picture in New York.

Following this he said to Mr. Griffith: "I am at a loss for words to express how deeply impressed I am with the picture. I had seen you and your company at work in Lexington. I expected much, but nothing so stupendous or stirring as your finished product. Yet ever in the magnitude of your task you have held to historic accuracy with remarkable fidelity. You cannot imagine the trembling, the thrills that grasped me as the little village of Lexington, the birthplace of American liberty, came before my eye.

"Scenes taken on the spot where Hancock and Adams sought the hospitality of Parson Clarke—the Hancock Clarke house, where those two men were strengthened in their immortal task by the sound counsel of the parson, and from which that patriot witnessed the massacre on Lexington Common—the same drum that summoned those humble farmers to immortality—the guns, the powder horns they wore, sacred relics kept for all time as an inspiration to future Americans—here was real drama to thrill me.

"You have portrayed brave Jonas Parker as he was—the man who, having sworn he would never flee from a British red coat, wounded, trying to load his flint lock, was struck down and bayonetted by the king's troops. You have made live again Capt. Parker, the idol of his little band, the man who said, 'If they mean war let it be here!'"

Worcester (Mass) Telegram 5/4/24

"AMERICA" COMING TO THE WORCESTER

YD

written of the clever slogan broadcasted throughout the land.

For although through it like a thread of gold runs a charming romance of love, "America" is the first visualized history of our country, teaching her traditions so that he who runs may read and understand.

Chicago (Ill) Herald-Examiner May 4 1924

BATTLE SCENES IN 'AMERICA' ARE ACCURATE

YD

IT is one thing to take a battle scene for a motion picture. And it is quite another thing to take a scene of battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill and make those scenes absolutely historically correct to the smallest detail. But that, according to Edwin B. Worthen, president of the Lexington Historical Society, is what D. W. Griffith has done in "America," which will have its local premiere at the Auditorium tomorrow night.

Mr. Worthen, who is a banker in Lexington, aided through the loan of historical data, and of invaluable revolutionary relics, including the drum, flintlocks, powder horns and other implements actually used in the battle of Lexington, in making "America," which Griffith produced for the Daughters of the American Revolution as their contribution to the sesquicentennial celebration of the war of American independence. He attended the world premiere of the picture in New York.

Following this he said to Mr. Griffith: "I am at a loss for words to express how deeply impressed I am with the picture. I had seen you and your company at work in Lexington. I expected much, but nothing so stupendous or stirring as your finished product. Yet ever in the magnitude of your task you have held to historic accuracy with remarkable fidelity. You cannot imagine the trembling, the thrills that grasped me as the little village of Lexington, the birthplace of American liberty, came before my eye.

"Scenes taken on the spot where Hancock and Adams sought the hospitality of Parson Clarke—the Hancock Clarke house, where those two men were strengthened in their immortal task by the sound counsel of the parson, and from which that patriot witnessed the massacre on Lexington Common—the same drum that summoned those humble farmers to immortality—the guns, the powder horns they wore, sacred relics kept for all time as an inspiration to future Americans—here was real drama to thrill me.

"You have portrayed brave Jonas Parker as he was—the man who, having sworn he would never flee from a British red coat, wounded, trying to load his flint lock, was struck down and bayonetted by the king's troops. You have made live again Capt. Parker, the idol of his little band, the man who said, 'If they mean war let it be here!'"

Houston (Texas) Chronicle 5/4/24

"America" Opens At Majestic Today

YD

CAST.

Carol Dempster	Neil Hamilton
Lionel Barrymore	Louis Wolheim
Riley Hatch	Arthur Donaldson
Orville Alderson	Erdner Deane
Edwin Holland	James Melaldy

* * *

"America," said to surpass even "Birth of a Nation" in point of spectator interest and magnitude of production, replaces vaudeville at the Majestic Theatre this week.

Griffith's latest masterpiece in celluloid takes the screen at the Majestic this afternoon for a run of a week.

"America" is the romantic story of the fight of colonists who came to this country to escape the rule of the British crown. In "America" Griffith, with the assistance of the most able historians of the country, graphically depicts the battles of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill. The pictures show the action at Valley Forge where Washington's little band made a strong fight against hunger and cold. "America" follows right after all the important parts of the American revolution.

An interesting feature of the film is that Paul Revere, played by Neil Hamilton, is the role of Paul Revere, is the only man who ever rode the entire distance of his famous ride. The riding was done by Paul Revere himself, who was found by Griffith while he was riding in a parade in Boston. Revere was then 82 years old and was in the saddle for the entire distance. Revere's ride was made in 1775 and he was 82 years old when he rode the distance for the film.

Griffith's latest masterpiece will be shown at the Majestic Theatre for a week, beginning today.

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 5/4/24

ARTISANS RUSH WORK ON LUXURIOUS NEW THEATER

YD

A [illegible] of artisans toiled [illegible] to have the new Griffith theater in Los Angeles ready for the premiere of "America" on May 12. Workmen were busy last night and yesterday in the lobby, the auditorium and the stage of the new theater, which is to be the finest of its kind in the city.

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner May 4 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Times 4/4/24

TWO MONUMENTS TO RESEARCH

Theater and Picture Result of Labor

YD

Carol Dempster in "America"

A STRIKING parallel exists between the two chief figures in the double premiere set for the 15th inst at Pico and Norton streets—the opening of the Forum Theater and the first presentation of D. W. Griffith's "America" in Los Angeles. This parallel is the vast amount of research done by officials of the new Forum Theater and by the staff of Griffith to make both achievements historically correct.

For years it has been the dream of William H. Hussey, president and general manager of the new Pico-street cinema temple, to erect a monument to motion pictures and their allied arts—a fitting structure that would bear out in a modern way, ancient ideas. In the Forum he sees the realization of an ideal.

Critics have called "America" Griffith's greatest contribution to the screen. The idea of filming certain phases of America's fight for freedom came to Griffith long ago, in fact, soon after he made "The Birth of a Nation," so when the Daughters of the American Revolution asked him to make the picture as a contribution to the sesquicentennial of the birth of freedom in the United States, much of the preliminary ground already had been gone over. No attempt is made to picture the English occupation of America, or even a narrative of the Revolutionary struggle for liberty. Rather Griffith has shown something of the devotion and self-sacrifice of those who established the republic, hoping thereby to turn the American mind back to what it cost to win freedom for the country. "Lest we forget" is the keynote of the picture: "be it remembered," its summing up.

Griffith's search for accuracy in his production even went so far as to utilize many of the relics of the early days as properties in the film. Actors were chosen for both facial and stature conformity, that what the best authorities hold the original character had.

Chicago (Ill) Herald-Express May 4 1924

SOCIETY BACKS PORTRAIT SHOW

YD

Performance of "America" for Fund Tomorrow Night to Be Like Opera Premiere.

BOYS WILL BE USHERS

Griffith Gives Entire Proceeds Toward Buying Washington's Picture.

See "America" first at the Auditorium tomorrow night.

It will be a typical D. W. Griffith premiere of a great photoplay. Society will be present to the Washington portrait fund.

Exhibition will be the seventh week and running twice through from now on. The financial benefit profiting of Washington will be made for Washington.

Society will make a festival "first night" of it, as was the Coronation in the first night of opera, and so they give under the direction of Miss Mary Brown will assist in the usual manner.

Best Known Theaters.

And what the ladies are doing in the theaters and the boys are doing in the theaters and the boys are doing in the theaters and the boys

Washington (DC) Times 5/5/24 — Cincinnati (O) Times-Star 5/5/24 — San Antonio (Texas) News 5/6/24 — Chicago (Ill) American 5/6/24

"America's" Heroine

CAROL DEMPSTER.

As the lovely, little lady around whom the heart interest revolves in D. W. Griffith's picture of Revolutionary days, now in its third week at Poli's Theater.

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 5/5/24

"AMERICA" WILL STAND AS GRIFFITH'S MASTERPIECE

Photoplay at Shubert Revives Thrilling Period of Our History —Aileen Pringle Scores in "Three Weeks"—"A Son of the Sahara" Is Colorful Romance.

As sweet as an old song sung at twilight, yet so powerful that it thrills the heart and stirs the soul, David Wark Griffith's "America," based on the greatest story ever adapted to the screen, will live long after its creator is dust and its actors phantoms.

The audience which came to criticize at the film's Cincinnati premier at the Shubert, Sunday night, remained to wonder. Seeking imperfections, they found a masterpiece. For "America" is all of that. Indeed, after seeing the picture, "masterpiece" seems inadequate.

Griffith, while asserting that "America" is not historical, teaches more history than a million text books. On the printed page, the Minute Men of Concord and Lexington are statuesque, cold, legendary. In "America" they are vital forces, happy with human happiness and responsive to human woes.

As implied, the film is based on the epoch incident to the Revolutionary war—the battle "at the rude bridge which arched the April flood;" the ride of Paul Revere, Freedom's Gethsemane at Valley Forge, and, lastly, the severing of the bonds which united the Colonies with England.

Woven in and out is the love-story of "Nathan Holden," Massachusetts express rider, and "Nancy Montague," daughter of aristocracy. A tale that is strangely beautiful, this. So much different from the love-stories of 1924.

But, when all is said and done, "America" will endure because of its historic settings. "Paul Revere's Ride" is the stuff of eternity. So, too, is the etching where a forgotten hand fires "the shot heard round the world."

Carol Dempster, as "Nancy Montague," strikes a new note in acting. Her characterization is something to be remembered and treasured. Neil Hamilton, as "Nathan Holden," attains a place among the stars. Charles Emmett Mack, as "Charles Montague," "Nancy's" brother, weak, yet brave; effeminate, yet manly, is appealing. In fact—this is confidential—he was responsible for quite a few tears Sunday.

Then there is Arthur Dewey, as "George Washington;" Lionel Barrymore, as "Captain Walter Butler," sponsor of the Indian massacres, who dies as all villains should; Erville Alderson, as "Justice Montague," "Nancy's" Tory father, who lives to see the error of his way, and—but to name all whose great work makes "America," would be to name the entire cast.

Summed up, the film is Griffith's greatest achievement. Those who fail to see it will miss the high tide thus far reached in the cinema.

—NIXSON HUNTON.

New Haven (Conn) Journal-Courier May 5 1924

SHUBERT

The student of American history who has knowledge of the warfare in the north country during the war of independence, will find many illuminating touches in D. W. Griffith's "America" at the Shubert all this week. There are few more interesting, yet slightly known characters in that period of American history than Joseph Brant, the Indian.

Brant, chief of the Mohawks differed from the majority of his tribe

CAROL DEMPSTER AT THE SHUBERT

Washington (DC) News 5/4/24

Houston (Texas) Post 5/5/24

"America" Pleases Big Audience at Majestic One of Griffith's Best Mary Pickford Follows

"America," D. W. Griffith's widely heralded epic of the War of Independence, Sunday opened a week's engagement at the Majestic theater and, incidentally, ushered in the film season at the Rusk avenue playhouse. The initial audience was genuinely enthusiastic and much of the spirited action was greeted with sustained outbursts of applause.

In "America" Producer Griffith has taken an epic theme and given it all the punch, bokum, beauty, love interest and conflict that serves to elevate it to the high level of his former classic, "The Birth of a Nation," one of the greatest motion pictures—viewed from every angle—in the history of the industry.

It is nothing short of a miracle that Griffith has accomplished in "America." It holds—and holds tightly despite the fact that subjects pertaining to historical interest are more often tedious. "America" is not at all weighty or boresome, and therefore entitled to added praise.

Griffith has introduced his romantic theme in masterly fashion.

His romeon, of a Massachusetts lad and a Virginia maiden, introduces the only fictional characters of the story. With this tale of young love he binds together the whole literary war and does it without sacrificing either history or romance.

Two episodes stand out from a dramatic standpoint. The midnight ride of Paul Revere, taken by Harry O'Neill, had the crowd cheering and the dash of Morgan's riders to rescue the beleaguered Fort Sacrifice ranked almost as strong as a thriller.

Building logically, the introduction shows the Virginia home of Surgeons, King George and the British parliament, the Boston patriots and the arrival of the French in the British ship of Mr. Walter Butler. Nathan Holden, a Boston patriot, who goes to Nancy Montague, a Virginia belle, and their romance begins.

Nat Holden does a great piece of work as Nathan Holden, who begins as a Boston patriot and finds himself in the midst of the Revolutionary war. Nancy Montague, the Virginia belle, is the chief character, and Carol Dempster does a great piece of work in the role. Her work in the Griffith production of "Dream Street" and "Way Down East" and her part in the production of "Three Weeks" and "Orphans of the Storm" are well remembered. Her work in "America" is equally good. The death of Nancy Hill and Sarah Morgan, the Virginia belle, and the capture of Fort Sacrifice are the most thrilling events in the story.

Lionel Barrymore, as Captain Walter Butler, the Tory leader in the Indian massacre, Harry Hall, as Sir Ashley Montague, the British officer, Erville Alderson, as Justice Montague, the Tory father, Arthur Dewey, as George Washington, Charles Emmett Mack, a Virginia lad, and Neil Hamilton, as Nathan Hale, are the chief characters.

Griffith has introduced his romance in a deeply learned manner and faith were familiar language to him, and his knowledge of science, history and the drama was far more extensive than that of the average educated man.

Brant had studied in Europe and impelled extensively there. He educated, failed to change his character and he returned to the religion of his people. He was closely allied to the Tory cause, and the story relating to one of the leading Tories at the time, was the death of Jenny Jenkins.

Brant, though he was Tory, was a man of more honor than that. Walter Butler, the Tory leader in the Indian massacre, Harry Hall as Sir Ashley Montague, and Arthur Dewey, as Washington, perhaps the most outstanding characters in the story.

Nat Holden, the young Boston patriot

Dallas (Tex) M. P. Journal 5/6/24

Variety May 7 1924

San Antonio (Tex) News 5/8/24

Lexington (Mass) Post

"AMERICA"—Majestic

Nothing so stirs the blood of the average American and so fires his imagination as the stirring and romantic history of his own country, and no period is quite so rich from this angle as the struggle for independence.

Under the title "America" D. W. Griffith has given another epoch to the screen that will probably appeal tremendously to the majority of audiences, and while it is not another "Birth of a Nation," it is to the screen of 1924 what the Birth was to the screen of 1915.

What Griffith succeeds admirably in portraying in "America" is the great sacrifice made by our forefathers. He has caught the spirit of '76—the indomitable spirit of our forefathers—and has transferred it to the screen in such a way that you glory in being an American, and realize the cause of this country's greatness—the spirti of its people.

One of the most outstanding features of the production and one which attests the great genius of the great director, is the remarkable manner in which he retains the historical atmosphere, depicting with startling effectiveness scene after scene of actual occurrence during the stirring times of revolutionary days.

The action of the production starts in the quiet little village of Lexington before that peaceful hamlet became the scene of some of the most stirring incidents in the making of Amtrican history. The meeting of the Virginia house of Burgesses, at which the thrilling speech of young Patrick Henry proved the balance which caused Virginia to cast her lot with the northern colonies, is interestingly shown.

The action again reverts to Masschusetts and takes the spectators through the siege of Boston, the ride of Paul Revere, the first stand of the Patriots against the British at Lexington, the retreat to Concord and the defeat there of the British Regulars, the Battle of Bunker Hill, and, in fact, all through the history-making times up to the restoration of peace at the end of the conflict.

It would be hard to conceive of anything more thrilling than the ride of Paul Revere to arouse the Middlesex farmers to resist the advance of the British Regulars. Some of the most superb horsemanship ever shown on the screen is seen during this spectacular scene.

Valley Forge is shown with a most realistic snow storm and equally realistically are depicted the intense sufferings ant heroism of the patriots under Washington, striving against almost overwhelming odds to withstand the rigors of cold, hunger and lack of clothing and still maintain an army in the field.

In the second part there is a switch to a new series of incidents centering around the depredations of the British and their Indian allies under Butler, with the torture of the inhabitants. These scenes are discreetly handled with a minimum of gruesomeness and the interest is again worked up to a high pitch.

Woven into these strenuous revolutionary days is a charmingly sweet love story, so perfectly done that it requires but a little stretch of the imagination to believe that the characters in the love theme are as authentic as are the actual historical figures in the action.

Carol Dempster is effective in the leading feminine role, and Neil Hamilton, playing opposite, is exceptionally fine.

The acting of the entire cast is of a high order, and altogether "America" is a spectacular, a great picture, and will be a great success everywhere.

Chicago (Ill) Tribune 5/6/24

San Antonio (Tex) Express 5/6/24

Griffith Picture 'America' Based on Early History

In D. W. Griffith's "America," the romance of the American Revolution, opening at the Majestic Theater Sunday the role of Nancy Montague, portrayed by Carol Dempster, is based on historical fact. Robert W. Chambers, who wrote the story and Griffith have used the character of Ethelyn Byrd of Virginia, claimed by contemporary writers to have been the most beautiful woman in America, as the basis for the character of Nancy Montague.

Miss Byrd, like the other aristocratic young women of the day, was taken to England for presentation at the Court of King George Third, and according to eye witnesses her great beauty made a deep impression on that monarch.

The Byrd mansion at Westover on the James River, is actually shown in "America," Griffith and his entire staff having spent several days shooting filming scenes.

Miss Dempster wears a striking assortment of contemporary gowns of true Byrd. The romance which Griffith has woven around the lives of the historical background of America, I believe, the actual romance of the beautiful Southern belle.

Los Angeles (Cal) Times 5/11/24

RUSH FOR TICKETS TO FORUM OPENING MEANS S. R. O. SIGN

Griffith Still Walks Movie Heights Alone

'America' Is His Greatest Since 'Birth of Nation.'

"AMERICA"

Produced and directed by D. W. Griffith.

Presented at the Auditorium theater.

THE CAST.

Nathan Holden	Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague	Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague	Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague	Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams	Lee Beggs
John Hancock	John Dunton
King George III	Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt	Charles Bennett
Thomas Jefferson	Frank Walsh
Patrick Henry	Frank McGlynn Jr.
George Washington	Arthur Dewey
Richard Henry Lee	P. R. Scammon
Capt. Walter Butler	Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague	Sidney Deane
Gen. Gage	W. W. Jones
Capt. Montour	E. Roseman
Chief of Senecas, Hiakatoo	Harry Semalls
Paul Revere	Harry O'Neill
John Parker, Captain of Minute Men	H. Van Bousen
Maj. Pitcairn	Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker	James Milaidy
Col. Prescott	H. Koser
Maj. Gen. Warren	Michael Donovan
Capt. Hare	Louis Wolheim
Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Brant	Riley Hatch
Lord North	Emil Hoch

By Mae Tinée.

Good morning!

"America," the greatest photoplay D. W. Griffith has made since "The Birth of a Nation," had its Chicago premiere last night at the Auditorium theater. Proceeds went to the people of Chicago for the purchase of the Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington.

What a picture! The illustrated story of momentous events in our country's history. Our country that has run red with the blood of patriots; that has been an altar of sacrifice on which, for a common good, fair women and brave men have laid their lives and loves with bitter tears, but no regrets. "America" is David Wark Griffith's tribute to George Washington.

Sometime ago—in May, 1923, I believe it was—the Daughters of the American Revolution wrote to members of the film industry asking why a picture having to do with the Revolutionary war wouldn't be something worth [redacted]. Mr. Will Hays promptly asked Mr. Griffith to undertake the direction of such a film. Mr. Griffith instantly responded that he would and got busy to no length of time.

Though a charming love story runs through the stern business of war as portrayed in "America"—"America" as detail has been the producer's watchword. He's visited battlefields. He's browsed in histories. He's turn his hair admiring "types." The role of Paul Revere (what an part a fine part of him—his) that role required three weeks to film.

Of course, one could write volumes about this masterpiece. Writing about it isn't the thing that matters here. The making of it and the moral it is what should concern you. What upon wave of applause greeted it last night.

However, "America" is beautiful film. It moves you along on a wave of enthusiasm. From the complete of the great Sunday the report have shown thousands have had their eyes. This caught at the [illegible] [illegible] TIME'S [illegible]

San Antonio (Tex) Express 5/7/24

TOWNS SEEK PLACE IN "AMERICA" FILM

Cleveland (O) Press 5/7/24

Pittsburgh (Pa) Post 5/7/24

GRIFFITH'S ESTIMATES FLOORED ITALIANS

Director Returning to This Country—Ill Health and Too Much Stalling

The return of D. W. Griffith from Italy next week is being attributed to the director's ill health by the home office. But in film circles his premature return is attributed to other causes.

Shortly after Griffith's arrival over there he is said to have had difficulties with the foreign exchange men, at whose invitation he went abroad. After much stalling and many conferences, Griffith is reported to have decided to wait no longer upon the money interests but to return to this country.

When Griffith sailed it was generally understood he would make a film after the fashion of "America" in several of the European countries. Italy was to have been the first and the deal had been virtually settled prior to his sailing.

Now it is said that when he arrived and mapped out plans for the historical and presented an estimate for what it would cost, it staggered the Italian capitalists.

With Italy backing down, and Griffith not in the best of health, he abandoned the idea of selling the proposition to other countries, preferring to return home and rest before doing any more directing.

Washington (DC) Times 5/7/24

POLI'S—"America."

To meet the increased demand for seats for the performances of D. W. Griffith's "America" at Poli's Theater, it is announced that the engagement of the historical film has been again extended and seats will be placed on sale at the box office Thursday morning for the fourth week of the Washington stay. Local playgoers have extended to "America" the same acclaim and patronage they accorded Mr. Griffith's "The Birth of a Nation," "Orphans of the Storm," "Hearts of the World," "Way Down East" and "Broken Blossoms." By many, in fact, "America" is considered the greatest achievement from Griffith's hand. While historical and patriotism arousing, the story of Robert W. Chambers from which "America" was made, contains sufficient of romantic interest to appeal to those film lovers who insist on the "love interest" in their film material. The cast gathered by Mr. Griffith for "America" is a most capable and distinguished one, containing Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, Charles Emmett Mack, Lionel Barrymore, Lee Beggs, Lucille La Verne, Arthur Dewey and others.

Los Angeles (Cal) Times 5/7/24

SELL SEATS BEFORE THEY ARE INSTALLED

In this days of speed and efficiency, one is almost apt to get a hat check before he buys his hat.

The seats at the new Forum Theater, at Pico and Norton, are even now being installed.

But the vouchers for these seats, the pasteboards that entitle the holder to his place in the pit are already on sale.

On the night of May 14, a Thursday, the high portals of this newest of houses will swing open to the public.

For the first time in the history of motion pictures, a D. W. Griffith film will be the feature at the opening of a new exhibitors. This is Griffith's latest offering. It took him one and a half years to film, covering itself with the Revolutionary period of American history, is described—from a spectacular and story-drama point of view—as a worthy successor to his "Birth of a Nation," and shares an extraordinarily formidable cast headed by Carol Dempster and Lionel Barrymore.

Indianapolis (Ind) Star 5/7/24

Research Shows Butler War of Revolution's Greatest Villain

Character of Famous Tory Spy Is Portrayed by Lionel Barrymore in 'America,' Superfilm Coming to Majestic Sunday.

Carol Dempster, young movie star, as "Nancy Montague" in "America," Griffith's master celluloid story.

WHO was the greatest villain of the War of American Independence?

No, contrary to the general belief, it was not Benedict Arnold, the traitor, but Walter Butler, the Tory.

Such is the conclusion of the staff of research experts which have been delving deep into Revolutionary history, into historical data, and even into private diaries of the period to get the authentic facts for "America," the photodrama of the Revolution which D. W. Griffith has made for the Daughters of the American Revolution to mark te opening of the 10-year celebration of the sesquicentennial of this country's struggles for freedom, which comes to the Majestic Theater next Sunday for a week's run.

Traitor to his country though he was, Benedict Arnold had, previous to his act of treachery, fought bravely. History shows him to have been a man weak but tender, a man who could fight fairly, a man endowed with a goodly stock of what is known as "humanity."

But none of the saving graces vouchsafed by history to Arnold are conferred on Butler. Indeed, one historian, and a contemporary one, eyewitness to some of the horrors perpetrated by Butler—declares categorically that Butler was a man "without a single redeeming trait."

Yet somehow, Butler has managed to escape the odium of his ruthless career, and the patriotically-minded declare that Griffith's "America," in which the acts of the influence of Butler are vividly portrayed, will go far towards bringing about more friendly relations between this country and Great Britain through a better understanding of how Butler and men of his ilk and not the great mass of the Tories first brought about and later waged the American Revolution.

It was Butler who advised the British scouring the Indians as allies, and who, in order to accomplish this, when the peaceably-inclined redskins declined to go on the warpath against the settlers, goaded them into it by massacring whole families of Indians and blaming the deed on the Americans.

It was Butler who gave the order to his Indian allies to spare neither women nor children; who staged wild orgies in order to awaken a thirst for liquor and vice among his savage followers, as well as to satisfy his own consuming passions.

It was Butler who led the frightful raid on Cherry Valley, slaying non-combatants, white men, women and children without mercy. It was Butler who, when he commanded one of the Indians to do a foul deed from which even the savage recoiled, himself murdered his friend and ally with a tomahawk.

His acts were the acts of an insane man, his whole career that of a megalomaniac or a paranoic. Had he lived at the present day he probably would be an inmate of an asylum had his private life been as it was.

Yet, his councils managed to prevail with King George III, the mad monarch who refused to listen to his more prudent councillors.

Records show that Butler was equally insensible to the courage of enemies and the sufferings of friends. He and his band of savages took no prisoners; gave no quarter. On such few occasions as he did spare life of an enemy, it was but to save the latter up for cruel tortures at the stake. According to contemporary historians, Butler delighted in witnessing the torture of the helpless.

Songs of the period, and poetry, too, tell the pitiful plight of Butler's closest friends and allies, the one finding their daughters ruined, the other their wives and mothers slain.

And nowhere in history, not even in the records of the English officers, can be found a word in extenuation of Butler's terrible acts. Indeed, on the contrary, it is made very plain that the English officers have neither friendship for him, nor anything but shame for his deeds. On every possible occasion he violated the Briton's inborn respect for fair play.

Like many deranged minds, Butler imagined himself immune from retribution and death. Tracked through the woods by some of the very redskins he had helped to turn against the white men and their defenseless homes, he lingered behind his bodyguard of savages to hurl obscene defiances at his pursuers. He could not forego his opportunity to play the braggart.

He was shot through the eye and then tomahawked, leaving, according to contemporary historians, a score of gallows cheated of legitimate prey, but giving birth to a country-wide and unanimous sigh of relief.

The character of Capt. Butler is capably portrayed in "America" by Lionel Barrymore.

Worcester (Mass) Post 5/8/24

Lexington, Mass., Children in "Am

These two Lexington children were delighted at making their debut in the movies when D. W. Griffith took the Lexington part of his big historical film, "America." They played a small bit as the children of Parson Jonas Clarke. In the insert is Neil Hamilton, formerly of Lynn, who as Nathan Holden, the young hero, is becoming the popular idol of the children of historic Boston. The children are Virginia Lamont, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harold V. Lamont of Lexington, and Edwin B. Worthen, Jr., son of the president of the Lexington Historical Society.

Town Topics Bgc 5/8/24

UNLESS memory is at fault, the current week supplies the second instance of two of D. W. Griffith's greater efforts playing on the Rialto simultaneously, "The Birth of a Nation" having been revived for the 'steenth time at the Cameo Theatre and "America" remaining at the Forty-fourth Street, the interesting spectacle being thus provided of seeing Griffith's earliest really big picture and his latest being shown concurrently and on the same street. "America" continues to draw the public—its theme alone, of course, would suffice for that, were the direction not as fine as it is—but, as a second viewing of the picture brings home to you, it is undoubtedly the product of a real genius of the cinema and one of his best at that. As with all fine dramatic efforts, there are some things in "America" with which you are bound to differ, but the film is so full of thrilling and unexpected sequences that these all go by the board when you fall under the Griffith spell.

For those born [illegible] and, no motion picture [illegible] so much interest, excite [illegible] formation as D. W. Griffith's pa[illegible] romance "America," which will [illegible] at the Worcester Theater all next week beginning Sunday with daily matinees. This picture shows the sacrifices the early Americans made that this should be a country of the free.

To present this most dramatic of stories in an interesting way, Mr. Griffith arranged an impassioned and romantic love story, with the events of the war of 1776 as a background.

Critics of New York and Boston agree that it is the most thrilling and most patriotic motion picture ever made.

More than 10,000 actors were used. Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton, the new sensation among men of the screen, Lionel Barrymore, Lucille La-Verne, Louis Wolheim and Charles Mack are some of the great cast.

This picture is one of the real events of the theatrical season and will not be shown in any other theater here this year.

New Haven (Conn) Journal Courier May 7 1924

LOCAL BOY STAR OF "AMERICA" FILM

Neil Hamilton who is starring in the picture "America" showing this week at the [redacted] Theatre is a local boy and attended the performance last evening accompanied by his wife and his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander B. Hamilton of 41 New Street, West Haven.

Mr. Hamilton was born in Lynn, Massachusetts, September 9, 1899 and received his education in the grammar and high schools of Athol Massachusetts where his parents had moved while he was a baby.

He came to New Haven in 1916 and after spending two years working in numerous factories about the city decided to go to New York and try his luck in the theatrical business. His work in Fort Lee and vaudeville at all the studios and theatre was given extra work by the World Pictures Corporation.

He was engaged in this work for a year until he received a minor part in a play called the "Hunter Trail" which toured the United States and with which Mr. Hamilton was promoted until reaching Boston. He worked at various jobs while in Boston, finally returning to New York where he was introduced to and found by Mr. D. W. Griffith.

He was later hired by Mr. Griffith to act a minor part in a film called the "White Rose." He was then asked to another starring picture called "Dream Street" in which he played the part of a gypsy. Mr. Griffith was pleased with Mr. Hamilton's work in the picture and chosen to play the part of the student Jerry in the production "Orphans of the Storm." Mr. Griffith was so pleased with the performance that he chose Mr. Hamilton for the part of the young Revolutionary soldier in "America."

Mr. Hamilton is married to the former Miss Ethel Dwyer of Lynn, Massachusetts, and they have one child, a boy, Neil Hamilton, Jr., who is now two years old.

Baltimore (Md) Evening Sun 5/7/24

Houston (Tex) Chronicle 5/8/24

The ride of Paul Revere, the most thrilling incident in American history and likewise the thriller of "America," D. W. Griffith's photodramatic film version of the revolution now showing at the Majestic Theatre here, was long in filming.

A scratch horse postponed the film ride of Revere from Boston to Lexington and Concord.

Lexington and Boston historians finally agreed on the color of the horse Paul Revere rode in his history making ride. The color thus agreed upon was unlike any decided on in the many famous paintings of the equally famous mount and its famous rider.

The horse wanted was found in New York and arrived at Lexington after a stormy sea voyage. The executive committee of the little village was out to greet the horse. When the four-footed actor landed some time it was seen that the sea had been still with it and that immediately one could be sought.

That the role of Paul Revere is the greatest feature of the production is the concerted opinion of New York critics who viewed Griffith's newest effort.

It was this scene that brought so thrills to their feet with cheers as did the riding phenomenon in "Mark of Zorro." Frank Mc Glynn, Jr. who is cast as Paul Revere, is a horseman of no mean ability. He is a [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Telegraph May 9 1924

GRIFFITH RETURNS FROM ITALY, PICTURE IS STILL IN ABEYANCE

Producer-Director Reports Situation at Present Time Unsuitable for Big Work, but Proposition Is Still Under Discussion by Both Bankers and Himself.

SAW BIG STORY IN COUNTRY

By THOS. B. HANLY.

D. W. GRIFFITH, who was invited to Rome by an Italian banking syndicate to consider an offer for him to make a great Italian picture, returned yesterday on the Homeric.

So far as the picture is concerned, it may be said that it is still up in the air; that is, a picture may be made some months hence or it may not be. Definite proposals have been submitted on both sides and these must be thought over before a definite decision can be made.

Just at the present time, Mr. Griffith discovered, Italy has no studio capable of making a great spectacle.

"They have not the lighting facilities for a big set, and there are other things lacking," he said. "However, within three months another studio is to be finished which I think will be capable of handling such a work."

Another thing to prevent immediate acceptance, it was evident, was the question of cast. "I made a close study of conditions over there and discussed matters with American directors now working," he continued, "and I made up my mind that it would be impossible for me or any other director to make a picture with a cast composed of one or two Americans and the rest of Italians. I do not speak Italian and therefore I could not adequately get over to the players my ideas. As one man said to me, if an interpreter could get the idea over he could direct the picture himself."

Another thing which must be settled, it was also apparent, was the question of extras. "Conditions in that respect are very much disturbed," the director said. "You pay an extra, say, 12 lira a day, but that does not mean he works for that. He may come on the set, but if he lifts his arm or nods or cheers that means another lira. He stops at 2 o'clock and may accept overtime or go home to his red wine and spaghetti, no matter what you may desire."

The director said that there was no question of a story during his visit. Affairs evidently did not reach that stage.

"I found the greatest story I have ever seen just before my eyes in Italy," he said. "It is Italy herself, the Italy of Mussolini and the Fascisti. She is a new land, a land of energy and ambition. There is not an idle workman in the country, I was told. Americans are bringing their railroads, telephones and other public utilities up to date. People no longer saunter in that country. They are up and going with a truly Western spirit.

"Above all is Mussolini who reminds me more of Napoleon than of any other man since the days of the Emperor. Surrounded by a guard of 300,000 devoted followers who range from 18 to 27, and with another army of 1,000,000 in reserve, he dominates the country absolutely, but unlike other dictators we have read his influence is all for his country.

"There is nothing that man could not have in that country, but he remains only prime minister, but an absolute ruler as well. I visited the barracks where his men live and found the discipline was absolute. The Consul, who is one of the strongest men I have ever seen resembles an old Marshall of Napoleon. And he is just as devoted as any of them were.

"The men never walk there, they rush at all times to obey any order. In the State departments there is a life energy displayed. I was told that when Mussolini first took office he discovered the ancient dawdling spirit in vogue. One day changed all that."

"Confidentially," Mr. Griffith went on, "I was duly selected for an unusual honor before I left. They were to have made me a member of the Fascisti last Wednesday, but I was called to Milan and had to postpone the initiation. I hope to become a member of the black shirts when I go back there."

"No matter what may be the outcome of my visit," the director said in conclusion, "I get more thrills out of it than any other trip I have ever made. I saw big history in the making with a remarkable man at the principal actor."

RETURNS WITH ITALIAN FILM IN ABEYANCE.

D. W. Griffith, Who Went to Rome to Confer With a Banking Syndicate, Announces on Arrival Negotiations Were Not Completed, but Declares That the Trip Gave Him the Thrill of His Life.

D. W. Griffith, whose latest picture, "America," opens at the new Forum Theater on May 15.

Cincinnati (O) Post 5/9/24

Yorktown's Third

Yorktown, Virginia hamlet of Revolutionary fame, nestling on the James River, is aroused. For its few hundred inhabitants, who hitherto have counted the passage of time by the two great events of its career—its place in Revolutionary history and the establishment of a submarine mine base nearby during the World War—have been fired by what they consider the third outstanding event of history—the filming there by D. W. Griffith of scenes for "America," now at the Shubert Theater.

Historic houses, standing since 1770, formerly pointed out to visitors as the places where Washington slept, ate, or visited, are now proudly exhibited as the mansions where Griffith took such and such a scene with various local dignitaries as actors.

The quaint old church, practically unchanged since the first service was held there in the early '70's is today locally more famous as the place where Griffith and his staff attended a Sunday service than as the meeting house where Washington's staff once knelt in prayer.

There is no newspaper in Yorktown, but the intimate details of the scenes Griffith made, of how he and every member of his large company looked, acted and what they said and ate is known to every inhabitant.

Los Angeles Cal Examiner 5/9/24

TELLS HISTORY

Cleveland (O) Times 5/9/24

D. W. Griffith has turned his latest effort, "America," inside out since the first showing and the result is a splendidly striking and life-like picture which contains a touch of genius and substance. He has introduced Lafayette, and the picture at the present time possesses co-ordination which was originally lacking. Reviews of the remade photoplay state that the picture now is as mighty as "The Birth of a Nation."

my Post May 10 1924

Washington (DC) Times 5/10/24

Forefathers Felt Better in Homespun Than in Broadcloth, Says Griffith

Producer Almost Gave Up "America" Film Because Actors Couldn't Feel Romance of Story While Dressed in Sunday Clothes

BROADCLOTH, the dress of the dandies and beaus of the Revolutionary days, seems to be the barrier that has stood between people of today and a sympathetic understanding of the feelings and emotions of their forefathers.

Somehow or other, plays or pictures of life in Colonial times have not carried across to audiences the feeling of reality. There was something stiff and wooden about them. D. W. Griffith blames it all on broadcloth.

The subject came up in a discussion with the famous director just before he sailed for Italy recently. "You don't have any difficulty in getting right into the heart of the characters in 'America,' do you?" he asked. The tone of his deep, rich voice and the look in his keen eyes showed that he really wanted to know, for one of his outstanding characteristics is that he is constantly feeling the pulse of his public.

"When considering the story of 'America' for a picture," he continued, "I felt that it had the quality of reality, the lift of real human romance and daring and courage. After all, I know of no other way to decide whether or not a story will be popular than by the 'feel' of it. Some producers analyze and weigh and chart the drift of movements, but I know of many stories that measured to all the theories of success, yet were simply not there, as the saying goes.

"This story had the feel. But when it went into costume rehearsal it didn't. We rehearsed it over and over again. As soon as the players got into their costumes, the men particularly, they didn't feel that stir of romance which is indispensable to a good player working out a good part. Unless a player fits into the spirit of his part he is doomed to a mechanical interpretation."

After several days of worry, of calling to rehearsal and dismissing from same, the producer decided that a Revolutionary story could not be made interesting. Yet he felt that in this story he had all the elements of a glorious romance of adventure. Here was a fountain of drama, yet it didn't seem one. Mr. Griffith clasped his hands behind his head and seemed to be reliving his problem. A secretary looked in and, evidently familiar with the mood, discreetly withdrew.

"So we began checking back on the reality of everything," he continued at last. "We confirmed this and that and the other. And then we came to the clothing, and to our surprise we found that here was the center of it all, the one false note that had been destroying the feel of the story.

"All our costumes were of broadcloth, and as soon as we remembered that our forefathers of those days seldom wore broadcloth except for their Sunday best we knew that we had discovered the 'woodenness' that was killing the realism of our story. The public was right. It resented and rejected the Revolutionary plays of the past instinctively because the characters as shown did not represent the people as they lived then—could not represent them when they felt so unnatural in their stiff and formal costumes.

"We found that people in those days wore homespun, and the moment we put our men into homespun, behold real living beings. Instantly our players clicked into their parts. They were men again, living, loving, fighting as their forefathers actually had done, the aristocrats in satins and silks, the American pioneers in homely, hand-woven cloth. We had them at last as they had lived, and they were real."

The solution must have been highly satisfactory to Mr. Griffith, for he smiled broadly. Then he became serious again as he said: "Invariably one finds that the public is right in its instincts, and here it had extended even to such an apparently minor matter as the cloth of garments. But it was a vital difference."

Chicago (Ill) News May 10 1924

Paterson (NJ) Press-Guardian 5/9/24

"LEAPING DANGER," A GALLANT adventure that has been called the best star of David Wark Griffith's "Sons of Liberty." Next to his couple his claim, Harry O'Neill, who for his "Duke of Paul Revere" is given equal ranking at least, with Lionel Barrymore as Tom Mix and Bill Hart.

Revere's Ride Full of Thrills

FAMED in poetry and in prose, the historical ride of Paul Revere was never before invested with the significance, the thrills and the daring that it is in D. W. Griffith's "America," the big photo-drama of the War of Independence, which will have its Western premiere at the new Forum Theater, Pico and Norton, next Thursday, May 15.

And Griffith's picture gives the lie direct to Longfellow's poem on the ride. The poet stated that "hardly a man is now alive who remembers that famous date and year," but the applause that is said to have greeted every hoof-beat of Revere's horse on New York screens would prove that women and children as well as men remember Paul, his steed, and the occasion of their nocturnal trip very well indeed.

There have been horse races pictured before. The pictures have shown more than one thrilling bit of fine horsemanship. But—and this is from the unanimous opinion of the army of New York film appraisers—never has the silver-shoed known such a thrilling ride as that of Paul Revere in Griffith's latest and biggest achievement.

Revere is shown waiting in the moonlight on the Charlestown shore, "booted and spurred and ready to ride." Two hundred flashes giving warning that the British are coming by sea. Then starts the ride through the villages, towns which, in New York, is the product as brilliant a piece of horsemanship as ever adorned the screen. Hoofs ring, sparks leap and showers across moonlit roads. Lanes and alleys the highway. Revere's mount proves his war at a furious gallop in the accomplishment of the feat of an audience aroused to the pitch of excitement. Revere's ride ends in the Lexington Green, where the British are drawn up in battle array.

Lionel Barrymore, who is the Revere of the picture, is given a chance to do a fine piece of acting. Lionel Barrymore is a fine actor, and he has given a fine portrayal of Revere. Lionel Barrymore is a fine actor, and he has given a fine portrayal of Revere.

Lionel Barrymore is a fine actor, and he has given a fine portrayal of Revere.

Remember Who Played In 'Birth of Nation'?

Many Stars of Today Started in Old Griffith Film

DO YOU REMEMBER the thrill you got the first time you saw "The Birth of a Nation"? That was in the good old days when the names of the players didn't mean as much to movie fans as they do now. Nearly all the faces in the old Griffith picture were new to you then.

The years passed and you forgot whom you had seen in this first of big spectacles. Now you are going to new thrillers every week, and certain movie players are as well known to you on the screen as the corner grocer is in real life. But it may surprise you to know that many of the present favorites helped to give you that evening of enjoyment years ago.

There's Henry B. Walthall, for instance, who was the hero, the Little Colonel, in the old film. He was last seen here in "The Unknown Purple" and his next picture will be "The Woman on the Jury," from the stage play.

Mae Marsh was his younger sister, whose death inspired the formation of the Big Sister. Her latest pictures were "Dulcine" and "The White Rose."

Spottiswoode Aitken, whose character studies are well known, was Dr. Cameron, the father. Ralph Lewis, now a star, whose latest films were "The Mailman" and "The Third Alarm," was Stoneman, the cripple and theatrical politician.

Little Dixie, who at the Capitol last week in "The White Rose," was his daughter. Mary Alden was the pioneer mother housekeeper. George Siegmann, often seen somewhere in "Sunny" parts, was the big mulatto protege of the Stoneman politicians.

Three members of the old cast are now starring in pictures. Elmer Clifton, who played Stoneman's son, has recently given us "Mr. Dynamite Lane" and "Down to the Sea in Ships" and is now completing a new one for Fox. Joseph Henabery, who was Abraham Lincoln, and Donald Crisp are now directing for Paramount.

Two of the players who have gone on to the screen are Elmer Clifton and Mae Marsh.

Revolutionary History Made Real. The Battle of Bunker Hill is Pictured in the Film, "America," at the Auditorium Theater.

Cleveland (O) Plain Dealer 5/9/24

D. W. Griffith Home, Seeing in Mussolini A Greater Napoleon

Second Producer, Back on Homeric, Says Anything May Happen in Hustling, Ambitious, Fascist Italy

D. A. R. Helped Griffith Plan "America" Film

Cleveland (O) Plain Dealer 5/9/24

Brooklyn (NY) Times Record May 9 1924

my American 5/9/24

Herald-Express 5/9/24

San Antonio (Tex) May 10 1924

Saine

GRIFFITH'S STAR TRIO IN FILM AT POLI'S

(Republic: Washington Times) May 10 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Times May 10 1924

D. W. GRIFFITH'S SCREEN PROGENY WILL HONOR MASTER AT PREMIERE

Upper—D. W. Griffith, Carol Dempster. Lower—Carol Dempster in a scene from "America" and, right, Riley Hatch.

AS AN appreciation of the helpful guidance given them in their early screen careers by David Wark Griffith, a galaxy of stars and directors now in the Hollywood or Culver City studios will be first-nighters at the grand final premiere of the new Forum theater and Griffith's "America" May 15.

Griffith has had set aside a thousand seats in the Forum for members of the profession on the opening night and these are being rapidly taken by cinema folk.

Every actor and director in West Coast studios who began careers under Griffith and whose time will permit will be present.

List of Stars

A list of the better known film folk of today who were green at the business when Griffith gave them their chance reads like a roster of filmdom.

Among those might be mentioned Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Elmo Lincoln, Henry Walthall, Harry Dunkinson, Walter Miller, Claire McDowell, Charles Mailes, Bibby Gordon, Jack Dalton, Kate Bruce, William Dunaway, Cabanne, George Siegmann, Eric Hudson, Tom Wilson, Alfred Paget, Charles Emmett Mack, Elmer Clifton, Walter Tetlow, Alan Hale, Robert Harron, Donald Crisp, Ralph Lewis, Fay Tincher, Mary Alden, Vera Lewis, The Cheer Boys, Richard Barthelmess, Mildred Harris, Lillian Gish, Dorothy Gish, Constance Talmadge, Ruth Mix, Bessie Love, Carol Dempster, Donald Crisp, Ben Alexander, Mae Marsh, Erville Alderson, Mary Pickford, Lionel Barrymore, Wilfred Lucas, Walter Huston, Carol Dempster, Charles Emmett Mack, Harry Carey, Neil Hamilton, Ralph Graves, Lionel Barrymore, Ben Alexander, Carol Dempster

Cincinnati (O) Times-Star 5/10/24

...nant Figure of the Motion Picture World as Seen Through the Eyes of His Partner and Brother.

...roducer Is a Man of Simple and Democratic Tastes Whose Existence Is Bound Up in His Studio Work.

By WILLIAM G. STIEGLER

THE sensational success of his latest effort, "America," the Revolutionary war photoplay now showing at the Shubert theater, has apparently reaffirmed D. W. Griffith's title as the "master mind of filmdom," in the opinion of the American picture-going public.

Griffith seems to possess a distinct genius for combining picturesque periods of history with romance. He created an entirely new epoch in motion pictures when he presented "The Birth of a Nation." The novel from which it was adapted—"The Clansman," by Thomas Dixon—was only moderately successful and was never accorded serious literary consideration. But Griffith saw in the theme great dramatic possibilities which had escaped the author. Instead of picturizing merely the romance of the story, he dramatized a vital phase of American history, using the original love story as a connecting link to illustrate the effect of the Reconstruction period on the lives of a certain group of individuals. The French Revolution was made to serve a similar purpose in his "Orphans of the Storm," adapted from the old stage play, "The Two Orphans."

And now he has repeated his former triumphs in "America," which many critics unhesitatingly pronounce his masterpiece. He has again demonstrated that history and romance can be artistically combined in photoplay form. And through his vivid reproduction of the spirit and atmosphere of the Revolutionary days he has reawakened a profound interest in one of the most picturesque periods of American life.

Griffith is one of those geniuses who prefers to express his ideas through his pictures, rather than to exploit himself through personal publicity. In the news announcements issued by the Griffith office there is always considerable material about the producer's work, but practically nothing about the man himself. Some new lights on this dominant figure of filmdom, therefore, were obtained through the visit of Albert L. Grey to Cincinnati this past week.

Despite the difference in names, Mr. Grey, who is vice president and general manager of the Griffith film corporation, is a brother of D. W. Griffith. The producer wanted his brother as business adviser and associate. He felt, however, that the presence of two Griffiths in the firm would be confusing. He desired to prevent a situation whereby a person walking into the office and asking for Mr. Griffith would be met with the demand: "Which one?" And in order to overcome these obstacles his brother Albert agreed to change his name to Grey.

* * * *

No man may be a hero to his valet, but D. W. Griffith is the personification of genius to his brother.

"His entire life is in his work and he has practically no existence apart from it," declared Mr. Grey. "Although not a large, robust man, his amazing vitality is a mystery to every one. During the last few weeks of the making of 'America,' Mr. Griffith was working 20 and sometimes 22 hours every day. In the daylight hours he was busy directing his final scenes, while at night he wrote titles and supervised the cutting of the film. He has several expert cutters who have been with him for years, but they never make a move except at his direction. He personally passes on every inch of film used.

"What does Mr. Griffith do in his leisure hours away from the studio? Well, he scarcely ever has any, in the first place. When at work at his plant at Mamaroneck, N. Y., he generally finds something to do around the studio until nearly midnight. He loves the water, and in the summer, before retiring, he will frequently sail or swim for an hour or two. At other times, upon finding an interesting book, he will read until the daylight hours and then snatch a little sleep before resuming his work.

"Quite extremely durable, he does not care for formal society. He almost never accepts invitations to dinner. He is a powerful dancer and always dancing as a pastime, but he almost never allows himself an opportunity for it. With all his genius, he is an extremely distinct man and seems severe at work as well as rest. He is a charming conversationalist and a stirring speaker, yet he shows hesitancy in performing when he may be asked to talk. Sometimes at dinner, when he is alone and feels the need of companionship, he will drive over to my home in New Rochelle and talk to me for several hours about world events and his dreams of the future. Almost never does he talk about his pictures.

"Of the things he does do, the things that others are doing of him, he is a keen observer. He is a student of human nature and a student of the psychology of crowds. He is a student of the history of the world. He is a student of the history of the Revolutionary period. He is a student of the history of the Civil War period. He is a student of the history of the Reconstruction period. He is a student of the history of the French Revolution period. He is a student of the history of the Napoleonic period. He is a student of the history of the Napoleonic period. He is a student of the history of the Napoleonic

LUCE'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
NEW YORK BOSTON
CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES (CAL.) TIMES

FORUM LAST WORD IN THEATER CONSTRUCTION

Philadelphia Public Ledger

Many Novel, Unique Features Built Into Cinema Playhouse to Open This Week

Lionel Barrymore in scene from "AMERICA" CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE

Los Angeles Cal Times

Private Auto Stalls Break Out Locally

Individual numbered stalls for automobiles is the innovation to be inaugurated by the new Forum Theater which will have its grand opening coincident with the Los Angeles premiere of D. W. Griffith's "America" on the evening of May 18. The Forum management believes this will make the first time a theater ever had maintained its own auto park with numbered stalls reserved for patrons just as seats in the theater are reserved.

When a patron buys tickets he can at the same time purchase for the nominal charge of 10 cents a parking space reservation which will be held exclusively for him just as are his seats. Accommodations are provided for 500 cars and because of ample space there will be no delay on entering or leaving the park. No tipping will be permitted and patrons can be assured of being able so to time their arrival that they may park their car and reach their seats in time for the opening of the performance all within five minutes.

Cincinnati O Enquirer 5/11/24

Davenport Ia Dem Leader 5/11/24

MOVIE STAR WILL POSE FOR STATUE

Philadelphia Pub Ledger 5/11/24

Plays Modern Paul Revere

Omaha (Neb) Herald 5/11/24

Los Angeles Cal Times 5/11/24

New Haven Courier Register 5/11/24

High Lights, Overtones And Tag Lines

By PIERRE DE ROHAN

What are the functions of a newspaper critic? In New Haven, at least, there seems to be a popular impression, or rather, a variety of conceptions. This was strikingly illustrated last week when David W. Griffith's "America" was shown at the Shubert. "Mr. Nemo," writing in the Yale Daily News, characterized the film as "Mr. Griffith's Version of Columbia the Scum of the Ocean," while the reviewer for the only other newspaper attempting criticism began his daily doting like this: "'America' is the greatest moving picture of all time."

Patently, both of these reviews were insincere. "Mr. Nemo's" vituperative outburst may be excused as proverbial school-boy thoughtlessness, but the other extremist cannot plead this excuse. No man with enough sophistication to maintain himself on a newspaper payroll could be hynotized into believing that "America" is the greatest motion picture. Then what is the explanation? The fascination of the free pass? A sense of obligation to the donor? Fear of contradiction? Or mere laziness—an inclination to follow the course of least resistance? No matter what the reasons, both reviews are narrow, and therefore fail to achieve the purpose of a legitimate criticism.

While it is manifestly unfair to overpraise a poor entertainment and thus persuade readers to waste their money and lose confidence in the press, on the other hand it seems equally unjust for a reviewer to take advantage of his poor little place in the sun to berate the honest efforts of a producer to entertain the public. And no one can doubt for a moment that Mr. Griffith is trying to do that with "America." There is no veiled propaganda or glorification of personality in the film; it is an out-and-out box office attraction, calculated to serve the purpose of all good pictures—give the producer a fair return on the money invested in it.

Judged by every known standard, "America" is a poor picture. That much is admitted. But judged by the same standards "The Sheik" of a few seasons ago was a thousand times worse. Yet it enjoyed unparalleled popularity. Therefore it must be recognized that a good picture, judged by existing standards, is not necessarily a "good" picture to the great mass of people who find in the cinema their chief source of recreation. It is for this public that motion pictures are produced, whether the producer be David Wark Griffith or Mack Sennett. And any criticism that fails to take judicial notice of this fact cannot hope to accurately analyze any picture.

In the theater as elsewhere, "one man's meat is another man's poison," and a theatrical reviewer's primary duty to his public, as we interpret it, at least, is to analyze the particular play or picture at hand and set forth its merits and demerits in such a way that his readers may decide for themselves whether or not they wish to see it. This should not eliminate opinions of course, but they should be advanced as opinions pure and simple, not as the arbitrary rulings of a super-intellect. For instance, "Mr. Nemo" says: "America is a mangled spew of facts and sentimentalities that has not even the virtue of being constantly bad. It is a million dollar hash of everything from sadism to the Declaration of Independence; and it is exactly as artistic as a pail of garbage. One feels unclean, soiled, debased by having witnessed such a mockery of our national history."

What he really means is that Mr. Nemo felt unclean, soiled, debased by having witnessed what seemed to him to be a mockery of our national history. But that does not necessarily mean that Mr. and Mrs. Legion felt unclean or soiled. On the other hand they probably left the theater with a sense of elation at having seen two British officers do a Prince of Wales as they attempted to follow Paul Revere over the hurdles, Mr. Griffith interpolated to dramatize the w. k. midnight ride. Mr. Legion probably replied: "Didn't that young guess we didn't like them damned lime-juicers, huh?" and Mrs. Legion probably replied: "Did that young dude look just too sweet for anything when they tore his shirt off?"

Mr. Nemo concludes his review by declaring that "'America' is a picture which one ought not to criticize dispassionately. It is a travesty at which the tore blood should boil in one's veins." With an effort, one might manage to find one or two not utterly damning things to say about it. For example it is run off at the unbearably slow speed of 16 pictures per second. But in the large, one can only pray fervently that it will not be imitated—as of course it is sure to be. May I be removed far from this, my native land, until the wave of lunatics shall subside.

As we have already said, we consider "America" a poor picture. And by the same token we consider Griffith a good director. Of course he is responsible for the entire production, and he is responsible for the fact that only the scenes that he thought were good enough to pass his critical eye are in the picture. Which might be taken as an argument in his favor.

Some days prior to the opening of "America" we had occasion to see a number of scenes from the film. We felt then that Griffith was trying to make a good picture. We felt that he was trying to make a picture that would be a credit to himself and to the country. We felt that he was trying to make a picture that would be a fitting tribute to the men who fought and died that our country might be free

San Antonio (Tex) Express May 12 1924

Washington DC Herald May 12, 1924.

San Antonio (Tex) News 5/12/24

See "America" First, Huge Thrill For Old and Young

Columbus Discovered This Country; Griffith Discovered its Romance — Greatest Triumph of Screen at Majestic All Week.

Cast of Characters.

(In the order of their appearance.)

Nathan Holden ..... Neil Hamilton
Justice Montague... Erville Alderson
Miss Nancy Montague ..... Carol Dempster
Charles Philip Edward Montague.. .....Charles Emmett Mack
Samuel Adams ..... Lee Beggs
John Hancock ..... John Dunton
King George III...Arthur Donaldson
William Pitt.....Charles Bennett
Lord Chamberlain.....Dowling Clark
Thomas Jefferson.....Frank Walsh
Patrick Henry...Frank McGlynn Jr.
George Washington....Arthur Dewey
Richard Henry Lee...P. R. Scammon
Captain Walter Butler..... .....Lionel Barrymore
Sir Ashley Montague...Sidney Deane
General Gage.....W. W. Jones
Captain Montour.....E. Roseman
Chief of Senecas, Hiakatoo..... .....Harry Semalls
Paul Revere.....Harry O'Neill
John Parker, Captain of Minutemen .....H. Van Bousen
Major Pitcairn ..... Hugh Baird
Jonas Parker ..... James Milaily
Colonel Prescott ..... H. Koser
Major General Warren .... Michael Donovan
Captain Hare ..... Louis Wolheim
Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Brant.. .....Riley Hatch
Edmund Burke ..... W. Rising
Personal servant of Miss Montague ..... Daniel Carney
Household servant at Ashley Court. .....E. Scanlon
Lord North ..... Emil Hoch
A Refugee Mother..Lucille La Verne
(By special courtesy)
Major Sirong ..... Edwin Holland
An old Patriot ..... Milton Nobel

Some thousands of citizens, soldiers, Indians and others.

"AMERICA," which its producer, D. W. Griffith is pleased to call the romance of 110,000,000 people, gave San Antonians their mightiest thrill since the heyday of "The Birth of a Nation," a photoplay which put Mr. Griffith on the map as the greatest master of the cinema art. "America" is adequate proof that he still holds the title.

Mr. Griffith, with a story written by Robert W. Chambers, went to Lexington Common and the Bridge at Concord; hung again the lantern of warning in the Old North Church; set Paul Revere again upon his famous ride; brought Washington from the repose of majestic marble into living leadership; put speech again upon the impassioned lips of Patrick Henry; caught the white savagery of winter at Valley Forge; gathered the patriots into that momentous event of the signing of the Declaration of Independence; brought from obscurity those dashing Virginia heroes, Morgan's Rifles, with "Liberty or Death" upon their breasts, pets of the army, who triumphed in the little known but most important warfare over the inland grainfield; ending with the inauguration of Washington.

Briefly, that is "America"—a grand adventure—certain to stir every patriotic heart. "See America First" probably would be the best slogan the Majestic Theater might hang on its front door this week for this most thrilling and satisfying motion picture entertainment of the day, and one that brings every bit of patriotism to the boiling-over point, will be an inspiration for every San Antonian, an education for every school child in the city and every foreign-born or alien, ignorant of the country's early struggles, will find in this living, breathing document of the sacrifice and idealism of the men who freed America something altogether glorious.

Neil Hamilton, a new leading man found by Mr. Griffith is almost too good to be true, for there are mighty few like him; Carol Dempster is a lovely and lovable Nancy Montague, the finest performance of her career; Arthur Dewey's portrayal of Washington will right any in the hall of his build and stature. None the less satisfying are the others in the long year of principals, with a background of some thousands of extras. The picture is a masterpiece of pictures, often resembling pictures in the Science, and it is produced with the sweep and fire and fire inspiration that marked our first great epic of the signing of their embassy.

Historic Accurate.

The accuracy of the author, Robert W. Chambers, is shown in the use of the Old Bridge at Concord, the exterior of the Lexington Common and the interior of the Old North Church, the Liberty Bell, the Hancock Clock, the Old Ship Church in Salem Street, from which the lantern warning signal was hung, the Old Ship Church in Hingham, which is the oldest church in Massachusetts, and the Old Meeting House in Salem, which was used for the Constitutional Convention of 1780. It is the home of Pitt that [illegible] the Old Bedford Inn, the Old Ship Church in Salem Street, from which the lantern warning signal was hung, the Old Ship Church in Hingham, which is the oldest church in Massachusetts, and the Old Meeting House in Salem, which was used for the Constitutional Convention of 1780. It is the home of Pitt that [illegible] thrill than if some nondescript drum had been used.

Old Relics in Picture.

"Flint locks and powder horns which did deadly service on that historic day when 77 Americans attempted to block the progress of 800 trained and tried regulars of King George Third, were contributed to the Griffith cause, many of them by private families who regard these ancient weapons as their most precious heirlooms.

"Private letters and dairies yellowed with the age of 150 years, rough drawings made by eyewitnesses, and the most authentic prints were taken from public and private vaults to add the wisdom contained in them to the knowledge of Griffith's research workers.

"No small percentage of Lexington's population took an active interest in the progress of the work. Discussions of politics and of modern affairs gave way in many quarters to grave and heated discussions over the kind of knocker that was on such a house in 1775 or the color of So and So's dress.

"A collection was made of pictures of Samuel Adams, Dorothy Quincy and others who figured in the Lexington scenes, and with their aid were selected actresses and actors to fit these parts who bore close physical resemblance to the actual historical personages. Such important points as the color of Sam Adams' hair and eyes, the shape of Dorothy Quincy's nose, and the exact type of vehicle most in use were urged and settled."

Mr. Griffith desired to construct Concord Bridge exactly as it was in 1775, and so the oldest prints were compared and the most noted local historians consulted. The North Bridge and its surroundings were reconstructed in such realistic detail that could the British soldiers who sleep hard by awaken they would have to rub their eyes to believe that 150 years had passed since they fell in that immortal combat.

In staging his battle scene, Mr. Griffith had before him the depositions of men who actually fought at Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, consequently the same numbers were engaged and those who were killed or wounded occupied the same relative positions to their companions as did the original participants.

Heard Round the World.

At Concord Bridge three incidents stand out clearly amidst the long line of historical events which followed. One is the first council of war, when Col. James Barrett called his subordinate officers to him; the second the appearance of a flag among the men of Bedford (the first flag to be carried into action by the Minutemen of Massachusetts); the third the shot heard 'round the world. Incidentally in a deposition Solomon Smith, a member of Capt. Davis' Acton company, states that he saw where the ball struck the river on his right, which then ran parallel to the road. This shot was in answer to Maj. Buttrick's order for the British to stop pulling up the planks on the bridge.

Other shots followed, but they were evidently badly aimed, for no one was hit, but as Maj. Buttrick and his little band neared the bridge a volley from the opposite side checked their advance. Then it was that Luther Blanchard, the fifer from Acton, was wounded in the arm, and at the second volley Capt. Davis and Private Abner Hosmer killed.

It is interesting to know the names of the Minutemen who returned the British fire in the early morning engagement on Lexington Common that April morning so long ago. They were eight in number, as follows: Lieut. William Tidd, Cpl. John Munroe, Solomon Brown, Ebenezer Lard, Ebenezer Munroe, Nathan Munroe, Jonas Parker, Benjamin Sampson.

The entire casualties on the American side that day were 49 killed, 42 missing, a total of 90.

The British losses were 18 officers killed, wounded, or missing, 62 men killed, 157 wounded, 24 missing.

The distances marched by the different detachments of British soldiers varied from 11 1-5 miles to 29 2-3 miles.

The Irony of Fate.

Maj. John Pitcairn, by whose order the first volley of the War of Independence was fired, and who afterwards, in the Wright Tavern, Concord, stirred his sweetened liquor with his finger, remarking as it stopped over, that Yankee blood would thus spill on night, was afterwards fatally wounded at the Battle of Bunker Hill, and died as he was being taken back to Boston in a boat. Tradition says that his body was towards the floor of the Old North Church in Salem Street, from which lantern of which the warning signal was hung, to escape the storm of every Revolutionary village and farm in eight of the colonies.

Historic Accurate.

The accuracy of the author, Robert W. Chambers, is shown in the use of the Old Bridge at Concord, the exterior of the Lexington Common and the interior of the Old North Church, the Liberty Bell, the Hancock Clock, the Old Ship Church in Salem Street, from which the lantern warning signal was hung, the Old Ship Church in Hingham, which is the oldest church in Massachusetts, and the Old Meeting House in Salem, which was used for the Constitutional Convention of 1780. It is the home of Pitt that [illegible]

MISS CAROL DEMPSTER, the dainty D. W. Griffith screen star, whose charming and delicate enactment of the role of the Southern beauty, Nancy Montague, in Griffith's new historical triumph, "America," is partially responsible for the brilliant success of that great screen story, which began its fourth consecutive week yesterday afternoon at Poli's.

LOVE WITH A BOXING GLOVE.

Mr. David Wark Griffith, the moving picture producer, begins an article about himself in a magazine by writing: "They say I am a realist, a man who functions best when reproducing in the films life as he sees it or knows it. Fortunately I have my fancies."

Fortunately or unfortunately Mr. Griffith has. The moving picture is a script of life to many people. And wot a life! The picture moves and therefore it must be real because real people move. The stage may be regarded as artificial because the action is within four walls or at the widest in a bit of a suggested landscape. The moving picture is all over the place and because it is so rich in detail and so minute in action it becomes recognized as reality and the motives which it asserts as governing in life are accepted and the consequences which flow from them are not disputed.

A tremendous force, teaching in the simplest way, by pictures. When Mr. Griffith has his fancies, and we'll say he has them, his admirers think they are facts. Mr. Griffith in his article explains one of his fancies. It is that the moving pictures will succeed in reducing war to a harmless pastime if they do not abolish it. They will explain people to each other.

In Mr. Griffith's vision is the spectacle of two nations which have become as angry as nations can get after a hundred years of moving pictures. Nothing can keep them from fighting, not even the prevailing love and kindness of the time. Fight they are going to, but they send their armies against each other with boxing gloves and when the victor has chased the vanquished up the trees there is nothing worse than a few bad noses and some cauliflower ears. All the misunderstanding has been wiped out and the vanquished buy the grape juice, unfermented of course.

Mr. Griffith asks that he be accepted as entirely serious in this vision of future good. We assure him that we do think he is. We have seen many moving pictures and some of his and we know he never was more serious in his life. Moreover we hope he is right. We are even willing to help arrive at this state of perfection in sooner than 100 years, but we want a promise from the moving picture producer that the other army will not come to with horseshoes in their gloves.

To promote the program we are willing to allow Georges Carpentier to fight Tommy Gibbons at Michigan City this month to see whether the French debt is double or nothing.

Leading Man in 'America' Rises to Film Fame Over Night

Neil Hamilton Leaps From One of Ford's Six-Dollars-a-Day Man to World Wide Fame for Clever Work as Capt. Holden.

NEIL HAMILTON, the young man who plays the part of Captain Holden in the romantic Morgan's Riders scenes of D. W. Griffith's great film "America," now at the Majestic, is distinctive in that he is the first youngman of equal experience to be given so important a role. No other young actor has had such an opportunity unless backed by a record of successful efforts.

He is the son of an attorney now living in New Haven, Conn. Lynn, Mass. is his birthplace, and his education was gained in Athol, Mass.

His mother hoped he would enter the ministry, and guided this ambition by entering him for a five-year course in a theological seminary.

Somewhat impulsive, with an ardent nature Neil Hamilton realized such unrest that his mother liberated him from all promises and the family held council as to his future.

He said he wished to become an actor. Peculiarly his arguments were given strength by the prophecy of an old woman of local reputation as a seer who predicted he would be "famous when young and rich when old," if he followed acting seriously.

His introduction was a small part in "The Better 'Ole" on the stage, followed by several seasons of varied occupation. Once he was one of Henry Ford's six-dollar-a-day young men in the River Rouge plant.

One afternoon D. W. Griffith sent for a well known stage actor to consider a part in one of his screen stories. The actor was under contract to others, but suggested Griffith try his room-mate, whom he recommended as being very handsome.

Hamilton appeared, intensely nervous and most conscious of his slight experience in screen work.

His trial resulted in the business manager for Griffith asking Hamilton his terms for a three-years' contract. Then and there Hamilton broke up a serious rehearsal by leaping into the air and shouting. He calmed to the business of signing his paper, and immediately was given a part in "The White Rose."

To give him thorough training, Griffith made Hamilton act every male role in the picture during rehearsal.

When the Daughters of the American revolution asked to have "America" made, Griffith decided that Hamilton was perhaps the most typically American of all the young men then available for the part.

So he was given the great acting part of Nathan Holden, the Harvard express rider who falls in love with the Tory beauty of Virginia.

His success has been so great that, when "America" was shown, Griffith immediately received over a dozen offers for Hamilton's services, including two offers for foreign productions. He will soon appear in a picture now being made with Ernest Torrence.

NEIL HAMILTON

In the character of Capt. Holden in D. W. Griffith's superfilm "America" showing at the Majestic Theater this week.

THE FILMS A CENTURY HENCE

A movie in every home is the prophecy of David Wark Griffith, famous producer of motion pictures, who in Collier's peers into the future" writes Mr. Griffith, "I believe the airplane passenger service lines will operate motion-picture shows on regular schedule between New York and Chicago and between New York and London. Trains, which will be traveling twice or three times as fast as they do now, will have film theatres on board. Almost every home of good taste will have its private projection room where miniatures, perhaps, of the greater films will be shown to the family, and, of course, families will make their albums in motion pictures instead of in tintypes and 'stills.'

"By the time these things come to pass, there will be no such thing as a flicker in your film. Your characters and objects in pictures will come upon the screen (which by then may not even be white, and certainly may not be square, or look anything like what it does now), and they will appear to the onlookers precisely as these persons and objects appear in real life. That much discussed 'depth' in pictures, which no one as yet has been able to employ successfully, will long since have been discovered and adopted. The moving canvas will not appear flat, but if a character moves before a fireplace you will recognize the distance as between the character and the fireplace. Likewise, in landscapes, you will feel the proper sense of distance. Your mountain peaks will not appear to rise one on top of the other, but will appear exactly as if you stood and looked at them. Of course these are merely details that will require long and intense study and experience, but they will come. In other words, from the standpoint of naturalness, motion pictures 100 years from now will be so nearly like the living person or the existing object pictured that you will be unable, sitting in your orchestra seat, to determine whether they are pictures or the real thing.—Christian Science Monitor.

Christian Science Monitor Boston (Mass) May 14 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Record 5/14/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 5/13/24

Elizabeth (N.J) Journal 5/13/24

Covington (Ky) Post 5/12/24

Chicago (Ill) News 5/12/24

Detroit (Mich) Free Press May 13, 1924

Washington (D.C) News 5/13/24

Atlantic City Press 5/14/24

Boston (Mass) Herald 5/14/24

Erie (Pa) Times 5/14/24

Wilmington (Del) News 5/15/24

READY FOR OPENING—Blanche Sweet, motion picture actress, tried out most yesterday which has been reserved for her for presentation of D. W. Griffith's "America," at opening of Forum theater, Pico street and Norton avenue, Thursday night.

"AMERICA" CAST AN ALL-STAR ONE

HOST OF WELL KNOWN ACTORS ARE FOUND IN PROMINENT ROLES

A number of prominent actors are seen in the cast of D. W. Griffith's "America," the photodrama of the War of Independence which is showing at the Majestic Theater here this week.

Theater lovers will be pleased to find in addition to Carol Dempster, Neil Hamilton and Lionel Barrymore, a host of favorites in excellent roles, among them Lucille La Verne, whose performance in "Sun Up" is one of the outstanding triumphs of the stage year. Other well known players in "America" are:

Louis Wolheim, college graduate, soldier in many armies, and actor extraordinary, whose performance in "The Hairy Ape" is still vivid in the minds of all who saw it.

Riley Hatch, concert singer, artist and actor on both stage and screen, now playing in "The Nervous Wreck."

Arthur Donaldson, a musical comedy star of two continents who, after achieving fame in Norway, Sweden and Denmark, created the title role in the original "Prince of Pilsen" company here.

Erville Alderson, attorney at law and actor, who founded an art theater in Kansas City, Mo., and gave the stage to enter the Griffith fold, where he has been seen in several productions.

Sidney Deane, another musical comedy star, today is as well known in film fans as a few years ago he was in light opera patrons.

Edwin Holland, who starred in "The Gingerbread" with Lionel Barrymore and "Kindling" with Clare Bloodgood and Nance O'Neil, and James Gleason, Malcolm, another famous of long experience.

Charles Bennett, who leaps his life with Edith Storey, will be seen in a leading role in "America."

Lionel Barrymore, who plays the role of Captain Walter Butler, is the brother of John and Ethel Barrymore.

1000 Seats for Film Folk on Opening Night

WITH one thousand seats in the new Forum Theater set aside for the film family of Hollywood and Culver City on the opening night of the cinema temple coincident with the Western premiere of D.W.Griffith's "America," picture folk are taking a keen interest in the event set for May 15. This reservation of seats for those connected with the silent drama is made at the personal request of Griffith and although the reservations have been available only a few days, they are being rapidly taken by players, producers, directors and others connected with the industry.

Officials of the Forum believe that on the evening of May 15, more cinema folk will gather at Pico and Norton streets to see this new addition to picture theaters, the "America" premiere and enjoy the roof garden cafe and cabaret in the theater than ever assembled at an opening of this kind before.

The Motion Pictures

Revival of Griffith's "Birth of a Nation"

Special from Monitor Bureau

NEW YORK, May 9—Cameo Theater, "The Birth of a Nation," a motion picture founded on Thomas Dixon's story, "The Clansman," directed by David W. Griffith, originally produced at the Liberty Theater, New York, in 1915.

Nearly a decade has passed since Mr. Griffith jacked up the movies to an unsuspected dignity by his epoch-making picturization of the searing and salvaging of a nation, or rather since he formulated his recipe for blending historic fact and Griffith fiction for screen purposes by producing "The Birth of a Nation." Not only he himself, but others in the field, have found that model fundamentally sound for reproduction and elaboration. But the surprising fact about this revival is how well it moves and has its stirring being after all (and it is a lot, considering) these years. Even if the photography seems oldish, the general design of the shots lacks modern distinction, and the several ways of registering emotion reveal the picture's antiquity, the vitality and cumulative effect of this Griffith pioneer production stand unquestioned.

The giddy precincts of six figures was reached for the first time in the picture industry before Mr. Griffith had his film ready for the projection room, and while the cost of production has jumped like the mitting stone that time, the chief requisite for good pictures remains the same today as then—not money, but intelligence. To choose the stirring years of the Civil War and the reconstruction period for his picture, to see the great struggle from an angle of racial strife between the whites and the Negroes, to take his group of characters and weave them into the picture, working from the particular to the general and then back again to its original theme, have led to a statement that seems at times and spreads now as in the days when the theatrical world looked with horror at the presumptuous of a "movie" charging regular theater prices of admission.

At the same time, the marked physical gains have gone on, for since the first to which some of Mr. Griffith's previous features slightly amounting to the realization that the motion film is a photographic furnisher to the art of scenery, with and private details and with a bearing upon the background of some production, giving a sense of depth and distance to have blended the thing desired from the young ladies in the profession if the twittering, agitated grimaces and dervish-like gyrations of Lillian Gish and Mae Marsh are any indication. Historical accuracy was such a novelty that notes were added to the titles explaining when scenes were replicas of original events or edifices. The art of titling had not been seriously considered then; it was thought enough to tell the story simply and well, without attempting anything particularly literary in style.

The big battle scenes are as stirring as ever, as are the long shots of Sherman's march through Georgia. The southern section of the picture is replete with thrilling detail and the gathering of the clansmen with the rescue of the various groups of whites from the incited Negroes offers a well-built climax that has not often been excelled. Mr. Griffith chose well in casting then as now, and it is indeed interesting to see Miss Gish and Miss Marsh, besides such other well-known people of the profession as Henry Walthall, Wallace Reed, Robert Harron, Miriam Cooper, Ralph Lewis, Joseph Henabery, and Spottiswoode Aiken. Mr. Griffith's present-day "America" shows how well he has built on the foundations laid in "The Birth of a Nation." To what lengths the art of the motion pictures is destined to go is impossible to say, but it is encouraging to think how early in its history one director saw its possibilities and had the courage to make his vision come to pass. R. F.

N.Y. ACTOR MAY SEE PREMIERE OF 'AMERICA'

ILLNESS of his paternal ancestor is preventing one of the chief characters of David W. Griffith's "America" to Los Angeles from New York, and he expects to be present to witness his own performance when the revolutionary opus flashes on the screen for its western premiere at the opening of the new Forum theater, May 15.

The actor is Erville Alderson, son of W. A. Alderson, attorney. He is seen as Justice Montague, father of the little Tory beauty, Nancy Montague (Carol Dempster), whose love affair with Nathan Holden, a young continental officer, invests the photodrama with a strong vein of romance.

Boston (Mass) Globe 5/14/24

St. Louis Art Notes

Los Angeles (Cal) News 5/14/24

'America' Opens Thursday

HAS LEAD IN GRIFFITH CINEMA—Carol Dempster plays the leading feminine role in D. W. Griffith's "America," the historical film spectacle which is to be introduced in Los Angeles for the first time when the Forum theater opens Thursday, May 15.

"AMERICA" STARTS FOURTH POLI WEEK

SOCIETY AND SCREENLAND TO ATTEND OPENING OF FINE NEW FORUM THEATER

Beautiful new Forum theater, Pico and Norton streets, which will opened with Griffith's "America" tomorrow night. Inserts sh Carol Dempster, star of the picture, and Robert Edeson, who will master of ceremonies

Gala Night Promised at Premier of L. A's Latest Picture House

By GUY PRICE

Scores of stage and screen celeb rities and a goodly portion of South land society will make a gala occasion of the formal opening tomorrow night of the city's newest theater, the Forum, at Pico and Norton streets.

Keenly interested in both the new theater enterprise and the Griffith production, the stars of the silver-sheet residing in Los Angeles were planning to attend the opening almost en masse and the Forum sponsors declared today that the event will be a memorable one in the amusement history of Southern California.

More than 1000 members of the film colony, great and small, will be represented in the audience of 1800 persons which will watch the first showing in Los Angeles of the Griffith spectacle after inspecting the arrangements and decorations of the new theater.

BIG DISPLAY PROMISED

Hundreds of thousands of dollars will be on display in the glittering array of jewels and new gowns worn by the women of the audience, while the combined salaries of the picture players and stars of the stage who are to be present would total a figure worthy of the envy of a Midas.

Exceptional preparations were being made today by the Forum management to provide the utmost entertainment and comfort for the guests of the theater on its opening night. The task of making the theater ready for the auspicious occasion was being rushed to completion by several hundred workmen with a certainty that everything will be ready for the first train.

Robert Edeson, veteran star of both the stage and screen, will preside as master of ceremonies at the formal opening and will introduce various well known theatrical personages who will make short congratulatory addresses. Representatives of the Forum management will respond.

Hundreds of floral tributes from screen and stage players and the managements of other theaters of the city were being received at the Forum today and the interior of the theater was expected to be a bower of flowers by tomorrow night.

Los Angeles Cal News 5/15/24

Forum Opening Griffith Returns Denies Engagement Gloria Mentioned

—By L. B. Fowler—

TONIGHT the eyes of the cinema world will be focused on the new Forum theater, Pico at Norton, which is to throw open its doors to a brilliant first-night assemblage with David Wark Griffith's "America" as the initial attraction; somewhat of a dual premiere, so to speak.

The Forum has been much heralded and interest in the opening has been constantly stimulated. Reservations indicate that the elite of the Hollywood cinema colony will be there to analyze, critically, what "D. W." has done with his historical photoplay conception. Tonight should prove to be "the night of nights."

* * *

And, speaking of Mr. Griffith—according to reports from the East—that gentleman has returned from Italy. His premature return to the United States is attributed to ill health, but, according to gossip in New York film circles, the cause is rather than the matter stated.

Shortly after Mr. Griffith's arrival on foreign shores it is said that he had some difficulties with the exchange men at whose invitation he went abroad. Many conferences were held and it is said that Mr. Griffith decided to wait no longer upon money interests.

* * *

When the noted director sailed it was generally understood that he would make one or two films that would bear a likeness to his "America," having to do with the historical events of European countries. Italy was to have been the first, and the deal, according to reports, had been virtually settled prior to his sailing.

When he arrived and mapped out plans for his historical cinema and presented an estimate of the cost it staggered the Italian capitalists; consequently, with the foreign money interests apparently backing down, there was nothing for the well-known director to do but to return to the United States. Presumably, his press agent sent out the story that he was not in the best of health although it is generally known that Mr. Griffith has not been in the best of condition, physically, since his photoplay venture. He undoubtedly preferred to return to his native country for a rest before doing any more directing.

Albany (Ny) Knick-Press May 15 1924

TO SAY IT WITH BOXING GLOVES.

Like Senator Lodge, D. W. Griffith, movie director, has a new idea about world peace. Unlike Senator Lodge he is not going to tear down any structures or depend on the United States senate for action. It may be that Mr. Griffith, as a good producer in his own line knows his senate. World courts have nothing to do with this idea of Mr. Griffith. But he would abolish war—in this fashion:

"All the world's a stage" said that other great producer. "All the world's a boxing ring," says Mr. Griffith. "Put gloves on the armies and let them have it out according to the rules of the Marquis or the rules of Tex Rickard."

He is recognising the fact that man is a combative animal—that he will reason just about so long and after that will fight, particularly if he is Irish, English, Scotch, or Latin. Mr. Griffith is also recognising the fact that it is a good thing for persons to spend excess steam. He can see a great many good things about his plan for world peace. It is easier for most of us to grapple with the Griffith idea than with the Lodge idea. Cauliflower ears might become numerous but there would be fewer wooden legs and shattered bodies.

The only difference between fact and fancy here, is that war as it is practiced is a selfish and grasping thing. It is based upon the idea of possession, cruelty, terror and the attainment of loot, whether that loot be national or personal. Boxing gloves would take the terror out of war; they would make it too much of a sporting proposition; they would eliminate its horror and its hate. Likely enough after a boxing glove battle the opponents would share their beer and biscuits together, because the blood of the battlefield would not be the blood of dead men.

And there it is—fear. That is the thing that makes war a weapon for the strong and the selfish. Every new instrument of fire-taking means more fear for the coward. If every nation could be depended on to play the game boxing gloves would be a good thing. But human nature has changed little since 1914. The good machine gun is worth a million boxing gloves in most bad careers.

My Judge 5/15/24

D. W. GRIFFITH has made a picture called "America" that is so worth your while that there isn't any doubt that you will see it when you get around to it. This is also a picture that will not move for some time to come. It is playing at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, a house usually devoted to the legit. As a matter of fact, you will be surprised, if you cast your eyes down the columns of the advertising pages of the theater, to see the number of legitimate plays that are sandwiched in between the moving pictures that are playing at the regular playhouses. We repeat, if bigger and better pictures are to be made, there will have to be built many more theaters to house the legit. "America" is a picture that the moving picture producers have reason to be proud of.

Los Angeles (Cal) News 5/15/24

Chicago (Ill) American 5/14/24

Thrills Come Thick and Fast in 'America,' Says Fay King

BY FAY KING.

Talk about thrills!!!—they come thick and fast in D. W. Griffith's "America," now showing at the Auditorium Theater.

This is series 1, called "The Sacrifice," and Robert W. Chambers has woven a sweet love story through the facts that form the foundation of our country's history!

Not for an instant does the interest lag, and there are just enough close-ups to balance the long shots, so that you have an intimate picture as well as a spectacular one.

The acme of the action is reached when Paul Revere again rides that famous midnight ride, calling the people to arms, and I became almost hysterical with the reality of the historical event.

That horse oughta have his name on the program! The way he takes fences and hedges and fallen trees—well, it just makes your heart jazz!

Every American oughts see "America"—to better appreciate the real cost of our country!

I was never very good at history in school!

The battles drawn out with dotted lines on the chalked black board map didn't mean nearly as much to me as they should have! I realize that now!

Just imagine seeing George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Hancock, Patrick Henry, Paul Revere, the chief of the Mohawks and oodles of others actually before you, true to life and to their place in the history of these United States!

It's the thrill of a lifetime!!!

By all means, don't miss it!!!

There are tears and cheers for every inch of film.

The heart interest in our own history runs rich and red, and your whole being will tingle with pride when you see the Minute Men marching to victory or death!

It is the story of sacrifice for freedom, and after seeing "America" every American will love America more!!!!

The music that accompanies the story is as thrilling and inspiring as the picture itself!

During the thick of battle how you love to hear "Yankee Doodle"!

It is a pretty romance that runs through the picture, and Carol Dempster makes a gentle, wistful Nancy!

Three cheers for "America"!!!!

New York Journal 5/15/24

Griffith Favors Directing Picture for Bankers in Italy

They Will Build New Studio, Properly Equipped, and American Producer Then Will Be Ready to Talk Things Over.

By ROSE PELSWICK.

Paul Revere dashed madly toward where it was he had to dash; costumed extras picked up guns, coats and patriotic fervor; two lights flashed across the water; people applauded and cheered and then—

D. W. Griffith took a long breath, applauded silently, and got as much of a thrill out of seeing his picture for the first time since his return to America, as the rest of the audience in the Forty-fourth Street Theatre.

Mr. Griffith, looking ten years younger, weighting ten pounds more, and appearing very much pleased, returned a few days ago from Italy, where a group of ambitious bankers had invited him to discuss directing a picture for them abroad. No satisfactory agreement has yet been reached, but the sponsors of the movement are planning to build a new studio with everything the way it should be. When that is completed, Mr. Griffith will return to Italy, talk things over again, and then—

"You can't blame them," explained the director, "for wanting a picture made there. The idea is to get an American director, a cast of American actors and actresses, and the application of American methods, with which to show the people what a wonderful country they have. Just as our Government instigated a 'See America First' movement, it's an 'Appreciate Italy' campaign with them. There's no reason why Italian audiences should see only California mountains and views of Fifth avenue at Forty-second street. There is Venice—Rome with its gorgeous architecture—their glorious battlegrounds and romantic natural beauty. With all that for a setting, and with a really good picture.

"There, too, you know," continued Mr. Griffith, "they need movies, and had a good market for them in America. They imagine stated production, and then exporting out of their hands. They have no idea, for instance, getting the players and that is wonderful. We have backers that feel it will be just a great deal of commercial good if they can get the people back where they belong."

And it isn't only getting the people back to their own land, the tourist part, the tourist part, the tourist part

Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner 5/15/24 Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 5/15/24 Los Angeles (Cal) Examiner May 16 1924

IN BIG PREMIERE

Carol Dempster in D. W. Griffith's "America," which opens the new Forum Theater tonight.

Tacoma (Wash) Ledger 5/15/24

Griffith Talks of Power Of Motion Pictures; Sees Movies as Peace Factors

By QUINN MARTIN

A MOST interesting article appears in the May 3 issue of a weekly magazine under the heading, "The Movies 100 Years From Now." It is signed by David Wark Griffith and says in part:

"In the year 2024 the most important single thing which the cinema will have helped in a large way to accomplish will be that of eliminating from the face of the civilized world all armed conflict. Pictures will be the most powerful factor in bringing about this condition. With the use of the universal language of motion pictures the true meaning of the brotherhood of man will have been established throughout the earth. . . All men are created equal.

PREDICTS GREAT STRIDES IN PERFECTION OF ART

"There is little question that a century ahead of us will find a great deal more of the so-called intimate drama presented on the screen, although there will always be a field set apart for the film with a vast background, such as 'The Birth of a Nation' and 'America.' You will walk into your theater and find your actors appearing in twice the size you see them now, because the screens will be twice as large and the film itself twice as large also. With these enlargements 'close-ups' will be almost eliminated, since it will be relatively easy to picture facial expression along with the full figure of the performer. It will always be necessary to picture the face in pictures. It is the face which reflects the soul of a man.

"We shall say there are now five elaborate first run picture theaters on one New York street, Broadway. In 100 years there will be at least 40. Cities will average at least six times as large as now and thereabouts will cities of 10,000 and thereabouts will be found in 100 years. By virtue of its great advantages in scope, the motion picture will be used to tell epic stories of the history of the world. Man I must say, no place medium only of the spoken or written word, but also of the intimate and poetic phase of expression.

Films to Achieve

"We have past one directors of the future will be men produced in the theatre, academies and colleges for their curriculum, courses in the art of motion picture will be added to the curriculum of the universities. Perhaps there will be a degree of motion picture art. Perhaps there will be a degree of motion picture art. Perhaps there will be a degree of motion picture art

Los Angeles (Cal) Record 5/16/24 — Los Angeles (Cal) Express 5/16/24 — Miami (Fla) News — Metropolis 5/16/24 — Roslin (Ind) News-Times April 23 1924 — Chicago (Ill) News 5/16/24 — Phila (Pa) Eve Public Ledger 5/17/24

'America' Stirs Liberty to Life

FORUM—"America," directed by D. W. Griffith from a story by Robert W. Chambers.

By TED TAYLOR

WITH "America" Griffith does a great thing for America.

He blows the dust off the musty dry records of the Revolution and shows those times to us throbbing with life.

If Griffith had never accomplished or never was to accomplish another thing in his life, his "America" would entitle him to the eternal gratitude of Americans.

What "Uncle Tom's Cabin" meant in opening the eyes of the north to slavery, there is hope that "America" will mean in reawakening in north and south and east and west the true spirit of Liberty that animated this land in 1776.

The same spirit that impelled Americans once to resist laws that they had no voice in making—resist with their very lives, in ragged handfuls, in the face of long shining lines of disciplined rifles.

Real "Americanism"

In short, Griffith has redefined for Americans the word "Americanism," which has lately become the prey of every hypocritical and selfish slinger of "patriotic" phrases.

As to the quality of "America" as a dramatic and artistic motion picture, I think Griffith has done as no other movie-maker could have done.

History Made Vivid

The history seems authentic; there is every reason for it to be more accurate than the much-censored textbooks of the public schools.

It shows that the British, too, were brave; that Americans, being human, sometimes retreated.

Bunker hill is made lucid and indelible—which all the dry texts of the classroom failed to make it for me.

The ride of Paul Revere—ah, what a thrill. The greatest "chase" scene ever filmed.

And Griffith, always remembering that the particular is more effective than the general, way weaves the adventures (and a romance) of one particular family into his picturing of history.

As always, Griffith excels in romance.

The Protagonists

Neil Hamilton, D. W.'s new discovery, plays the young express-rider, pal of Paul Revere's, who is the personification of the spirit of the Sons of Liberty. Carol Dempster is a fluttering bit of old-fashioned American girlhood. And Charles Emmett Mack, as the girl's brother, is a heroic and tragic young figure over which the ladies will sigh and weep.

It gives new pride and new hopes for "the land of the free and the home of the brave" to see this picture which is all about liberty and which is called "America."

Patriotic Message Vividly Presented By Great Director

THE FORUM—D. W. GRIFFITH'S "AMERICA"—Story and titles by Robert W. Chambers; personal direction D. W. Griffith; historical arrangement by John L. S. Fall.

CAST—Nathan Holden, Neil Hamilton; Justice Montague, Erville Anderson; Miss Nancy Montague, his daughter, Carol Dempster; Charles Philip Edward Montague, foo but not lacking in swordsman skill and bravery, Charles Emmett Mack; Samuel Adams, Lee Beggs; John Hancock, John Dunton; King George III, Arthur Donaldson; William Pitt, Charles Bennett; Thomas Jefferson, Frank Walsh; Patrick Henry, Frank McGlynn, Jr.; George Washington, Arthur Dewey; Capt. Walter Butler, Lionel Barrymore; Sir Ashley Montague, Sidney Deane; General Gage, W. W. Jones; Paul Revere, Harry O'Neill; John Parker, captain of minute men, H. Van Bousen; Jonas Parker, James Milisky; Captain Hare, Louis Wolheim; Chief of Mohawks, Joseph Sinnat, Riley Hatch; a Refugee Mother, Lucille La Verne (by special courtesy); an Old Patriot, Milton Nobles.

By PEARL RALL

THREADING together the exciting events of this country's initial fight for independence with a charming and idealistic love story, such as D. W. Griffith has never quite approached in delicacy and sane beauty, this master creator and director of motion pictures has served double purpose in "America," with which the beautiful new Forum theater was opened last evening with great fanfare and social brilliance.

"America" may be said to rival Mr. Griffith's earlier and much-discussed "Birth of a Nation." In some respects it shows a finer spiritual conception, and a more polished though less massive handling marks it technically.

It teems with excitement and action, calculated to appeal strongly to the emotions. It partakes cunningly of the inspirational, the educational and the purely entertaining. It will undoubtedly fire patriotism to a higher and unalloyed brightness. It will send film fans of the country back to their histories in large degree, to realize the dramatic and story interest of colonial days and that formative period which established American first principles. It will thrill with its human elements.

The story involves the lives of many personages in rather intimate and at times slightly confusing, though absorbing, manner. Principals in the romance are Nancy Montague, a high-spirited Tory girl, and Nathan Holden, an express rider of Massachusetts, who espouses the cause of the colonists. She is one of a famous family of the nobility, raised in luxury and somewhat of a flirt, with an interesting following of masculine admirers on both sides of the struggle as the story progresses. Nathan, the rebel, is the preferred one throughout. Capt. Walter Butler, the dissolute adherent of the king and aspirant to ruling power, and the terrible Captain Hare figure more prominently in this cohesive element of the narrative.

But it is the larger theme that grips the audience, by its sincerity and sheer artistry. It rises to its highest point in the famous ride of Paul Revere, in which a wonderful horse took the leaps of walls, streams and hedges with such the enthusiasm of youth; are not afraid of hard jobs, and who possess that essential element, perseverance, that overcomes the greatest of obstacles—sometimes when these obstacles appear to be unsurmountable.

Young Man's Government

David W. Griffith, master of the motion pictures, comes back from Italy, painting Mussolini as the [illegible] of a young man's government. It [illegible] apt characterization, and impressive. [illegible] a thought comes to us that maybe after all governments the world over might begin to think seriously about the same subject—young men in public life. Not "kid" administrations, of course, but those in which the virile elements of young people have a big part to play. It is to be said for America, and the fact hardly can be successfully challenged, that when it comes to selecting men or women as the case may be for public office, we have been altogether too prone to think first of age, basing our premises upon the supposition that with age alone comes safety in counsel. Age of course, mellowed with the experiences of passing years and combining as it does generally in statesmanship attributes very well worth preserving, is worthy of preservation. Certainly age with its mature judgments cannot be discounted as an important factor in governmental development. On the other hand it should not be overlooked that mature years bring to some who may be classified as statesmen, a somewhat tardy and incomplete view of present-day requirements.

After all, we suppose, the current of public thought does not change greatly from decade to decade. There are few new things under the sun, and many things that are new are neither practical nor purposeful. But a changing universe needs new life and new aspirations on the part of the leaders in public thought, and Mussolini unquestionably has caught the vision of this new order by giving authority in many instances to young men who at their age twenty-five years ago would still be considered in the "swaddling clothes" period of life. If Italy shows great advance, energy and hustle and if the country is stepping to the forefront in international life some at least of the credit that is due for this transformation may be given to the fact that the premier and many who associate with him have my motion picture news 5/17/24

U. S. Military Men View "America"

When D. W. Griffith's "America" was thrown on the screen at the Forty-fourth Street Theatre May 7 the orchestra floor was reserved by the New York Chapter of the Military Order of the World War, an organization composed entirely of commissioned officers who served in the World War, and of which Brigadier General John H. Bradley is commander.

The theatre was specially decorated and speeches were made by officers of both the army and the navy prior to the opening of the performance and during the intermission.

"America" Is Greatest of Recent Pictures

By ALICE ROHE
(Written for United Press.)

New York.—Every once in a while something happens to prove the contention of the "intelligent minority" that the public appreciates better stuff than it is given. This something has happened with an overpowering argument in the case of D. W. Griffith's superb motion picture "America." As is always true of whatever this master of the screen produces, the public demonstrates so enthusiastic an appreciation that the query naturally presents itself: "Why isn't an effort made to elevate the whole moving picture output to a high, artistic level."

Of course, the answer must revert to one logical fact—there is only one D. W. Griffith. At any rate, Griffith's incomparable power of visualizing psychologically great historic moments is evidenced as never before in "America." One lives through the tense and tragic hours in this making of our own country. It would take a soul dead indeed not to weep unshed tears at those pitiful heroic moments in Lexington. And it is safe to say that in all motion picture annals nothing has approached the compelling realism of the midnight ride of Paul Revere.

It is not merely because Griffith has been able to use historical accessories that this picture is great. The drum used by the Minute Men is the original one. A number of the flint-lock guns used in the pictue actually served in that historic encounter at Lexington. But it is that intangible spirit which Griffith transfuses into all his pictures—a complete sense of authenticity. There are no anachronisms. No banal sentimentality, characteristic of the average motion picture, taxes one's common sense. Instead we are swept on by the spirit of participation. And a most important phase of this picture is the introduction of the sufferings of the Northwest—scouraged by Indians, exploited by Butler.

Yet, above all the heart-stirring scenes in this finely co-ordinated picture of South, North and Northwest—all the phases of America's struggle for independence—nothing stands out so indelibly as that ride of Paul Revere's. Battle scenes, fighting, are more superbly represented than in any motion picture in that we never once lose the "two sides" to the combat. But I doubt if any child of our present era—when the thing we call patriotism, which has been so often cheapened and betrayed in somany waye—can ever obliterate the memory of the scenes in "America," beginning with the flash of Paul Revere's lanterns form North Church tower.

No child should be permitted to miss the opportunity—and so far as that is concerned, no adult either. For Griffith has done a thing of incalculable value in this day of pseudo-internationalism and swaggering nationalism—he has stirred real patriotism—real love and appreciation for America and the deals for which the men of Lexington, of all our early heroes, gave their lives.

The Frontiersman's Rendezvous. Fort Sacrifice, as Depi[illegible] in the D. W. Griffith Film, "America," Being Shown at [illegible] Auditorium Theater.

Chicago (Ill) Journal May 17 1924

Riley Hatch used to crack jokes in the local musical shows; now he's big Injun cachem in D. W. Griffith's great patriotic pictorial, "America," which goes its way to hearty hosanas at the Auditorium. Facing big Injun is Carol Dempster, [illegible] America of [illegible] Hatch, here as gentle as a turtle dove

CAROL DEMPSTER 'AM[illegible] Chestnut St. Opera House

My Exhibitors Trade Review 5/17/24

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH, who went to Ita[illegible] last month to investigate proposals made him by prominent Italians, is scheduled to be back home on May 8.

JACK DEMPSEY, who is to make two reel [illegible]

Los Angeles (Cal) Record 5/17/24

FORUM IS STUDY OF CONTRA[illegible]

A STUDY in contrasts is what appears to those who have w[illegible] dial opening of the Forum theater and D. W. Griffith's [illegible] The Roman [illegible] of the cinema, which is the acme of achieve[illegible] world of the theater, provides the modern extreme, while [illegible] Griffith has preserved in celluloid what research reveals to be [illegible] picture of the mode of living in the days when America was a [illegible] pictured the direct antithesis of the modern world of today.

Unfolded on the silver sheet in the Forum is a liberal [illegible] early American history which strikes home to greater degree than [illegible] pictures conjured by the rhetoric of historians. Romance of a [illegible] gone is blended with humor, pathos, hardships and discouragements [illegible] mounted by figures [illegible]

Chicago (Ill) American 5/17/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald 5/17/24

Chicago (Ill) News May 17 1924

Screen News 5/17/24

Sacramento (Cal) Bee 5/17/24

Memphis (Tenn) News-Scimitar May 17 1924

Wyandotte Herald May 17 1924

Chicago (Ill) Post 5/17/24

Chicago (Ill) News May 17 1924

Los Angeles (Cal) Times 5/17/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Express 5/17/24

Los Angeles (Cal) Herald May 17 1924

Fresno (Cal) Bee 5/17/24

Filmograph

IN THE MOVIE WORLD.

Neil Hamilton, who plays the part of captain of the romantic Meagan's Riders in D. W. Griffith's film, "America," is distinctive in that he is the first young man of equal experience to be given so important a role. He is the son of an attorney now living in New Haven, Conn. Lynn Maas is his birthplace, and his education was gained in Albany, Maas. His mother hoped he would enter the ministry and guided this ambition by entering him for a five years course in a theological seminary. Neil Hamilton resented such [illegible] that his mother liberated him from all promises and the family [illegible] concerned as to his future. He said he wished to become an actor. His [illegible] was a small part in "The [illegible]" on the stage, followed by [illegible] engagement of varied characters, [illegible] stepping stone to a small part in a [illegible] stage production, [illegible] in one of the stock companies. This [illegible] young man's price in consulting [illegible] under contract to Thomas Meighan [illegible]

Neil Hamilton

Neil Hamilton, who plays the part of captain of the romantic Meagan's Riders in D. W. Griffith's great film, "America," is distinctive in that he is the first young man of equal experience to be given so important a role. He is the son of an attorney now living in New Haven, Conn. Lynn Maas, Mass., is his birthplace, and his education was gained in Albany, Maas.

His mother hoped he would enter the ministry and guided this ambition by entering him for a five years course in a theological seminary.

Somewhat impatient, this young man's mother liberated him from all promises and the family became concerned as to his future.

He wished to become an actor. His first [illegible] was a small part in "The [illegible]" on the stage, followed by [illegible] engagements of varied characters, [illegible] stepping stone to a small part in a [illegible] stage production, [illegible] in one of the stock companies. This [illegible] young man's price in consulting [illegible] under contract to Thomas Meighan [illegible]

D. W. GRIFFITH FILM WINS HIGH PRAISE

Forty men are working on day and night shifts to make the new Forum theater at Pine and Norton ready for its opening the second week in May. To see this new playhouse—and rather seven playhouses—one would incline to believe that nothing short of what is vulgarly called a "seven ring" would be a fit attraction for its screen.

Many who have seen D. W. Griffith's "America" have moved to refer to it as a "photodramatic epic of Revolutionary days."

Whether it truly deserves the much abused appellation, "epic," is a matter of opinion. Some critics have pronounced it a masterpiece of the screen, making comparisons at times with the Griffith film, "The Birth of a Nation," which was a film epic of the Civil War days. Some have said it is the greatest film production ever made, and others have said it is not quite so good as "The Birth of a Nation."

Dancing Led to Film Career

CAROL DEMPSTER, the young California girl who plays the role of Nancy Montague in D. W. Griffith's "America," Auditorium, is one of the youngest actresses in leading film roles. She was born in Michigan in 1904, where her father was prominent in lumbering.

When she was 5 years old the family moved to Falmouth, making their home at Sagas Beach, on a 5,000-acre estate. This was a favorite place for the Falmouth [illegible]

Haverhill (Mass) Record May 18 1924

THE MOVIES 10[illegible] YEARS FROM

Silent Drama Ha[illegible] portrait Made [illegible] Plot

Exhibitors Herald Chicago 5/17/24

Wheeling (W Va) News 5/18/24

Worcester (Mass) Post 5/17/24

Ny Times 5/18/24

Mr. Griffith on Italy

SINCE we last saw D. W. Griffith he has been to Italy, having gone there at the request of an Italian syndicate who wished to talk over with him the possibility of producing a big picture, which it was hoped would increase Italy's prestige in the film business. Mr. Griffith asserted that the trip was just as much to get a rest as to talk business. He said that Americans are speeding up Italian telephones and railroads, and that it was thought that an American producer might emulate his confrères in stimulating the production of pictures. He explained that at present there is no studio in Rome which would permit of making scenes such as are made in this country, but that the banking syndicate assured him that in three or four months they would have facilities in a new studio now building with a lighting system that can draw upon 8,000 amperes. The Banco Commerciale Italiana is back of the syndicate.

"Italy wishes to be a great world power," declared Mr. Griffith, "and they look upon the picture business as a wonderful institution and a remarkable medium for reaching the whole [illegible] of 'America,' and they liked the idea as it was outlined to them. They have voted a large sum of money for the purpose of a film production, but so far they have no adequate facilities for making the picture. However, negotiations are still pending, and there is a possibility of my returning. Of course Italian ideas are utterly different from ours.

"I told them that my last picture cost more than $1,000,000 and that their American representative could go over my books. They were not dumfounded at the stupendous sum, but it nevertheless made them scratch their heads when it was translated into lire. If they finish the new studio, it is their idea to make a picture bigger than has hitherto been produced. Settings would be much cheaper than the cost of constructing these in America, and then there is the question of 'extras.' In Italy extras receive about twelve lire a day, equivalent now to 53 cents. We have to pay them $5 to $7 a day. There is a catch about these Italian 'extras' however. They just appear for that amount. If they are left standing around one does not have to pay them [illegible], but supposing they are asked to run, or carry a heavy spear or even to applaud, they then are entitled to more money. In the event that these men are paid for each trifling performance from 12 to 100 lire, and I were to make forty retakes, the cost of production would be something to puzzle about, and we would require special auditors and bookkeepers to keep track of the 'extras' and their respective performances. In fact, one would imagine that referees would be necessary to determine the importance of each 'extra' and his work.

Protracted Luncheons.

"Italians are in the habit of taking two hours for luncheon. The importance of eating and drinking is far beyond that of making pictures! I don't know what I would be doing while they were consuming food and beverages for this protracted period.

"Then there is the question of imparting my wishes to the players. I can easily see that if I made a picture in Italy I would want American principals, as talking to Italians through an interpreter would be most unsatisfactory and extremely slow. Have you ever heard an interpreter translating English into Italian? You tell the interpreter to tell the Italian it is raining, and he appears to trace the rain down to Jupiter, call attention to floods caused by rain, to allude to umbrellas and raincoats, to refer to the mud, the consequent growth of plants and foliage, and the results of droughts. You have said four or five words which in Italian appear to make a whole chapter.

"One can readily imagine the difficulties that might ensue if I attempted to direct a picture with Italian actors, giving all the instructions through an interpreter! Think of the flow of rhetoric, of the twenty-minute sentences to which I would have to listen before my poor words were intelligible to the players. No, I doubt certainly have American actresses and do the best I could in the circumstances with the native talent and 'extras.'

Italian "Pep."

"I did see Mussolini, but I visited a high and mighty official of the Government, Contarelli, who, I believe, is Premier. He has an office in a barracks and great sentries put me at the gate. [illegible] I found Contarelli [illegible] interested in what, [illegible] were [illegible] of [illegible]. You can imagine its exact appearance. Just as I was taking a seat I noticed on a little side table a dirty and worn [illegible]. I rather [illegible] [illegible] of the Napoleon [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Philadelphia (Pa) Public Ledger May 18 1924

Scene in "AMERICA"
CHESTNUT STREET OPERA HOUSE

Norfolk (Va) Virginian-Pilot 5/18/24

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 5/18/24

Griffith Personally Known to Few of Hosts Who Praise His Work

D. W. Griffith is a figure in the film world known by name to millions of picture fans, but personally to few. He makes few "personal appearances" and his immediate intimates are his staffs, at the enormous studios at Mamaroneck, N. Y., and those in his New York offices.

Griffith was born in Kentucky, but his residence now is at the Mamaroneck studios, where he has established a sea-walled park for picture-making, one of the show places along Long Island Sound. Here he makes all his pictures, which, critics say, are unsurpassed for emotional intensity, poetic beauty and dramatic suspense.

Mr. Griffith is in his early forties, five feet and eleven inches tall, and weighs about 150 pounds. He is alert, decisive in movement. His vitality and endurance are premiums of excellent health and indomitable will.

His studio is his home. For weeks he never leaves the grounds. Up at 7:30 every morning, he works steadily until from 11 to 1 o'clock every night. It is typical of him that he hastens, but never hurries; moves quickly, but never rushes.

In directing Mr. Griffith first allows the players to interpret the action for themselves, so that their portrayal may be natural. From this basis he improves, suggesting movements and meanings. Only in intensely dramatic scenes does he ever raise his voice, and then only as emotional incentive. While the action proceeds his face is a pathway for the quick and flowing emotions the scene reveals, reflecting every phase of every character.

His attitude toward his players is that of persuasive partnership, first following their original reactions, then sharing with them, gradually expanding the mind so that he leads them in molding a scene for the permanency of the camera.

He corrects, but seldom criticises and never denounces. His tolerance and patience are two capital features of his rare ability to handle others.

Rex Ingram, famous director of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," said: "We all follow Griffith. He did everything first, and the other directors do them over again as best they can. Making pictures was everything to this man."

CAROL DEMPSTER -
CHESTNUT ST. OPERA HOUSE

Philadelphia (Pa) Inquirer 5/18/24

Climbed Ladder of Fame With Ability

High tribute has been paid by Robert W. Chambers, author of the story upon which "America" was founded, for the work of D. W. Griffith in bringing to the screen the notable picture of that name. Those who see "America" here at the Chestnut Street Opera House will generally agree with the Chambers' judgment, which, in a recent interview, was given as follows:

"Griffith is the hard brains, imagination, executive of everything. Without this really great artist there would have been only a recreation, not an authentic and magnificently dramatic picture representing the sacrifice and suffering offered on the altar of liberty of mind and body.

"It is someone to be proud of, such an artist, a man leader and artist, such a man, that Griffith, sympathetic, clear, big and steady, alone at the head of a national enterprise."

Rochester (N.Y.)

Philadelphia (Pa) Record 5/18/24

Griffith Film Has Popularity

'America' Continues to Enthrall Visitors to Chestnut Street Opera House

Portland (Ore) Oregonian May 18 1924

D. W. Griffith, who recently made a trip to Rome in the interests of a large group of Italian financiers who were interested in reviving their country as a factor in motion picture production, has returned. He is not enthusiastic over the possibilities for production in Italy and stated that the chief difficulty was a sad lack of proper studio facilities.

"The present Italian studios," he declared, "are on a par with what existed in this country before the war and those familiar with the history of production know what that means. There doesn't exist a studio in Rome equipped with sufficient electrical power to shoot a large set. Production under such handicaps is out of the question."

Columbus (O) State Journal 5/18/24

Neil Hamilton, the new D. W. Griffith star in the romantic national picture, "America," has been asked by Henry H. Kitson, the sculptor, to pose for a statue which has been ordered as a memorial for Washington's headquarters at Newburgh, N. Y. Mr. Kitson is the sculptor of the famous statue of the Minute Man at Lexington Common. After seeing Hamilton in the hero's role, he selected him as the ideal type of young American manhood and asked him to pose as a model.

Theatre Magazine May 1924

WHILE the sniggering memory of Yolanda may disturb the sanctity of the movie temples when other so-called historical spectacles are on view, it will never be evoked, save in the awful judgment of contrast, if the photoplay be D. W. Griffith's America. I approached Mr. Griffith's latest picture in a diffident mood, expecting the shrewd and oft-times effective melodramatic dodges that the director has mastered by a somewhat wearisome public practice, but never dreaming that my eyes would be blessed by the loveliest visions the cinema has yet brought them. In sheer pictorial beauty America has no equal among the moving pictures of the past. Scene after scene of haunting charm appear upon the screen, often snatched away by the greedy title writer before their beauty can be fully savored, but each seeming to surpass in splendor those that have gone before.

Largely this is the fixed beauty that is created by the artist of the brush, but the director has, nevertheless, achieved many magnificent pictures with a flowing tapestry whose threads pulsate with life. The technique of brilliant compositions that are formed by a combination of painted perspective-glass and natural scenery, has here reached a degree of perfection that augurs even greater artistic triumphs for the cinema in the future. Heretofore, the motion-picture camera has stolidly reflected the reality upon which it was focussed. With this new trickery of paint and glass the director may shape from his fancy a veridical

Ft Worth (Tex) Star-Telegram May 19 1924

"America" Is Splendid

ACTING AND PHOTOGRAPHY FINE

Music Helps Slightly

BY KENT WATSON.

D. W. Griffith's "America," which opened Sunday at the Majestic for a week's run, is the best historical moving picture ever made. It is a splendidly done battle spectacle of the American Revolution, produced, as the captions tell, to show the sacrifices of our forefathers in their fight for liberty.

Although the love story that sustains the piece is of little consequence, those interested in history will sit enthralled through the magnificence of this newest Griffith extravaganza, which is a document that will tend to preserve for future generations an unofficial, photographic record of conditions during the days of 1774.

The photography is the best that Griffith has contributed to the screen, particularly the filming of Paul Revere's midnight ride and the screening of the battle of Bunker Hill and the scenes of the tattered heroes of Lexington and Concord marching with Washington through the snow-covered territory that had been ravished by the British.

The identity of the players is kept a secret, as far as the captions on the screen are concerned. However, Carol Dempster, Griffith's perpetual heroine, was recognized. She did very good work. Another player easily recognized as Lionel Barrymore, who played in admirable style the heavy role of the villainous Colonel Butler of the British forces.

The work of those three who took the parts of Washington Nathan Holden and young Montague was outstanding and it would have been better had Griffith published on the screen the names of these and the other performers.

The musical scores that accompany the picture are monotonously distracting. There was far too much of a continuous blending of "My Country 'Tis of Thee" and "Yankee Doodle." And the cymbals crashed too much, because "America" was not intended to be a "mellerdrammer."

Los Angeles (Cal) Record May 19 1924

OFFICIALS SEE GRIFFITH FILM

Members of the Greater Pico Street association have planned to attend the new Forum at Pico and Norton streets Monday to witness Griffith's revolutionary drama and at the same time express to officials of the new Forum theater their interest and appreciation of what they term a great asset to the community.

Officials of the association are to address the audience before the performance and dur[illegible]

Denver (Colo) News 5/18/24

Indianapolis (Ind) Star 5/18/24

Griffith Is Called By Italian Bankers To Revive Cinema

D. W. Griffith, wizard of the screen, has accepted an invitation from a syndicate of Italian bankers to go to Rome to confer on the production of a series of motion pictures to be made there. The syndicate is headed by Comm. Andrea Sereo, member of the mayor's cabinet of Rome.

This action on the part of the banking group has the approval of the Italian government and brought from the syndicate this statement:

"We feel the activity of Mr. Griffith in Italy will do much toward restoring the picture-making industry of Italy to its full health and prosperity."

This is the first time an American artist has been called officially by another nation to re-establish an art activity. No definite plans have matured as to the nature of the story to be picturized, but it is understood the syndicate wishes something after the manner of Mr. Griffith's "America." This picture of the Revolutionary war, made by Mr. Griffith for the D. A. R., is now breaking attendance records at the Forty-fourth street theater, New York, and the Majestic in Boston.

To Pose for Sculptor

